[M] Cardinal Palavicino extenuates ... faults of this Pope; but he does not refute what Fra-Paolo ſays of him.] He owns this Pope loved to divert himſelf; but adds, that he was as fond of applying himſelf to buſineſs. Pronus ad laxamenta, ſed æque etiam ad negotia (25). He grants that he died without being much loved or eſteemed. Æſtimatione tenui, nec majore benevolentia mortuus eſt (26); but Palavicino pretends, that this was owing to his acting with a little too much freedom and familiarity; becauſe, by his not attracting the veneration of the public, it was concluded that he was not a worthy Pontif. The author adds, that this judgment was not juſt; and that if the faults of Julius III were more conſpicuous than his good qualities, they perhaps were not of ſo much conſequence as his virtues: Nihilominus, ut mea fert opinio, hæc de illo exiſtimatio fuit iniqua: ipſius quippe vitia majora quidem ad ſpeciem erant quam virtutis, ſed non fortaſſe ad pondus (27). With reſpect to the promotion of the lad, he only ſays (28), that it reflected diſhonour in the firſt days of his Pontificate. He acknowledged that the man in queſtion was ſo meanly deſcended, that no one has yet been able to ſay from whence he ſprung; but he pretends that the friendſhip which Cardinal del Monte had for him, was grounded on his conſidering him as the ſon of his judgment, the meaning whereof is this. Whilſt the Cardinal was Legate at Piacenza, he was ſtruck with the pretty pranks of a little boy, who was often about his table. The Legate looking upon this as an indication of genius and good ſenſe, reſolved to bring up this young plant at his own expence; and finding the boy made a great progreſs, he loved him more and more; was pleaſed with his happy conjecture; and conſidered him as a ſon of his judgment, a ſort of creature whom we value more than a bodily child. Oblectatus ex eo herus, ſibique plaudens, quod ſua quaſi perſpicacia plantam eximiam, adhuc minutulam & in luto, diſcreviſſet, majori in puerum benevolentia incaluit, qua illum proſequebatur veluti ſui judicii prolem, cujus filii pluris quam corporis ſoboles æſtimantur (29). He would have his brother adopt him; and the inſtant he was elected Pope he honoured him with the purple, the 30th of May 1550. He had made him reſide till that day in a village a day's journey from Rome. He ſettled twelve thouſand crowns a year upon him, but did not then intruſt him with the adminiſtration of affairs. This new elected Cardinal was hardly ſeventeen years of age. He behaved in ſuch a manner as ſhewed him to be altogether unworthy of the honour to which he was raiſed; inſomuch that the ſucceeding Pontifs were obliged to puniſh him for his riotous exceſſes. This is all that Palavicino takes notice of. He cautiouſly forbore to animadvert on Fra-Paolo, who has ſhewn very plainly, that the public conſidered this creature of Julius as his catamite; prudence ſuggeſting that it would not be proper to revive the memory of thoſe ideas. For this reaſon Palavicino does not accuſe Fra-Paolo of maliciouſly collecting ſlanders; but is content with ſaying, that he is miſtaken with reſpect to the time of his adoption (30), and the place where this young man firſt captivated the Pope (31). Here follow Father Paul's words (32). "Julius ſoon gave a ſpecimen "of what his future government would be, by ſpending whole days in walking in his gardens; in projecting the building of country-houſes: in diſcovering a ſtrong propenſion to pleaſures, and very little "inclination to buſineſs (†), eſpecially thoſe which "were found difficult. Mendoza the Embaſſador having obſerved this turn of mind in the Pope, "wrote to his ſovereign, and told him, that it would "be an eaſy matter to ſucceed in negotiations of every "kind with this Pope, who, as he was ſtudious of "nothing but joy and pleaſures, might, by being put "in fear, be made to turn any way. The opinion "which was entertained, viz. that he would prefer "his private intereſt and affections to the public welfare, was ſoon confirmed by the promotion he made "the 31ſt of May of a Cardinal, on whom he beſtowed his hat, purſuant to the cuſtom of the "Popes. When he was but Archbiſhop of Siponto, and "governed the city of Bologna, he took into his "houſe a young boy, born in Piacenza, whoſe original is not yet diſcovered. He took an affection "for him, as though he had been his own ſon; and "took him to Trent, where a grievous fit of ſickneſs "had like to have deprived Julius of him: but ſending him, by the advice of Phyſicians, to Verona, "for the change of air; Innocent (for ſo was this minion called) recovered his health there, and returned ſome time after to Trent. The day he was to "arrive, the Legate came out of the city, as if to "take a walk, accompanied by a great number of "Prelates; and meeting him, received him with "prodigious teſtimonies of joy and tenderneſs: which "occaſioned much ſpeculation, whether it were an accidental meeting, or deſigned purpoſely to take him "in the way. The Legate uſed to ſay, that he loved "him as the author of his fortune (†), inaſmuch as "the Aſtrologers had predicted great wealth and exalted dignities to the boy in queſtion, which could "never happen but by his exaltation to the Pontificate. Scarce was he made Pope, but Baldwin del "Monte, the brother, adopted him for his ſon; and "after the Pope's beſtowing many benefices upon him, "honoured him with the Purple as was before obſerved. This occaſioned Paſquinades, and gave "courtiers an itch to ſpeak out the real cauſe of ſo "ſurprizing an action, by ſeveral conjectures drawn "from paſt accidents."

[N] The Court of France offered this Pope's nephew a Princeſs of the blood, but this alliance was refuſed.] The Pope anſwered, that marriages between perſons of ſo different a rank could not be happy; and that as he acknowledged the Royal Family in France to be the nobleſt in the world, he acknowledged his own to be the meaneſt and moſt deſpicable upon earth. Nevertheleſs the Pope did not give the true reaſon of this refuſal; for the circumſtance which prompted him to refuſe ſo glorious an alliance was, his deſire of marrying his nephew to the Grand Duke's daughter; which would be of more advantage to him, in order for the putting in execution a project he had in view in favour of his family. Thuanus informs us of theſe artful particulars. Julius, ſays he (33), ad ſcurrilitatem uſque feſtivus, & alienam ab innata deceſſoribus Pontifícibus ambitione mentem præ ſe ferens, cum tam interea Coſmi, ut proximi & ſuorum rebus utiliſſimi principis adfinitatem ultra modum expeteret, & Camertium principatum Fabiano deſtinaret, ut conditionem tam amplam eluderet, ſic Lanſacum urgentem dimiſit, ut diceret, quam ex nobiliſſima omnium, quæ uſquam fuiſſent, familia rex prognatus eſſet, tam ſe ac ſuos omnium, qui viverent, mortalium ignobiliſſimos agnoſcere, proinde nuptias, quæ inter pares melius coirent, inter inæqualeis adeo perſonas commode contrahi non poſſe. i. e. "Julius, who was "facetious even to buffoonery, and of a caſt of mind "different from the ambition of his predeceſſors; as "he ardently ſollicited the alliance of Coſmo, a Prince "who lay neareſt to him, and was moſt likely to be "of ſervice to his intereſt, and as he intended to "make Fabian Prince of Camercio; in order to "get rid of the importunity of Lanſac, told "him, that as the King ſprung from the nobleſt family in the world, ſo he owned himſelf and his "family to be the moſt ignoble among mortals; and "therefore that marriage, which is beſt when contracted by equals, could not conveniently be ſolemnized between perſons whoſe condition was ſo very "unequal." It is to be obſerved that one of the daughters of Coſmo Duke of Florence was betrothed to Fabian del Monte, who was Baldwin's ſon, and not yet marriageable. See the thirteenth book of Thuanus. Palavicino, in the place above cited, obſerves that he was Fabian's baſtard.

JUNCTIN (FRANCIS) or rather GIUNTINO according to his Italian name, one of the moſt famous Mathematicians and Aſtrologers of the ſixteenth Century, was born

born in Florence, but ſpent a good part of his life in Lyons (a), and publiſhed many books there [A]. Though he was a Doctor of Divinity (b), he nevertheleſs was extremely fond of judicial Aſtrology in which he was extremely credulous. I know not the year in which he died. He was fifty ſix when he publiſhed a Commentary on the Sphere of Sacroboſco in the year 1557 (c); whence the reader may infer the year in which he was born. Junctin would ſometimes deſcend from the ſkies to divert himſelf with human reſearches; he compoſing a diſcourſe on the æra of Petrarch's amours (d). This work was in 4to, but in the edition of 1581 he ſwelled it to a folio by the Commentaries he added in duos poſteriores Quadripartiti Ptolomæi libros innumeris obſervationibus referta (2), & certiſſimis Aphoriſmis (quatenus ex ſiderum poſitione liceat Chriſtiano more aliquid conjicere) ex probatiſſimorum Aſtrologorum ſcriptis depromptis, inſignita. His Latin Commentaries on John de Sacroboſco's Sphere were publiſhed in 1577 (3). There was printed at Colen in 1580, a book intitled, De Divinatione quæ ſit per aſtra diverſum ac diſcrepans duorum Catholicorum ſacræ Theologiæ Doctorum judicium, ſcilicet Franciſci Junctini ac Joannis Lenſæi. There are two French tracts of Junctin, viz. A large Diſcourſe on the things with which the Comet that appeared in November 1577 threatens many Princes, Countries and Nations of Chriſtendom. Printed in Paris by Gervais Mallot 1557 (4), and at Lyons by Francis Didier 1578, in 8vo (5); and A Diſcourſe on the Reformation of the Year made by our Holy Father Pope Gregory XIII; together with the Cauſes of his taking away ten days of the Golden Number. At Lyons 1582, 8vo. [B] The reader will find below the particulars of his life, as publiſhed by Poſſevin.] I knew him in France, ſays he (7), where he lived in exile, and devoted himſelf to the pernicious ſpeculations of aſtrology. He was a fugitive apoſtate. He had been a Carmelite, and raiſed to the Prieſthood, and even appointed Provincial; after which he forſook his vows, his profeſſion, and the Romiſh religion; but by the charitable counſels of ſome devout perſons he was brought back, in ſome meaſure, into the right path. He publickly abjured the heretical principles he had imbibed in the Church of the Holy Croſs at Lyons; and gave people room, for ſome time, to think that he intended to labour for the advantage of the Catholic Church. However, he was far from retracting the works he had writ upon prognoſticating impieties; Non vidimus eum libros ſuos de impietate divinatrice retractaſſe (8). He was one of thoſe who putting their hand to the plough, and looking back, are not fit for the Kingdom of Heaven. He traded in bills of exchange; he put out money to intereſt, and by thoſe methods gained ſixty thouſand crowns, no part of which could be found after his death. He had bequeathed a legacy of three thouſand livres to the Junti, whoſe corrector of the preſs he had been. However, this teſtimony of his friendſhip proved of no ſervice to them. Juntis honeſtiſſimis Typographis (in quorum ædibus ſæpe librorum correctionibus operam Lugduni poſuerat) mille aureos nummos cum moriens legaſſet, ii mihi faſſi ſunt, eos uti reliquos evanuiſſe; nimirum omnia perdita fuiſſe, quæ perditus ille anxie hinc inde corraſerat (9).

JUNGERMAN (GODFREY) made himſelf known by his learning in the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century. He was born in Leipſic, where GASPAR JUNGERMAN his father [A] was Profeſſor of the Civil Law. His mother was daughter of the famous Joachim Camerarius of Bamberg (a), alſo Profeſſor at Leipſic. Godfrey Jungerman was perfectly well ſkilled in the Greek tongue. The public is indebted to him for firſt publiſhing Cæſar's Commentaries in Greek [B]. He had already publiſhed his Latin Tranſlation of the Paſtoral of Longus with Notes (b). He printed in 1609 remarks on the Treatiſe De Equuleo [C], which Magius had wrote during his impriſonment. Some of his Letters have likewiſe been printed. He died the 16th of Auguſt 1610 (c) at Hanaw, where he had long been Corrector of the Preſs to the heirs of Wechel [D].

(a) Bapenbergenſis. I add this title, to diſtinguiſh this Camerarius from his ſon Joachim Camerarius, who is ſurnamed Norimbergenſis.

(b) The reader will ſee in the remark [A] of the article LONGUS an error of Moreri with regard to Jungerman.

[A] GASPAR JUNGERMAN his father.] It is he very probably who is the author of ſome diſputations on certain points of the Civil Law, which Draudius (1) mentions: and of a poem de Cuſtodia Angelica, mentioned by Draudius abovementioned (2) and by Simler (3).

[B] The public is indebted to him, for firſt publiſhing Cæſar's Commentaries in Greek.] He added to that verſion, aſcribed by ſome to Planudes, the manuſcript whereof which was in Petavius's library, had been communicated to him by Bongarſius (4); he added to it, I ſay, not only his own remarks on the Greek tranſlator, but alſo thoſe of ſeveral learned critics on Cæſar's Commentaries. This edition printed at Francfort in the year 1606, in 4to is greatly eſteemed.

[C] He printed in 1609 remarks on the treatiſe de Equuleo.] The Journal des Savans (5) ſpoke contemptuouſly of thoſe remarks; as though the greateſt part of them were upon trifles; as for inſtance, whether we ought to ſay equuleus or eculeus; but we can aſſure our readers, that this cenſure is a little too haſty; for though Jungerman has enquired ſomething too minutely into this little article of orthography, yet the Journaliſt ought not to have judged of all the remarks from this, which beſides is not uſeleſs to the ſubject, and may pleaſe many.

[D] He had been corrector of the preſs to the heirs of Wechel.] This we find by the letters he uſed to write to Goldaſt (6). We there ſee alſo that he was writing on Julius Pollux; but this was known before by the preface to his edition of Herodotus. He added a great many curious pieces to that edition, and among others ſeveral fragments of Cteſias. Chevillier might have put him in the catalogue of learned men who have been correctors of the preſs (7).

JUNGERMAN (LEWIS) born at Leipſic the 4th of July 1572, and brother of the foregoing, was an excellent Boraniſt. He applied himſelf early to the knowledge of Plants, and acquired ſo great a reputation, that he was offered, in England, the employment of the celebrated Matthias Lobel, who died in London in the year 1616; but he choſe rather to live in Germany. He had already diſtinguiſhed himſelf, by having a great great ſhare in a work intitled, Hortus Eyſtettenſis, comprehending the figure and deſcription of all the Plants in the Biſhop of Eichſtet's garden; and he had drawn up a catalogue of all thoſe that grow in the neighbourhood of Nuremberg, which was printed under the direction of Gaſpar Hoffman in 1615. He was appointed Profeſſor of Phyſic at Gieſſen in the year 1622 [A], after having raiſed a garden there, which had greatly contributed to the improvement of the Students. He paſſed three years in this Profeſſorſhip; and afterwards had ſuch another beſtowed upon him, together with that of Botany, at Altdorf in 1625. He continued in them till his death, which happened the 7th of June 1653; and during the twenty eight years he paſſed in thoſe Profeſſorſhips, he took ſo much care of the Phyſic Garden, that the fame of it ſpread even to foreign countries. He had the more time to ſpend in this employment, becauſe he was never married, nor ever engaged in an amour; whence it was ſaid that his continence could could not be applauded, ſince he had had no occaſion for women; for continence is a virtue, which, in the opinion of Ariſtotle, ought to occaſion a conflict, of which there did not appear any ſigns in Jungerman's life. In quo (cœlibatu) non eſt neceſſe continentiam prædicari, qua nulla in ipſo opus erat, virtus enim eſt cum luctâ, Ariſtotele cenſore, conjunctâ, cujus indicium nulla quæ unquam in hoc genere emicaret flamma, præbere animadverſa eſt (a). A man who was to write a Panegyric on a Friar, would have given quite another turn to this affair. This Profeſſor bequeathed his Library to the Univerſity of Altdorf. I muſt not omit that he took an extreme pleaſure in writing Anagrams [B]. I know not whether he devoted himſelf to judicial Aſtrology; but in the programma whence I extract this article, it is obſerved very ſeriouſly that the humours of a St. Anthony's Fire, ſtopping on a ſudden when Mars was retrograde, occaſioned a ſcorbutic gangrene in the extremity of his feet [C]. Godfrey and Lewis Jungerman had a brother named Gaspar who was a learned man. See Godfrey Jungerman's Notes on Chapter IV de Equuleo.

[A] He was appointed Profeſſor of Phyſic at Gieſſen in the year 1622.] The Rector or Principal of the Univerſity of Altdorf has perplexed the chronology a little in his Programma. He declares that Jungerman had gained ſo great a reputation, whilſt he was Profeſſor at Gieſſen, that he was invited into England, to be ſucceſſor to Lobel that very famous Botaniſt. But this is confounding the times; for Lobel died 1616, and Jungerman was not Profeſſor of Gieſſen but from the year 1622 till 1625. What likelihood is there, that the Engliſh ſhould have ſuffered Lobel's employment to be vacant ſix or ſeven years? They doubtleſs nominated Jungerman to it ſoon after it became vacant. He therefore had acquired, before he was Profeſſor at Gieſſen, the reputation that procured him thoſe great teſtimonies of eſteem, which the Engliſh had entertained for him. Paul Freherus, who has given (1) the ſubſtance of this Programma, has, on one hand, ſpecified the dates better; but on the other, this ſerves only to ſhew more evidently the error of his calculation. He ranks the dates as follow. Doctor Med. creatus, & ad Profeſſionem Med. publicam promotus eſt A. 1622. Hinc (2) per triennium ea nominis celebritate præfuit, ut in Angliam quo celeberrimi Botanici Matthiæ Lobelii ſucceſſor fieret invitaretur A. C. 1616; ſed ille Germaniæ conditiones prætulit. Ad deſcriptionem etiam Horti Eichſtettenſis tota Germania celebris laudabilem nec vulgarem operam contulit. i. e. "He was created Doctor of Phyſic, and appointed "Profeſſor in that ſcience in the year 1622. He acquired ſo great a reputation three years after, that "he was invited in 1616 to England, to ſucceed Mat"thias Lobel that very eminent Botaniſt; but he choſe "rather to live in Germany. He gave an excellent "deſcription of the garden of Eichſtett, ſo famous "throughout all Germany." This Hortus Eichſtettenſis was printed in the year 1613; whence the reader may judge whether the particulars are ranked here according to their proper periods. It is ſuppoſed in Witten's Diarium Biographicum, that our Jungerman was Profeſſor at Leipſic, and afterwards at Altdorf. The reader may not ſcruple to correct this, by putting Gieſſenſi inſtead of Lipſienſi.

(2) One would conclude that the particle Hinc, which anſwers to the word Cui of the Programma, was, by an error of the preſs, put for Huic. But this error of the Printer has not put the order obſerved by the author in a worſe condition.

[B] He took an extreme pleaſure in writing anagrams.] He publiſhed a collection of theſe at Gieſſen in the year 1624, intitled Aulæum Academicum in 4to. There are two other works of his, viz. the catalogue I mentioned in the body of this article, and ſuch another catalogue entitled Cornucopiæ Floræ Gieſſenſis &c; Gieſſæ 1624 in 4to.

JUNIUS (ADRIAN) born at Horn in Holland [A] the firſt of July 1511, Errors of Moreri, and of a Tranſlator of Thuanus.

[A] Junius . . . born at Horn in Holland.] Moreri, in the article of Adrian Junius, ſays, that vulgarly his name was Jonghe or Du John; and afterwards when he ſpeaks of Francis Junius Profeſſor at Leyden, he only makes his vulgar name to be Jonghe. But this is no ways accurate; for, in the firſt place he ſhould have ſaid de Jonghe, and have ſaid it only with regard to Adrian Junius; ſince it is falſe that his name, in the Flemiſh tongue, could have been indifferently either de Jonghe or du Jon. Secondly, it is falſe that the vulgar name of Francis Junius was any other but Du John. It is aſſerted in the tranſlation of Thuanus (1), that Horn the native place of Adrian Junius, is a village of Gueldres. This is a notorious blunder which I do not find in the Francfort edition of Thuanus, printed in 1625. If the tranſlator made uſe of an edition in which was ſuch an error, he may be excuſed; but here follows another particular that deſerves cenſure. He ſays that Junius, having left Haerlem on account of the ſiege, went to Armuyden near Mildeburg, where having employed, to no purpoſe, his utmoſt care and diligence, in order to give redreſs to the calamities of that beſieged city, the change of air was ſo pernicious to him &c. It is pretty plain that this beſieged city does not refer either to Middleburg, or to Armuyden, but to Haerlem. Now it is abſolutely falſe to aſſert that Junius thought in any manner to relieve that beſieged city, when he was at Armuyden; he not going thither till after the taking of Haerlem. Ad Armuydam juxta Mildeburgum in Mattiacis ſe contulerat, ubi cum fruſtra conſilio & diligentia ſua concivibus laborantibus opem ferre conatus eſſet, ex cœli mutatione . . . in letalem morbum incidit (2). Now Thuanus cannot be well excuſed for this miſtake; for though a perſon who writes in Latin, is not obliged to clear a period according to the ſtrictneſs of the French Grammar, he yet would never have expreſſed himſelf as he did, had he imagined that Junius did not go into Zeland, till after the taking

1511 [B], was one of the moſt learned men of the age in which he lived. He was ſon to a burgomaſter of great merit [C], and ſtudied firſt at Haerlem, afterwards at Louvain and Paris, and laſtly at Bologne in Italy, where he was admitted Doctor of Phyſic. After his return to his native country, he went to England in the year 1543 (a), and was Phyſician to the Duke of Norfolk there, and afterwards to a great Lady. He compoſed books in that country, and among others a Greek and Latin Lexicon, to which he had added above 6500 words. He dedicated it to young King Edward in the year 1548; and becauſe he gave him the title of King, he was proſecuted for it a long time after at the Court of Rome. He was ſtrongly affected with this proſecution; for we find by ſome of his Letters (b) to Lindanus Biſhop of Ruremond, and to Cardinal Granvelle, that he paſſionately wiſhed to be freed from the ignominy with which he found himſelf branded, ever ſince the Cenſors had put his works in the Index expurgatorius. For this purpoſe he wrote, by the advice of Arias Montanus, to the Pope; and prepared an apology, where, at the ſame time that he proteſted he had always been a good Catholic, he ſhewed that he was under an indiſpenſible neceſſity of beſtowing the title of King on Edward (c). Being a very good Poet he publiſhed in 1554, an Epithalamium on the marriage of Philip II with Queen Mary (d). This perhaps would have been a conſiderable fortune to him, had England continued in a peaceable ſtate; but he left it during the troubles [D], and confined himſelf in Horn; but the King of Denmark made him ſoon leave it, in order to make him tutor to the Prince his ſon (e). Junius not being able to reconcile himſelf [E] either to the climate or the genius of the inhabitants, left the country ſo very abruptly, that he did not ſo much as take leave of the King. It is very probable that this was in 1564 (f). He ſettled in Haerlem [F]; practiſed Phyſic there, married and was principal of the college or great ſchool in that town. The States of Holland gave him a commiſſion in order for writing the Hiſtory of the Province; a taſk he would have performed worthily, and with greater accuracy than he has done, could he have given the finiſhing ſtroke to his work, which was publiſhed after his death under the title of Batavia (g). When the Spaniards had beſieged the city of Haerlem, he found means to get out of it, in order to go to the Prince of Orange, who wanted to make uſe of his preſcriptions. The city being taken in 1573, his Library was of Haerlem. It cannot be ſaid that he ſpeaks there either of the ſiege of Middleburg or of Armuyden, ſince thoſe two towns were not beſieged whilſt Junius lived in Zeland. Melchior Adam has copied Thuanus's error. Theſe ought to have known that our Phyſician made ſome ſtay at Delft, after the taking of Haerlem, before he went into Zeland.]

[B] The firſt of July 1511.] This we are told in the Life of Junius prefixed to his epiſtles; vitam hanc orditur Kalendis Junii, anni 1511. Some pages after we read, that he died die 16 Junii anno 1575, cum EXPLEVISSET annum ætatis 63 qui magnus climacterinus annus Medicis vocatur. i. e. "He died the 16th "of June 1575, when he had compleated his ſixty "third year, which Phyſicians call the great Climac- "teric." By this we refute Thuanus and Melchior Adam, who ſay that he died in his Climacterical year: but as this Life of Junius is not very accurate, and as the edition of the epiſtles (3) to which it is prefixed, is ſaid to have been printed in 1552, tho' it includes the author's epitaph who died in 1575, and ſome of his letters dated in 1574, I would not too rigorouſly condemn the chronology of Meurſius, who fixes the birth of this learned man to the year 1512 (4). The reaſon why I ſay his life (5) is not accurate is, that beſides the two dates abovecited, I there find his epitaph which ſays that he lived ſixty three years. If the author of that life thought the epitaph was right, he did wrong to fix Junius's birth-day to the 1ſt of July 1511, and to aſſert that, the ſixteenth of June 1575, he had compleated the ſixty third of his age. On the other ſide, when a man is full ſixty four years of age within a fortnight, that writer would be extremely negligent who ſhould ſay that he is ſixty three of age, or is paſt his ſixty third year. But whether there be much or little negligence in this, it is very certain, that Moreri, Freherus, Melchior Adam, Sir Thomas Pope Blunt, and thoſe who fix Junius's birth to the year 1513, are thereby refuted. The edition of his letters is not very correct; and beſides they are not ranked in the order in which they were writ; and no care has been taken to ſearch for and ſupply the dates when they are wanting, which is very often the caſe. Theſe two defects are but too common in collections of that kind.

[C] He was ſon to a Burgomaſter of great merit.] Our Junius's father had not only been Secretary, and afterwards five times Burgomaſter of Horn, but alſo twice deputed to the Court of Denmark, and once to Sweden and other places. He was a ſcholar; and wrote a Latin work which has not been printed, containing an account of the origin and increaſe of Horn (6).

[D] He left it during the troubles.] I have followed, for want of a better guide, the Life of Junius prefixed to his Letters, although I am ſenſible that it will not be accurate to make this author live in England, from the firſt time he went thither, till the troubles that broke out after the marriage of Mary with Philip II; for I find ſome of his letters (7) dated from Haerlem or Horn in 1552, and the beginning of 1554, which ſpeak of a man that led a pretty ſedentary life. Many of thoſe who have writ Lives were in great want of good advice.

[F] He ſettled in Haerlem.] The author of his life has not well diſtinguiſhed the periods. He does not ſettle him in Haerlem or marry him till after his return from Copenhagen. Now I have proved (10) that he returned from thence in 1564; and it appears from a letter (11) which he wrote in 1559, that he had then been ſettled ſome time in Haerlem, and was married to a handſome young Gentlewoman, who had brought him a good fortune. The dedication of his treatiſe de Anno, that of the treatiſe de Coma, and that Animadverſorum, are dated from that city anno 1556.

was plundered, wherein he had left a great many works which had coſt him much labour, and whereby he had hoped to eternize himſelf. A circumſtance that added to his affliction was, they were almoſt fit for the preſs. He went to Zealand, where, by the Prince's recommendation, a public ſalary was decreed him, for practiſing Phyſic in Middleburg; but the air of the country did not agree in any manner with his health; and he there contracted ſome diſtempers which, added to the grief which he felt for the loſs of his Library, brought him to his end the 16th of June 1575, he being threeſcore and four years old wanting a few days. His body was carried from Armuyden to Middleburg, where he was honourably buried by his eldeſt ſon, who alſo wrote his epitaph [G]. He is author of ſeveral books [H]. I ſhall make ſome mention of them in the laſt remark. There was a deſign to give him a Profeſſorſhip in Leyden [I], the Univerſity whereof was but juſt riſing when he died. I have not yet had time to examine fully whether he at laſt turned Proteſtant [K].

(b) Epiſt. pag. 387.

It appears by one of his Letters (b), that he flew into a violent paſſion, upon his hearing that one of his pupils had accuſed him of ordering his boarders not to go to Church. So far from this, he proteſts that he obliged them to go on holidays; and laid a heavy forfeit on thoſe who ſhould neglect on theſe occaſions. We ſee, in another place (i), that he complains of his poverty; and that being over head and ears in debt, and obliged to equip himſelf, he had not a penny in the world.

I omit a very great number of authors which he has illuſtrated with notes, as Nonius, Marcellus, Plautus, Seneca, Pliny (15), Virgil, and Horace (16). He had employed a great deal of time on Suidas; and he even intended to dedicate it to the ſon of the Prince of Orange, as he tells an Engliſh Nobleman (17), whoſe good offices he implores with reſpect to the Prince, in order to get a preſent beforehand; for our Junius underſtood as well as any man, how to make advantages of a Dedication.

I have ſomething to obſerve concerning three of his works. I. The author of his Life ſays, that the Animadverſorum Libri ſex was loſt at the taking of Haerlem. I do not very well underſtand what he means; they being publiſhed by the author himſelf, and dedicated to Anthony Perenot, Biſhop of Arras, in the year 1556. Gruterus has inſerted them in Vol. IV of his Theſaurus Criticus (*). II. With regard to the Appendix ad Epitheta Textoris, it may be affirmed that Junius treated this ſubject with much greater erudition than Textor, who committed ſome very groſs faults in it, ſome whereof are found in Junius's Letters (18). He looked upon it as a moſt uſeful and at the ſame time a very laborious work (19). III. His Nomenclator is an excellent work in its kind. The choice of expreſſions and terms in eight languages, proves at the ſame time the learning and indefatigable patience of our Junius. It is ſaid (20) that he was maſter of eight languages, Greek, Latin, Italian, French, Spaniſh, German, Engliſh and Flemiſh. His travels had been of great ſervice to him on that account. I find he had been in France, Italy, Germany, and England; but not in Spain, as is affirmed by Valerius Andreas (21), Moreri and Freherus. Colomeſius has publiſhed (22) a little ſtory that Iſaac Voſſius told him, which would prove that Junius did not neglect any thing that might contribute to the improvement of his Nomenclator, and that he condeſcended to drink with Carmen, in order to learn the terms uſed by them in their buſineſs. I believe it appears from one of his Letters (23), that Junius would not have thought it a great crime, to have drunk a great quantity, if he could do it without intoxicating himſelf.

When I ſay that Junius's Nomenclator is an excellent work in its kind, I will not deny but that there are ſome groſs errors in it (24); all I mean is, that the good things in it very much exceed what is commonly publiſhed on that ſubject. Now in works of this kind, in which it is impoſſible not to commit ſome errors, perfection does not require an author to be free from all faults. It is in theſe as in man; the moſt perfect is he who has the leaſt defects.

I ſhall obſerve on this occaſion, that nothing cauſes a greater obſcurity in books, than the not taking the pains to add the proper ſupplements to what is taken out of other authors. A thouſand particulars are clear in the originals, which become quite unintelligible, when jejunely tranſplanted into another place.

[K] I have not yet had time to examine fully, whether he laſt turned Proteſtant.] The circumſtance which keeps me in ſuſpence, is a Letter (28) which he wrote to the Biſhop of Haerlem in 1573, to inform him of the endeavours he had uſed, in order to keep that Prelate's houſe from being plundered. He tells him that he preſerved this truſt as long as he poſſibly could; and that he would not have abandoned it to the plunderers, had he not been overpowered; a piſtol having been put to his breaſt, and himſelf threatned with immediate death. He adds, that as theſe wicked attempts were carried on with impunity, he found himſelf obliged to deſire leave to quit the city, which was granted him. It is certain that he complained in very ſtrong terms to the Magiſtrates, of the violence that had been done to him (29); and told them, that the Spaniards would hardly proceed to ſuch violent methods, were they maſters of the city. What I do not very well underſtand is, his telling this Prelate, that, in order to preſerve his houſe, he had been forced to drive the French out of it, who profaned all things with a cruel rage, excludendo barbaram & crudelem Gallorum omnia profanantium rabiem (a). I do not look upon his being called in the Index Librorum prohibitorum & expurgandorum (30) a Calviniſt, and an author damnatæ memoriæ, as a convincing proof of his being a Proteſtant.

[A] We ſhall add ſome particulars to this article of Mr. Bayle.] Adrian Junius had a great memory, which enabled him to treaſure up a vaſt deal of learning; for beſides his ſkill in Phyſic, which was his profeſſion, he was an Hiſtorian, Poet, Philoſopher; and underſtood perfectly eight languages, as has been ſeen (†). His works make up twenty four articles, as appears by the catalogue of them (‡). Huetius ſpeaks very unfavourably of our Junius's tranſlations in general. "Although, ſays that learned writer, Junius was well "ſkilled in Philoſophy, he yet did little ſervice to the "public by his tranſlations, moſt of which are bad: "for he often miſtakes his authors, and conſequently "tranſlates them falſely. JUNIUS (a) (FRANCIS) Profeſſor of Divinity (b) at Leyden, was born at Bourges the 1ſt of May 1545. He was of a noble family [A]. His father, who was of the long Robe, was expoſed to many perſecutions, on account of his being ſuſpected to be a Lutheran [B]. He expoſed his wife to moſt horrid calumnies, by her proving with child,

[A] He was of a noble family.] WILLIAM du Jon his grandfather, Lord of Boſſardiniere near Iſſoudun, was ennobled for his good ſervices in the expedition of Navarre, when endeavours were uſed to reſtore John d'Albret, diſpoſſeſſed unjuſtly of his Kingdom by Ferdinand of Arragon. He alſo had been in the King's houſhold (1). He left three ſons, the youngeſt of whom named DENYS, or Dionyſius, ſtudied Civil-Law, and had a Diploma at Toulouſe. He made no progreſs in his ſtudies (2), for being very courageous, he always engaged in the quarrels of the ſtudents. In ſhort, he was a mighty Duelliſt. He was appointed King's Counſellor at Bourges, by way of recompence for a bold action he had performed. This action will be ſeen in the following remark. He had nine children, one whereof was our Francis Junius (3).

[B] His father .... was expoſed to many perſecutions, on account of his being ſuſpected to be a Lutheran.] The Father Guardian or Superior of the Franciſcans of Iſſoudun preached in ſo impudent a manner againſt Margaret Queen of Navarre, Ducheſs of Berri, and ſiſter of Francis I, as to ſay that, becauſe ſhe was a Lutheran, ſhe deſerved to be tied up in a ſack and toſt into the river. The Magiſtrates of the place exhorted him not to be thus wanting in the reſpect which was due to that Princeſs; but he laughed at their advice, and continued to ſermonize in the ſame ſtrain; upon which informations were taken out againſt him, and ſent to the King. This Monarch being reſolved to inflict on him the ſame puniſhment, to which he had judged the Queen, gave orders to have that Monk in queſtion brought before him; but the Queen of Navarre, interceding for the guilty Friar, prevailed ſo far as to have the puniſhment mitigated. The difficulty was, how to ſeize upon this Friar, he having the common people on his ſide; ſo that the Magiſtrates of Iſſoudun were afraid of executing his Majeſty's order. Denys du Jon, who was returning from the ſchools where he had fought ſo often, declared, that if the King would give him a commiſſion to ſeize the perſon of the Monk, he would execute it punctually. Accordingly, ſuch a commiſſion having been iſſued in his name, he put himſelf at the head of the ſheriff's Officers; and in ſpite of the oppoſition made by the common people, he forced out of his monaſtery the Friar, who was ſent to the gallies for two years. Du Jon ingratiated himſelf indeed, by this action, into the favour of Francis I, and of the Ducheſs of Berry; but he incurred the hatred of the people and the Franciſcans, and drew upon himſelf a numberleſs multitude of calumnies, and menaces, and involved him in proſecutions, which at laſt ended in the cruel maſſacre committed on his perſon. Hæc prima fuit actio, quæ in gratiam Regis, ſororiſque Reginæ inſinuavit patrem: ſed apud illam inconſultam plebeculam & Franciſcanorum ordinem odia perpetua conciliavit: indigniſſimaſque calumnias, minas, criminationes, perſecutiones, damna, cruentam denique cædem patri apportavit (4). He was accuſed of being a Lutheran, and his ſervant-maid was ſuborned, to atteſt that he did not keep faſt-days. Et Franciſcanorum arte, & plebis imprudentia odioque maximo preſſus eſt ſub religionis ſpecie & Lutheraniſmi .... accuſatus, ſubornata ad eam rem ancilla quæ domi ſerviverat. Ea patrem à ſe viſum, quum diebus vetitis carnes ederet, pro teſtimonio dicebat falſo, ut matrem ſæpe audivi confirmantem (5). Junius fled away, being not willing to venture himſelf among people who were ſo much governed by their paſſions. His goods and chattles were all ſeized; and the Queen of Navarre was obliged to ſupply him, for almoſt a twelvemonth, wherewith to ſubſiſt. However, the accuſations, by the King's authority, were at laſt brought to nothing, upon which du Jon got a Counſellor's place, &c. Liberatus ab accuſatione pater auctoritate Regis, patrium ſolum repetit, atque immigrat in Biturigum metropolin, ubi cum laude ad exitum uſque vitæ Conſiliarii Regii & pro Tribuno militum honoribus à Rege collatis defunctus eſt: præter alia commoda honoraria, quæ à Regina ſorore illius & Biturigum Duce acceperat (6). i. e. "His "father being freed from the accuſation by the autho-"rity of his Majeſty, returns to the place of his birth, "and goes to Bourges the capital of Berry, where he "acquitted himſelf, till he died, with honour, in the "employments of Counſellor and Colonel, which the "King had beſtowed upon him; excluſive of ſeveral "other honorary advantages that were conferred on "him by the Queen, that Monarch's ſiſter, and the "Duke of Berry." Here follows the manner of his being killed. On Corpus-Chriſti day the Roman Catholics of Iſſoudun, regardleſs of the treaty of peace that had been concluded juſt before, committed a thouſand outrages againſt the Proteſtants. The King then iſſued out a commiſſion to Denys du Jon to enquire into that ſedition, and puniſh the authors of it. Du Jon went to Iſſoudun accompanied only by three Sheriff's Officers; and poſted the reſt in various places before he entered into the city, it being neceſſary to act with prudence in ſo delicate an affair. However, his precautions were of no ſervice to him; the common people gueſſed the motive of his coming, upon which they ſeized the gates, and beſieged the Commiſſioner's houſe. They entered it by force, killed du Jon, threw his body out of the window, dragged it through the ſtreets, flung it to the dogs, and publickly forbid (7) it burial (8). The King's Council conceived a due indignation againſt this inſolence, and gave orders for demoliſhing the walls of Iſſoudun; but Cipierre and ſome other Lords cauſed this arret to be changed; and that chiefly becauſe the murdered Commiſſioner had been ſuſpected of being a Lutheran above twenty four years. The widow of the deceaſed, by her attempting to revenge this murder, incurred the hatred of many perſons, and conſumed her eſtate. Hæc cædes conſilium Regis commovit plurimum: & decretum de labefactandis muris totius oppidi in eo factum propter atrocitatem ſceleris, & periculoſiſſimum exemplum illius. child, at a time when the world imagined that he had fled from his country [C]; and it was not known that he had come once ſecretly to ſee her. Our Francis Junius was carefully educated, and became a very learned man, to which his innate modeſty, added to great ambition [D], did not a little contribute. He began to ſtudy the Law under Hugo Donellus at thirteen years of age. Some years after he was ſent to Lyons, in order to meet the Embaſſador whom the King of France was ſending to Conſtantinople; but as the Embaſſador was ſet out before Junius's arrival, he ſtopt at Lyons, and applied himſelf to ſtudy with incredible vigour. Bartholomew Aneau [E], who was principal of the College in that city, gave him excellent inſtructions with regard to the right method of ſtudying (). The young man ſaw himſelf expoſed to two temptations of a very

I do not ſuggeſt to any one here, to wonder at the evil effects of a religious zeal. Thoſe who are poſſeſſed with it, muſt approve of murders, and condemn the conduct of a woman, who deſires to have the murderers of her huſband brought to condign puniſhment. But I beg my readers to attend to one thing. Religion, which is univerſally looked upon as the firmeſt ſupport of the Supreme Authority, and which would really be ſo, if it were rightly underſtood and well practiſed, is commonly the thing that moſt enervates that very authority. Nothing could be more juſt than the arret of Francis I againſt the preacher of Iſſoudun, for his inſolence in treating ſo ignominiouſly in the pulpit, his Sovereign's own ſiſter. Nevertheleſs, not one Magiſtrate dares to execute the orders of his King againſt that ſeditious wretch; and when a Gentleman has the courage to put them in execution, he makes himſelf obnoxious to a thouſand perſecutions; and incurs ſuch odium, that his murderers are openly protected. The Queen of Navarre was the firſt who adviſed the Gentleman in queſtion to leave his country, ſince the putting in execution his Prince's very juſt orders would make him be the object of the hatred of bigots. Felicius certe utiliuſque politicos honores geſturo, & Remp. adminiſtraturo, ſi poſt tam forte auſum honeſta & cauta migratione, quam ſæpe fieri Navarrena Regina & nonnulli Proceres cupiverunt, ut alibi Reip. inſerviret pater, ſibi proſpexiſſet (10): an evident proof that the Court did not believe itſelf powerful enough to protect its good ſervants when perſecuted by the Eccleſiaſtics. It is generally ſaid, that the Goſpel Miniſtry eſt ipſis Angelis tremendum, (is formidable even to Angels); and we may add, & ipſis quoque Regibus, (and likewiſe to Kings themſelves). Whoever reads the Hiſtory of the Church of Rome attentively, will find that the greateſt Princes in the world had more reaſon to dread the paſſions which devotees raiſe, than the arms of Infidels; thus that which ought to form the ſupport of the State, and its grandeur and Majeſty, is frequently the mightieſt obſtacle, which Sovereigns meet with in the execution of their orders (11).

(10) Idem, ibid. pag. 6. col. 2.

(11) Compare what has been ſaid in the article ABDAS, remark [B].

[C] . . . . he expoſed his wife to moſt horrid calumnies, by her proving with child, at a time when the world imagined he had fled his country.] It is imprudent for a woman to venture the being ſo, when her huſband is a fugitive; for if he ſhould die in his abſence, before her delivery, and without owning himſelf the father of the child (three things that might very eaſily happen) how could a woman clear her reputation with regard to the public? But farther, are we to conſider as nothing the furniſhing a handle to ſlander, as du Jon's wife did? It will be anſwered, that it is very eaſy for a perſon to ſay this, when he ſpeaks of it cooly, and does not put himſelf in the place of perſons in love. After ſome months abſence, their flames rage to ſuch a degree, that no conſideration can check them. paſſion hurries them along, and they will not liſten to the voice of reaſon:

" Nor reins, nor curbs, nor threatning cries they fear,

However this be, our du Jon's mother was ſlandered, which pierced her to the heart. *Profugus pater clam ad matrem ſemel redierat, hinc gravida facta mater proſcindebatur à vulgo, tanquam ſi proſtituta fuiſſet pudicitia illius. (13) Junius, in Vita ſua, pag. 7. col. 1.

[D] His innate modeſty, added to great ambition.] Theſe two paſſions do not ſeem to be formed for one another, and yet they ſometimes are united. Junius is an example of this. He confeſſes that, from his childhood, he had an immoderate deſire of being honoured and applauded; and that it was intolerable to him to hear others praiſed. Natura me puerum ad honoris & laudis appetentiam plus ſatis accendente. Sic enim mala radix illa τῆς φιλοτιμίας in me germinabat, ut nec alienam laudem iſta ætate æquo animo ferre poſſem miſer, nec in mea exiſtimatione illa conquieſcere, quam mihi conciliabam pertinaciſſima diligentia. On the other hand, he confeſſes that he was of ſo fearful a nature, and ſo baſhful, that even when he was near fifty he could not ſpeak to his own wife without bluſhing; and that he ſcarce dared to command his own ſervants. Pudor ſummus, qui me ad hanc uſque ætatem ſic preſſit, ut ruſticus magis ad omnia quam urbanus merito haberi poſſim. . . . Quid dicam niſi impudentem ferme pudorem eſſe, qui me tantopere impeditum diſtinet, ut vix ſine pudore uxori res vulgareis enunciem, vix jam domi ſervitio imperem. He declares that this baſhfulneſs had been of great advantage to him; becauſe the diffidence he had of himſelf made him apply with much greater aſſiduity, in order to improve by what he both heard and ſaw. Ex pudore hæc conſequuta ſunt inde à puero quod mihi ſemper ſim diffiſus, quod aliorum factis audiendis, ſermonibus obſervandis & advertendis in uſum meum ſtuderim (14). He declares, that he would not have informed his readers of his infirmity, had he not thought that it would be a moſt uſeful leſſon, with reſpect to modeſty, for youth. Hoc eo libentiùs prædico de infirmitate mea, ut juventus ab exemplo meo præceptum hauriat ταπεινοφροσύνης atque modeſtiæ, ut certum fructum peritiæ certo judicio aſſequatur. Id enim teſtor, nihil mihi ſecundum benedictionem Dei tam commodaviſſe in rebus omnibus, quàm illam de me ipſo diffidentiam ex conſcientia infirmitatis & pudoris mei, & ſtudioſam aliorum, quibuſcunque adfui, obſervantiam. One cannot too much applaud the modeſty, and that rare humility, which makes a man diſtruſt his own abilities; but it is very certain that it is a very bad quality for one, who would make his fortune in the world; and I would adviſe any father, who is deſirous that his children ſhould attain to dignities, to inſpire them with vanity and preſumption rather than a diſtruſt of their merit. Junius is perhaps the only man, who with reſpect to worldly advantages, was not the worſe for his modeſty. I don't pretend to eſtabliſh it as a maxim, that arrogance is always uſeful; it ſometimes ruining young people, and preventing their riſing in the world; I ſpeak of this only in general, without having any regard to exceptions.

[E] Bartholomew Aneau.] I have ſpoke elſewhere (15) of his Commentary on Alciatus's Emblems. He was called in Latin Annulus or Anulus. He was born in Bourges and publiſhed ſeveral books (16). He loſt his life in a miſerable manner in the tumult on a religious account, wherein Junius had like to have loſt his life. His wife would have met with the ſame fate, had not the Prevot of Lyons ſaved her, by throwing her into priſon (17).

a very different kind, that of love and that of impiety. He reſiſted the firſt with great vigour, he giving a ſtout box on the ear to a girl who offered to careſs him [F]; but he was ſo far overpowered by the ſophiſtry of a Libertine, that he became a perfect Atheiſt [G], after liſtening to him ſome days. However, he did not continue long in that unhappy condition; a tumult on account of Religion, which obliged him to fly to ſave his life, gave him an opportunity of returning to his firſt faith. His father recalled him to Bourges; and diſcovering ſome of the principles which his ſon had imbibed, he gave him excellent inſtructions; and brought him, in an eaſy and inſenſible manner, to the peruſal of the new Teſtament. The firſt words (c), which Junius fell upon there, affected him ſo ſtrongly [H], that he ſoon had a diſtaſte for every thing wherein piety was not concerned. He went, in the beginning of the civil wars, to Geneva, to ſtudy the Languages there. As he had brought but little money with him, and did not receive any remittances, he was reduced to extreme neceſſity [I]. However, he at laſt got wherewithal

[F] He gave a ſtout box on the ear to a girl who offered to careſs him.] This is an incident, that is much more to be wondered at than the action of Theagenes (11); this being hiſtorical, whereas that of Theagenes is a mere fiction. Junius was ſo much devoted to his ſtudies that he little thought of making love, upon which he was cenſured for ſhewing ſo little gallantry, and aſſured that he would never learn good breeding and politeneſs, unleſs he got him a miſtreſs. But as theſe exhortations had no influence upon his conduct, ſome of his acquaintance expoſed him to the careſſes of three or four wenches, who attacked him in an impudent manner; flinging themſelves upon him, and uſing their utmoſt endeavours to get the better of his modeſty. At laſt he grew out of all patience, and gave one of them a box on the ear, which occaſioned a great noiſe in the houſe. The girl who had been thus aſſaulted, perceiving by the air of our young man, that he had not given the blow in jeſt, began to cry and roar; which made the people laugh at her and at Junius alſo, a circumſtance that made him odious to many. Here follow his own words: Dies & noctes appetebant canes illæ promiſcuè, neſcium quid ſibi vellent, & gravitatis honeſtatiſque illius, quam in domo paterna videram, ſubinde recordantem. Neque id ſeorſim tentabant ſingulæ, verumetiam ternæ aut quaternæ ſimul conſertis manibus in me irruebant immodeſtiſſimè, ut perducto ad ſuam impuritatem animo meo de ſpoliis pudoris mei triumpharent. Tandem verò adeò me puduit illarum impudentiæ, ut quum una multis ſpectantibus me amatoriè eſſet adorſa palpo, ego contrà colaphum gravem ei impegerim: quem illa addubitans utram in partem acciperet, defixis oculis attenta reſpexit ad me, aliquantiſper obſervans aliquam mei animi ſignificationem; ut autem rem ſeriam à me eſſe vidit, tum illa vociferationibus & ejulatibus implevit domum, omniumque riſum imprudens in ſeſe, ſtultorum odia in me concitavit (19). Junius was ſo tired with theſe temptations, that he a thouſand times had formed a reſolution to return to his father's, without taking leave of the people of the houſe, where his chaſtity met with ſuch frequent attacks; but he was afraid of their reſentment, and the ſlanders they might employ, in order to injure him with regard to his own family.

[G] He was ſo far overpowered by the ſophiſtry of a Libertine, that he became a perfect Atheiſt.] Junius, by the advice of Bartholomew Aneau, had read Cicero de Legibus, and made collections out of it. During this interval, he was viſited by a certain perſon, who maintained with ſo many arguments what Cicero alledges concerning Epicurus's rejecting a Providence, that he gave way the more eaſily to that impious doctrine, as it was ſpoke of every day at table, [and all the houſe rung with it. Iſta horribili impietate conſtrata erat quotidie menſa, perſonabat domus, circumſtrepebant omnia aureis meas, adeo ut jamque ad alia omnia obſurdeſcerem. Nam quum omnibus horis aliquid atrociter fieri videmus, aut audimus, inquit Tullius, etiam qui natura mitiſſimi ſumus, aſſiduitate moleſtiarum ſenſum omnem humanitatis ex animis amittimus: quum impie fieri aut dici, pietatis ſenſum (20) ... *Memini, quum libros M. [I] He was reduced to extreme neceſſity.] He gives a long detail of this, whereof I will obſerve only the two following things. Being poſſeſſed, at the approach of winter, of only a little doublet and a little cloak, he reſolved to imitate Cleanthes, that is, to earn ſomething by the labour of his hands. Certum deliberatumque erat hebdomade proxima ſequutura ... alternos dies in egerenda terra ad foſſam urbis, & in ſtudiis conſumere, Cleanthis exemplo, ut levarem inopiam meam (24). He was reſolved to put himſelf out to hire, and to work as a pioneer in the trenches of Geneva; but met with a young countryman of his, who gave him ſome aſſiſtance. However, as he ſtood longer in need of his friend, than he had flattered himſelf he ſhould, he was afraid of growing troubleſome, and thence was prompted to make but one ſlender meal every day. He continued this abſtemious courſe four months, whereby he became ſo weak and thin, that he ſcarce was able to bear his ſhirt on, and would have died in a ſhort time, had not his friends been urgent with him to eat a little more. *Ultro ad menſes quatuor jejunium ipſe indixi mihi, & horam prandii in ambulatione, legens & memoriam colens, meditans, orans occupavi: veſpere autem cœna frugali uſus ſum, plurimum ſorbens bina ova, & mediocrem vini cyathum hauriens. withal to free himſelf from his miſery, and to pay his debts; and hearing of his father's tragical end (d), he reſolved to gain his livelihood by inſtructing youth. He accordingly followed that way of life in Geneva, till ſuch time as he was ſent into the Low-Countries (e), to be Miniſter of the Walloon Church in Antwerp. He diſcharged the miniſterial functions in the midſt of ſeveral dangers; for although he oppoſed the indiſcreet zeal of thoſe who, without any lawful authority, broke to pieces images, and plundered the Churches; he yet was conſidered as the fomenter on thoſe occaſions, for which reaſon attempts were frequently made to impriſon him; but he always was ſo happy as to get timely notice, by which means he avoided being taken. It was thought proper that he ſhould go into the territory of Limburg, where he continued his miniſterial functions with great ſucceſs; till ſuch time as the dangers to which he found himſelf expoſed, made the Magiſtrates reſolve to adviſe him to retire into Germany. The curioſity of a ſilly old man deſerves to be told [L], it being perfectly well adapted to ſhew the knavery of perſecutors and the ſtupidity of the common people. Junius was received very graciouſly at Heidelberg by the Elector Frederic III, and went and viſited his mother at Bourges, whence being returned to the Palatinate, he was there Miniſter of a ſmall Church (f). Some time after the Elector ſent him to the Prince of Orange's army, during the unfortunate expedition of the year 1568. He was Chaplain to this Prince till the troops had got back into Germany; when he returned to his Church in the Palatinate, and there acquitted himſelf of his eccleſiaſtical functions till the year 1573, after which the Elector Palatine ſent for him to Heidelberg, to tranſlate the old Teſtament (g). He was ſent to Neuſtad in 1578, and at the end of fourteen months to Otterburg, where he ſtaid eighteen months; after which he returned to Neuſtad, and read public Lectures, till Prince Caſimir, Adminiſtrator of the Electorate, ſent for him to Heidelberg, to be Profeſſor of Divinity. He returned to France with the Duke of Bouillon, and paid his reſpects to Henry IV, who ſent him back to Germany to execute ſome affairs. He thought proper to go through Holland, before he went to give an account of his commiſſion to Henry IV; and being invited to be Divinity Profeſſor at Leyden, he accepted of the offer, having firſt obtained the conſent of the French Embaſſador (h). He diſcharged the duties of that employment with great ability, till the year 1602, when he was ſnatched away by the plague. He had borne an averſion to women; but, as he himſelf confeſſes, heaven puniſhed him for this, by his marrying four wives [L]. He left

[K] The curioſity of a ſilly old man deſerves to be told.] He had been made to believe that Junius an heretical Preacher had cloven feet; and was not undeceived till after he had ſurveyed him from head to foot. This was in preſence of a great number of people, who were met in hopes of hearing a diſpute between Junius and a Franciſcan. The time and place for the conference had been pitched upon; but the Franciſcan had gone back, upon pretence of his having forgot ſomething. I had heard ſuch ſtories a hundred times, but never found them ſupported by ſo authentic a teſtimony, and that too in print. For this reaſon I will here tranſcribe Junius's own words. Ridiculum eſt quod dicam, ſed tamen indicium horum ſimplicitatis, & mendaciſſimæ illorum impudentiæ. Quum in campo eſſemus, Franciſcani illius adventum exſpectantes, vir quidam ſenex frequentiam illam maximam quæ tum aderat perrumpens, copiam ſibi fieri videndi mei poſtulavit. Audito ſtrepitu rogabam quid rei eſſet. Cognito hominem eſſe mei videndi cupientem, monui ut daretur homini ad veniendum locus. Tum ille demiſſo vultu inde a pedibus ad verticem uſque obſervans diligentiſſime conſtitutionem meam, erupit in hæc verba: ebo, jamjam video non eſſe id verum, quod mihi de te fuerat enunciatum. Me autem dicente, quid ergo illud eſt? tibi, inquit, pedes fiſſos eſſe (26). i. e. "The incident I ſhall here "relate is ridiculous, but it is an example of the ſim-"plicity and moſt lying impudence of thoſe perſons. "When we were come to the place of controverſy, "waiting for the arrival of that Franciſcan, a cer-"tain old man forcing his way through the great "croud, deſired to ſee me. I now have ocular demonſtration, that "what was told me concerning you is not true; and "upon my enquiring of him what this was: I was "told, replied he, that you had cloven feet."

[L] He had borne an averſion to women; but, as he himſelf confeſſes, Heaven puniſhed him for this by his marrying four wives.] I ſhould be afraid of ill tranſlating the following words, and I therefore will only tranſcribe them. In conjugiis varie me duriterque exercuit Dominus. Nam quatuor uxores duxi hactenus: addeo me (qui prius propter canum impiarum ſcelera a fœminis abhorrebam, & functionis meæ ſtudio conjugium refugiebam pervicaciſſime) caſtigavit Dominus; præpoſterum judicium meum tacite exprobravit, & perjucunda optimarum fideliſſimarumque conjugum conſuetudine evicit peccatum, indignamque de ſexu fœmineo toto opinionem meam (27). He obſerves that he loſt his firſt wife by the ignorance of a midwife, who, in delivering her of twins, ſpoilt her uterus (28). Harum primam injuria obſtetricis e vita ſuſtulit, quum ita corruptus in obſtetricatu fuiſſet illius uterus, ut annos amplius ſeptem indeſinente ſanguinis defluvio afflicta ſit atque exhauſta, incredibili cruciatu ipſius & labore meo (29). The conſequences of this delivery were very grievous, not only for the wife, but alſo for the huſband, viz. ſhe being continually afflicted with a bloody flux for above ſeven years. His ſecond wife died, being with child, of a fever the fifth day. The third died of a dropſy; and the fourth was alive when he wrote this, about the year 1592, but afterwards died of the plague.

He quitted letters for the ſword, at the ſollicitation of his uncle John Cornput (31), who made him lieutenant of his company. He died in Gertrudenberg. He had publiſhed, in the Flemiſh tongue, an apology for the ſpeech of Sir Dudley Carlton, King James's Embaſſador. This was writ by way of anſwer to James Taurin, an Arminian Miniſter at Utrecht, who had refuted (32) that ſpeech. He left a ſon named FRANCIS JUNIUS, born at Embden the 20th of September 1624, who was Law Profeſſor in the univerſity of Groningen (33). II. An analyſis of the Pentateuch: An explication of the prophecies of Ezekiel, Daniel and Jonas. III. Sacred parallels, and notes on the Revelations, and the epiſtle of St. Jude. IV. He alſo wrote criticiſms on profane authors, he publiſhing notes on Manilius and Tully's epiſtles, as alſo on Tertullian, and a work on George Codinus Curopalates. He likewiſe gave ſome verſions from the Latin; that of Bodin's Demonomania, John du Tillet, Arnauld's plea againſt the Jeſuits, &c. He drew up an anſwer (35) in French to Francis Charron's Trois veritez contre tous Athées &c. i. e. "Three Truths, againſt all Atheiſts &c. I muſt not forget that he underſtood Greek and the Oriental tongues. He was the firſt who publiſhed George Codinus's book de Officialibus Palatii Conſtantinopolitani, & Officiis magnæ Eccleſiæ, to which he added a Latin tranſlation and notes. He publiſhed two editions of this work, the firſt in 1588. to which he prefixed his name in Hebrew, viz. Nadabus Agmonius (36), and dedicated it to the Magiſtrates of Francfort. He dedicated the ſecond to Marquardus Freherus, who had procured him ſome manuſcripts which enabled him to fill up ſeveral chaſms of the former edition. He prepared a third, which would have been free from part of the faults that had eſcaped in the two former, and which have been criticized by Gretſerus the Jeſuit (37). The obſervations which Voſſius makes on this critic are very juſt. He does not deny that Gretſerus's work abounds with erudition; but he thinks that the good ſervices which Junius had done to the Republic of Letters had not been ſufficiently conſidered. Gretſerus has applied himſelf to nothing but the pointing out his errors, which indeed, ſays he, is the epidemical diſtemper of the Literati. Multa in iis ſunt, quibus etiam doctiſſimus doceat (Gretſerus). *Nec pauca tamen, quæ pro Junio poſſim reponere. Sed hic eruditorum morbus eſt epidemicus: ut non tam cogitent, quantum boni aliquis præſtiterit: quale eſt hic, quod primus eum ſcriptorem Junius ſua lingua ediderit, Latine verterit, etiam illuſtrarit Notis; in quibus humani aliquid ſubinde, in tam arduo negotio, perpeſſum fuiſſe, nec ipſi negamus. "There are many "particulars in them, wherein Gretſer may teach "thoſe who boaſt the greateſt learning; and not a few "which I can return in favour of Junius. "But, as is frequently ſaid, to improve upon diſcove-"ries that have been made, and to point out faults to "which all men are liable is no very hard taſk." Junius had tranſlated the three books of Gelaſius Cyzicenus, concerning the Council of Nice, and illuſtrated them with notes (39), all which Voſſius promiſed to get printed (40). I do not ſay Junius tranſlated out of Greek into Latin the books that are called Apocryphal; and from the Arabic the Acts of the Apoſtles, and St. Paul's Epiſtles to the Corinthians. He tranſlated, in conjunction with Tremellius, all the books of the Old Teſtament out of the Hebrew.

I ſhall not examine, whether Thuanus had reaſon to ſay, that Junius was of a roving or fickle diſpoſition and undertook too many things, Voſſius his ſon-in-law having cleared him ſufficiently with reſpect to that point (42): I ſhall obſerve after him (43), that Thuanus is ſtrangely miſtaken, in ſuppoſing firſt, that Junius was baniſhed by the States of Holland upon a ſuſpicion of his engaging in cabals. Secondly, That he accepted of an invitation made by the Magiſtrates of Nuremberg, and died in Altorf. Thirdly, That Thuanus has ſpoke of his exile under the proper year. To begin with this laſt error; I ſay that Thuanus has not ſpoke of Junius, but of Donellus, when he deſcribes the cabal that was diſcovered in 1587 (44). Junius was then in the Palatinate, and did not come to Leyden till five years after. It is univerſally known that he was Divinity Profeſſor of Leyden from the year 1592, till his death. It was Donellus who retired to Altorf, and died there (45).

[P] In all probability the memoirs of Scaliger ..... prejudiced Thuanus.] This is Voſſius's conjecture (46), and it may very probably be true. Scaliger's hatred and paſſion againſt Junius appeared both in his converſations (47) and letters. But this is not ſo manifeſt to every one in his letters, becauſe Heinſius (48) who publiſhed them in 1627, put ſtars in all thoſe places where Junius was injuriouſly treated, and ſuppreſſed the proper names; but the invectives therefore are not the leſs real for it. Hocce anno Heinſius noſter in lucem edidit Epiſtolas Scaligeri, in quibus non urbanatim ſed ruſticatim Junium tanquam Cumanum aſinum tangit, homo cætera magnus, ſed nimis malignus (49). i. e. Theſe are Voſſius's words. He had ſaid juſt before, that there were found in ſome of Junius's printed works, a great number of very injurious expreſſions, written with Scaliger's own hand. What are not thoſe authors capable of who go ſuch lengths? *Memor eram qualia ſuperſtes evomuerit adverſus Junium, cum totus in fermento jaceret. Et meminiſſe ipſe potes. deſerve to be treated in ſo contemptuous a manner by Scaliger; the injuſtice of it is very palpable; and when we conſider the elogiums which a numberleſs multitude of great authors have beſtowed upon him (i), we find our ſelves more inclined to pity than indignation with reſpect to that injuſtice. He was a learned and honeſt man; and ſo far from running into extremes, that it was his opinion people may be ſaved in the Romiſh Communion [Q]. " you yourſelf may remember it. There are ſtill extant ſome of Junius's printed books, wherein are writ, with Scaliger's own hand, the fine elogiums following; ape, aſs, ſcoundrel and ſuch like ſcurrilous expreſſions, worthy of a buffoon and not of Scaliger." It may be obſerved by the way, that Scaliger nevertheleſs beſtowed very great elogiums on Junius's herſe (51); ſo true it is that poems writ on the death of perſons, are a ſcene of the grand farce that is playing in the world. I alſo obſerve, that Junius had drawn the hatred of this great man upon him, by his taking the liberty to contradict him ſometimes in matters of chronology &c. Some young people threw a great deal of oil into the fire, by reporting after an invidious manner, what Junius uſed to ſay of the other, either in his lectures or converſation. Scis quale fuerit illud maximi Scaligeri ingenium. Non ferebat diſſentientem. Itaque ſemper eo nomine offenſior Junio fuit, quod in quibuſdam ad ſacram χρονολογίαν pertinentibus, ac credo in aliis etiam nonnullis a ſe diſcreparet. Offenſam eam unus & alter diſcipulorum alebant, maligne interpretantes apud Scaligerum, quæ vel publice docuiſſet Junius, vel privatim dixiſſet (52). However this be, this is what made Voſſius (53) conclude, that Scaliger's letters had prejudiced Thuanus againſt Junius. This reflection kept him in ſuſpence at firſt, whether or no he ſhould draw up an apology for his father-in-law, in oppoſition to Thuanus: for he foreſaw that the ſon of that great hiſtorian would juſtify his father, by producing thoſe letters of Scaliger that were injurious to Junius; and in this caſe Voſſius would have been obliged to write againſt Scaliger, but he thought it more proper to throw a veil over the faults of that great man, than to make them known. At laſt he took the method that may be ſeen in the preface (54) I have cited. Si calamum adverſus Thuanum ſtringam, periculum video, ne filius Thuani, juvenis eruditus, & ut genere, atque opibus pollens, ita multis in Galliis carus, & maximis honoribus deſtinatus, quæ de imperitia Junii modeſte Parens ſcripſerit, ea aperte, & ſine circuitione prodita, oſtendat a Magno Scaligero Reip. literariæ dictatore, cui doctior orbis lubens eruditionis faſces ſubmittit. Hinc mihi nova cura, etiam tuendi eum adverſus Scaligeri calumnias, incumbet. Quem ego virum laudavi ſemper, ac porro laudare decrevi: non quia ejus impotentiam animi, aut maledicentiam ignorem; aut quaſi neſciam, quam multis in locis aliquid humanitus patiatur: ſed quia tantæ virtutes, præclaraque adeo merita ſunt, erga hiſtoriam ac bonas literas, ut propterea, quæ peccavit, cenſeam ei condonari, & æterna oblivione ſepeliri oportere (55). i. e. " In caſe I ſhould " write againſt Thuanus, I am afraid leſt Thuanus's " ſon, a learned youth, and not only rich and well-" born, but alſo beloved by many in France, and de-" ſigned for the higheſt honours, ſhould ſhew that the " mighty Scaliger, Dictator of the Republic of Let-" ters, whom the Literati willingly conſider as their " monarch, declared openly, and without diſguiſing " the matter, what his father obſerved only in mo-" deſt terms with regard to Junius's unſkilfulneſs. " This will cut out a new taſk for me, even of de-" fending him in oppoſition to the ſlanders of Scali-" ger, a perſon whom I have ever applauded, and " will ſtill applaud: not that I am ignorant of his " violent temper or faculty of ſlandering, and that he " himſelf miſtakes on ſeveral occaſions; but becauſe I " am of opinion that his great talents and deſerts, " with reſpect to hiſtory and polite literature, ought " to atone for his faults, and bury them in eternal " oblivion," He ſpares Scaliger's name in the preface, but not his perſon; it is true indeed that he ſtabs him in a very reſpectful manner. His words are as follow. Acerbe adeo ut ſummus vir (Thuanus) pronuntiaret, fecit amicus ejus, vir cætera egregius; ſed, quod in aliis damnat, præſidens, planeque ἰδιογνώμων, καὶ αὐθάδικας, ſæpe etiam turgens loliginis ſucco, ac ſi quis non per omnia aſſentiret, vehemens alieni nominis obtrectator: quo vitio non mediocriter fædabat egregias, imo admirandas animi dotes. Non me ariolari hic, ſed certiſſima promere, multis poſſim indiciis comprobare: ſed ea ſunt viri illius merita, ut quædam ſatius ſit honoris cauſa taceri (50). i. e. " So very bitterly, that " that very great man (Thuanus) pronounced, his " friend did it, otherwiſe an excellent man; but, " what he condemns in other people, very confident, " ſelf-conceited, and ſevere; fired often with envy, " and inveighing againſt thoſe who did not aſſent to " him in all things, a vice which threw a deep ſhade " over his excellent parts. This is not conjecture, but " ſtrict truth, as I can prove by many marks; but ſo " ſo great is this man's merit, that the veneration I " have for it obliges me to be ſilent with regard to " ſome things." [Q] It was his opinion that people may be ſaved in the Romiſh Communion.] He nevertheleſs called her, as other Proteſtant Miniſters did, the whore mentioned in the Revelations; but he ſaid ſhe ſtill was the ſpouſe of the ſon of God: a ſpouſe whoſe infidelity Chriſt bears with, and has not yet divorced her. This did not pleaſe Theodore Beza, a mighty ſtickler for the monarchy of the Solipſi; a name by which I beg leave to diſtinguiſh thoſe communions, which think that themſelves only are in the right way of ſalvation; but Junius allowed a conſiderable extent to the true Church, a circumſtance that perhaps was unknown to Mr. Nicole (57). *Doctiſſimus ſocer Junius cum nollet ab iis diſcedere, qui Romanam Eccleſiam cenſent eſſe meretricem Babylonicam, & tamen ſtatueret ſalvari in ea innumera millia, ajebat eſſe vivum corpus, ſed ulceribus obſitum: meretricem eſſe, ſed adhuc ſponſam Chriſti, vel conjugem, quia Chriſtus necdum ei miſerit libellum repudii. Sed non eo ſatisfecit Genevenſibus: qui illam dicerent idololatricam, ac proinde neminem in ea ſalvari. Narravit mihi aliquando doct. Anthonius Thyſius, cum primum Genevam veniſſet, & ſoceri mei nomine multam ſalutem diceret D. However, this did " not ſatisfy the Genevois, who ſaid that ſhe was ido-" latrous, and therefore that no one ſhould be ſaved in " her. This is what Voſſius relates. ☞ We ſhall add ſome particulars to this article [A].

[A] We ſhall add ſome particulars to this article.] Our Junius was ſo very ſickly in his childhood that his parents were often in danger of loſing him. At five years of age his father began to teach him to read, but afterwards got a tutor for him. At twelve he was ſent to the public ſchools, where he ſoon made a great progreſs. Junius was ſo unhappy as to meet with ſevere and unreaſonable maſters, who were for ever beating him; but what would have quite diſheartened another made no impreſſion upon him; his fondneſs for learning making him bear their cruel treatment with patience (). The occaſion of Bartholomew Aneau's counſelling Junius with regard to his ſtudies was this (†). Junius, abandoning himſelf to the inclination he had to gratify his curioſity, uſed to read all ſorts of books that came in his way; and without fixing to any ſcience in particular, was perpetually ſhifting from one ſcience to another: when Aneau aſſured him that this was the way for him not to know any one well; and that he ought to have, in his ſtudies, one fixed point to which every thing ſhould be directed. This advice made ſuch an impreſſion on Junius, that he followed it, and found himſelf greatly benefited thereby (§). The reaſon of his leaving the Walloon Church at Antwerp (‡) was, upon an order being made there, that thenceforward only two Proteſtant Miniſters ſhould belong to it, who were born in that city, whereby our Junius was excluded, upon which he went to Limburg (). One of the reaſons of Scaliger's hatred of Junius has been already told (†); and the other was this: Scaliger inſiſting upon having the precedency over all the other Profeſſors of Leyden, was oppoſed by them; and Francis Junius, who was the firſt, ſpoke againſt Scaliger, and by that means prevented his ſucceeding in his deſign (). But notwithſtanding the ſtrong averſion, which Scaliger had for Junius in his life-time, he yet made the following panegyric upon him, after his death, wherein he obſerves, that Junius, who had ſo lately dealt his excellent inſtructions to crouded audiences, was unhappily ſnatched away by the plague. That his ſcholars bewailed his death; the widowed Church lamented him as her parent, and the whole world as its inſtructor. That they did not weep for him as the vulgar do, who are not ſenſible of the value of a thing till they have loſt it: but that every one knew the great merits of Junius in his life-time; and therefore they were not more ſenſible of his value by his death, but were the more grieved.

The author who gives us theſe verſes adds, that Scaliger writ under them, that he had compoſed them in bed, at two in the morning; a time in which the mind ſeems to have a greater aſcendant over the paſſions than in the day. Beſides, it was a very mournful ſeaſon, the plague having ſnatched away, in a month's time, two ſhining ornaments of the univerſity of Leyden, Junius and Trimellius, and making dreadful havock in Holland; and the gloomy reflections which that calamity inſpired, doubtleſs made Scaliger write the abovementioned verſes in the ſincerity of his ſoul; and conſequently we are not to believe all the injurious reflections he has caſt on Junius, and at the ſame time we muſt ſubſtract ſomething from the extravagant encomiums that have been beſtowed on him by others. "It will be doing juſtice, ſays du Pin (†), to acknow- "ledge that he was a man of very extenſive erudition, "an able critic and moſt ſkilled in languages; and "that his notes and reflections are pretty juſt: ne- "vertheleſs he can paſs for no more than a good "Grammarian and but a tolerable Divine." JUNIUS (FRANCIS) ſon of the preceding (a) was born in Heidelberg in the year 1589. He at firſt deſigned to devote himſelf to a military life; but the truce that was concluded in 1609 for twelve years made him take a different reſolution, which was to apply himſelf to ſtudy. He went into France, and from thence into England in the year 1620. He was taken into the Earl of Arundel's family, and continued thirty years in it; after which he returned to Holland, and there continued a ſtudy which he had very much cultivated in England, I mean that of the northern tongues [A], in which he made

[A] He continued the ſtudy . . . of the northern tongues.] Having met in England with ſeveral Anglo-Saxon books, he reſolved to make an advantage of them; and perceiving, by the knowledge he acquired in the Anglo-Saxon language, that it would be of ſervice to him for diſcovering many etymologies for clearing up the Flemiſh, Engliſh, and German tongues; he therefore devoted himſelf wholly to that ſtudy, and afterwards learnt the antient language of the Goths, Franks, Cimbri, and Friſons; whereby he diſcovered the etymology of ſeveral Italian, French, and Spaniſh words; for the Goths, Vandals, French, Burgundians and Germans ſpread their language in the provinces they conquered, of which ſome footſteps are left (1). He devoted himſelf entirely to the compoſing of Gloſſaries; Totus erat in contexendis Anglo-Saxonicis, Francicis, & Cimbricis Lexicis ac Gloſſariis, & explanandis antiquiſſimis harum gentium ſcriptoribus (2). And here follows the pedigree which he diſcovered His omnibus linguis imbibendis cum ſatis diu inſudaſſet, vidit, quod & privatim apud omnes, quibus cum agebat de hac doctrina, tum publice teſtatus eſt, Gothicam eſſe matrem omnium cæterarum Teutonicarum linguarum, ex qua profluxerit vetus Cimbrica, monumentis Runarum poſteris tradita, nec non Suecica, Danica, Norwegica, Iſlandica, quibus illius plagæ homines iſto tempore ſuas animi cogitationes explicant. Ex Anglo-ſaxonica, quæ & ipſa aut propago eſt Gothicæ, aut illius ſoror germana, & ejuſdem matris filia, manavit Anglica, Scotica, Belgica, Friſica vetus. Ex Gothica & Saxonica orta Francica, quæ Germanicæ ſuperioris parens eſt. Harum veterrimarum linguarum, & dialectorum, quæ ex illis ducta ſunt, cognitionem invicto ſtudio, & incredibili aſſiduitate non primus tantum aſſecutus eſt, ſed & ſolus, viam ſecutus nullius ante tritam veſtigiis (3). That is, "After he had applied himſelf ſufficiently for the "learning of all theſe languages, he diſcovered, as he "declared both privately to all thoſe with whom he "diſcourſed on this matter, and alſo publickly, that "the Gothic was the mother of all the Teutonic lan- "guages; whence ſprung the old Cimbrian, tranſ- "mitted to poſterity by the remains of the Runæ; as "likewiſe the Swediſh, Daniſh, Norwegian, Iſe- "landiſh, in which the inhabitants of that country ex- "preſſed their thoughts at that time. From the An- "glo-Saxon, which itſelf is either a branch of the "Gothic, or its ſiſter, and daughter of the ſame mo- "ther, ſprung the Engliſh, Scotch, Belgic, and the "old language of Frieſland. made a very great and extraordinary progreſs. He was ſo paſſionately fond of this ſtudy, that being informed there were ſome villages in Frieſland wherein the antient language of the Saxons was preſerved, he went and lived two years in that country. He returned to England in 1675; and after ſpending two years in Oxford, he retired to Windſor at the houſe of Iſaac Voſſius his nephew, and died there within the ſpace of a year. The Univerſity of Oxford, to which he bequeathed his manuſcripts, erected a very handſome monument to his memory (b). We ſhall ſpeak of the works he publiſhed [B]. He was not only maſter of very great erudition, but likewiſe led an excellent life. He was not obſerved to have any vicious paſſion. He did not thirſt after worldly riches or honours; his books were his only care; and perhaps no man ever ſtudied more without prejudicing his health [C]. I ſhall tranſcribe a paſſage from Colomeſius [D].

When I ſpoke of his ſtay in Oxford, and of the time when he died, I followed the account given by Grævius, but it is not accurate. I rectify it here, by obſerving that Junius retired to Oxford in October 1676; that he left it in Auguſt 1677, in order to viſit Voſſius, in whoſe houſe, near Windſor, he died the 19th of November 1677. He lay ill but a few days, and was buried in St. George's chapel in Windſor (c).

" Saxon languages ſprung that of the Franks, which " is the mother tongue of Upper Germany. Ju- " nius was not only the firſt man, but the only one, " who, ſtriking into a path never trod before, with " invincible pains and aſſiduity, attained to the know- " ledge of thoſe moſt antient languages, and the dia- " lects that flow from them."

[B] We ſhall ſpeak of the works he publiſhed.] In 1637 he publiſhed a treatiſe de Pictura Veterum, which abounds with admirable literature. He afterwards enlarged it ſo much, that the ſecond edition of it (4) is a pretty thick folio; whereas the firſt is but in quarto, and conſiſts of 318 pages. Very few particulars have eſcaped our Junius's reſearches, in the Greek and Latin authors with regard to painting and the antient painters. In 1655 he publiſhed remarks on the Francick paraphraſis (5) of the Canticles, written by Abbot Willeram, and firſt publiſhed by Paul Merula. Being returned to Holland after paſſing two years in Frieſland, he met with the old Gothic manuſcript called the Silver One, becauſe the four Goſpels are there writ in ſilver Gothic letters: Qui argenteus dicitur, quoniam quatuor Evangelia literis argenteis Gothicis in illo fuerant deſcripta (6): Junius devoted his whole ſtudy to the explication of it, which he compleated in a little time. He therefore publiſhed this Gothic paraphraſe of the four Goſpels, corrected from good manuſcripts, and illuſtrated with notes by Thomas Marſhal or Mareſchal. This is but a very ſmall part of his works; thoſe which continue in manuſcript being vaſtly more conſiderable. His Gloſſary in five languages, wherein he ſearches for and explains the original of the northern languages, contains eleven (7) vol. in manuſcript, which Biſhop Fell cauſed to be tranſcribed, in order for their being printed. His commentary on the harmony of the four Goſpels by Tatian is very large. I take no notice of a great many other books which he illuſtrated with notes (8). Conſult the catalogue of the manuſcripts which he bequeathed to the univerſity of Oxford, annexed to his Life.

[C] No man ever ſtudied more without prejudicing his health.] He uſed to riſe at four in the morning both winter and ſummer, and ſtudy till dinner time which was at one, and after dinner he uſed to employ himſelf, for his health ſake, till three, in ſome bodily exerciſe, or walk or run. Hora prima prandebat, ſequente corpus exercebat vel in area ſubdivali ambulando contentius, aut etiam ſubſultim non nunquam currendo, aut, ſi id non ferret aſperior tempeſtas, per omnes ſcalas in cœnaculum aſcendendo valetudinis tuenda cauſſa [9]. He returned to his ſtudies at three, and did not leave them till eight, when he went to ſupper, and then to bed. He very ſeldom went abroad, and that never but when affairs obliged him to it. Notwithſtanding this he enjoyed a perfect ſtate of health, and was never once ſick. Firma fuit valetudine, ut proſperrima per omnem ætatem ſine ulla corporis offenſione uteretur, quamvis totos dies à ſummo mane uſque ad noctem incumberet literis, & rariſſime, nec unquam niſi negotiorum ratio id ei quaſi imperaret, prodiret in publicum (10). Tho' he ſpent ſo long a ſeries of years in this ſolitary manner, poring upon barbarous books and wild words, and in making five Gothic or Teutonic lexicons, it yet did not any ways leſſen the gaiety of his temper, not even in his extreme old age. He was ever free from peeviſhneſs; and affable to thoſe who viſited him, tho' he did not like to be interrupted. Grævius deſcribes this in beautiful words. In aſſiduitate tanta licet invitus admodum avocaretur ab his, quibus inſudabat, curis, tam longe tamen aberat omnis moroſitas ingeniique triſtitia, quæ ſolet eſſe propria iis, qui a luce hominum & celebritate alieniores omne tempus & operam domi ſuæ in doctrinæ & litterarum ſtudiis conſumunt, præcipue ſenes, ut nihil ſene noſtro fieri poſſet ſuavius & facilius (11). People who do not love ſtudy cannot think but Junius muſt have been unhappy. Theſe would chooſe as ſoon to be ſentenced to the gallies, as to ſpend their lives, as he did, among his deſks, without taſting the pleaſures of converſation, wine, women, or gaming. How will it be poſſible, ſay theſe, to paſs the day without the bottle, and the night without the fair? But they are in an error if they think themſelves happier than he. He doubtleſs was one of the happieſt men upon earth, unleſs he had the weakneſs which others have, viz. of being diſturbed about trifles. For as ſome people who, tho' they have no cauſe to be merry, do yet find out chimerical pleaſures that amuſe them (12); there are on the contrary, others, who tho' unmoved with the moſt juſt cauſes of diſcontent, are yet troubled from ſilly and ridiculous motives, which they would be aſhamed to complain of.

JUNO, ſiſter and wife of Jupiter, was the daughter of Saturn and Rhea. Her father being fully determined to devour his children, for fear they ſhould one day dethrone him, did not ſpare her any more than his two daughters (a) whom he had already ſwallowed; but he had been forced to diſgorge them ſome years after; a potion having been given him, which forced him to vomit up all the children whom he had been ſo inhuman as to devour (b); and thus it was that Juno returned into the world. The particulars of her marriage with Jupiter are variouſly related. According to a tradition, they had a paſſion for each other, and lay together unknown to their parents [A]; and it does not appear that Juno kept her lover long in ſuſpence; but others ſay that ſhe withſtood the ſollicitations of Jupiter, like a maid of virtue and honour [B]; and to free her ſelf from him, flew into a cavern. They add, that ſhe met with a man there, whoſe arguments ſwayed her ſo much in favour of Jupiter, that ſhe conſented to crown his

Ὡς ὃ ἴδεν, ὡς μιν ἔρως πυκινὰς φρένας ἀμφεκάλυψεν.

Homer ſpeaks here of a time when Jupiter, who had been married many ages to Juno, felt, as he ſpied her by accident, the ſame paſſion and fire as when he enjoyed her ſecretly the firſt time. To the above teſtimony of the Greek Poet I will add that of a Latin Poet. It is a lover who ſpeaks; a lover, I ſay, who had met his fair one in the critical minute (2); and who is vexed that many had been ſecretly indulged that pleaſure before him.

[B] Others ſay, that ſhe withſtood the ſollicitations of Jupiter like a maid of virtue and honour.] According to ſome writers, Juno was ſo very virtuous, that had not Jupiter found out a remedy in the room of that which ſhe refuſed to grant him, he would not have known what to do. But he uſed to go and ſeat himſelf on a mountain (4) whenever he was in the tranſport of his paſſion, and uſed to ſooth it in that manner. Ὁ Ζεὺς ἀεὶ ἱρῶν Ἥρας ἱρχόμενος ἐπὶ τῇ κίτρῃ ἐκαθίζετο, καὶ ἀνεπαύετο τῷ ἔρωτι (5). Jovem ſemper Junonis amore captum ad ſaxum hoc acceſſiſſe, atque ei inſidendo amoris impotentiam ſedaſſe. The author who furniſhes me with this incident, does not ſay whether Jupiter was married then to Juno. And indeed there was no occaſion to ſpecify any thing on that ſubject; for the moſt ſtupid readers will eaſily underſtand that he was not married, and that Juno refuſed to indulge his wiſhes.

his wiſhes that moment (c). Others perhaps would own, that this was the firſt time that Jupiter enjoyed her, but not the firſt time ſhe taſted the amorous bliſs; for they pretend that before Jupiter made his addreſſes to her, ſhe had been enjoyed by Eurymedon, a fickle, lewd giant, who, by the ſame token, had a ſon by her called Prometheus [C]; but Jupiter did not know this incident till after their marriage, and wreaked his revenge on this baſtard on other pretences. There were ſome other occaſions in which his wife's chaſtity appeared to him extremely dubious [D]. Jupiter well deſerved this treatment, as his amours were ſo frequent. There are few animals whoſe form he did not aſſume in order to get maidenheads. It is univerſally known that he metamorphoſed himſelf into a cuckoo, purpoſely to enjoy Juno [E]. This Goddeſs preſided over marriages (d), but

[C] Eurymedon . . . . had a ſon by her called Prometheus.] The reader may find this relation in the Scholiaſt on Homer. Ἥρην τρεφομένην παρὰ τοῖς γονεῦσιν εἰς τῶν γιγάντων Εὐρυμιδόντα βιασάμενον ἔγκυον ἐποίησεν. ἡ δὲ Προμηθέα ἐγέννησε (6). Jupiter's reſentment did not break out leſs againſt the father of the baſtard than the baſtard himſelf; for as Prometheus was put in chains, Eurymedon was hurled down into hell. I know not upon what pretence it was that Jupiter treated Eurymedon in this manner; but we may be perſuaded that he concealed the true cauſe of his anger, he having too much ſenſe to throw a diſgrace upon himſelf by his revenge. The pretence he made uſe of was, that the baſtard ſtole the celeſtial fire. The Scholiaſt (7) whom I quote borrows this from Euphorion.

[D] Juno's chaſtity appeared, to him, extremely dubious.] As a commentary to this text I will employ the words of a modern author, who in order to prove that Jupiter was a notorious cuckold, expreſſes himſelf as follows: "Eurymedon the Giant had firſt been favoured, in an amorous way, by Juno his wife (*); and not to mention the iſle of Samos, which the unchaſt amours of that Goddeſs rendred famous, is it not known that Jupiter, finding a few days after his marriage, that Juno would be delivered of a child which was not his; ſhe nevertheleſs wheedled him ſo well, that he was ſoon perſuaded that it was poſſible for her to conceive without the aſſiſtance of a male, and had completely preſerved her virginity. Another time ſhe made him believe, that ſhe had conceived by eating wild lettice: ſo that, though the horns which were fixed on his ſtatue in Lybia, had not ſignified that he was a cuckold; did not he deſerve that they ſhould have this ſignification, and to give riſe to thoſe forms of ſpeech, which, by the conſent of all nations, have ſo long been uſed (8)?"

[E] Jupiter metamorphoſed himſelf into a cuckoo, purpoſely to enjoy Juno.] To relate ſuch particulars as are moſt curious on this ſubject, I need but follow the diſpute between Coſtar and Girac. Here follows the foundation of it. "Jupiter was no leſs forgetful "on ſeveral other important occaſions. Pallas com"plains, in Homer, that he did not think of ſage "Ulyſſes. Another upbraids him that, in the ſettle"ment of his houſhold, he had not thought of cuckol"dom, which had been of ſuch great ſervice to "him (9) (α)." Theſe are Coſtar's words, to which his adverſary replies, that this reproach was extremely unjuſt; "for honeſt Jupiter, ſays he (10), to ſhew the "high eſteem in which he held cuckoldom, and the "deſire he had to be a cuckold, metamorphoſed him"ſelf into a bird of that name, when he courted his "wife Juno. And ſince, to ſhow his gratitude, he "commanded the Argivi to make a fine cuckoo of "gold, and to fix it on the ſceptre of Juno's ſtatue, "at which that great Goddeſs did not take the leaſt "umbrage; ſhe having reaped as many advantages, "at leaſt, from cuckoldom as her huſband had done. "And even near the city of Hermione, there are two "little mountains, one whereof is called the cuckoo "mountain, on which was ſeen, in Pauſanias's time (†), "the temple of Jupiter; and over againſt it, on the "other mountain, that of Juno. In Lybia the ſtatue "of Jupiter Ammon had large horns on the head of "it; a circumſtance which was ſo pleaſing to this "God, that though ſtatues were ſet up in his honour "in all parts of the world, he delivered oracles only "through this (11). He was ſo well pleaſed with his "horns, that he obliged his beſt beloved friends to "wear horns in imitation of him. Bacchus (‡) and "Pan, the Satyrs, the Gods of Rivers, and many "others, did not fail to imitate him. Juno herſelf "did the ſame, to ſhew that ſhe ſometimes was com"plaiſant to her huſband; and there are ſeen to this "day ſeveral medals of this Goddeſs with horns. Di"ana and Venus likewiſe wore horns, as being a "very beautiful ornament to a handſome face." There is a great deal of learning in this anſwer, but it is falſe; for we do not find any thing in it that proves the incident in queſtion. The ſtate of the queſtion is this: whether Jupiter honoured the ſtate and condition of thoſe huſbands whoſe wives had gallants? Though it ſhould be proved ever ſo fully, that he greatly honoured the bird which we call cuckoo; that he would have horns fixed on his ſtatues, and that the reſt of the Gods imitated him in that particular; yet this is nothing to the purpoſe, becauſe in that age, the word cuckold and horns were not taken in the ſenſe that has been ſince, and is to this day given them. Farther, for a perſon to diſguiſe himſelf in the form of a cuckoo, in order to ſucceed in his enterprizes, would not be an indication, even in this age, that ſuch a one was deſirous of marrying a gay lady. My readers will naturally imagine, that Coſtar could not but perceive the inſignificancy of the anſwers that were made him: but ſhould ſome perſons doubt this, I will ſoon undeceive him by tranſcribing his words. They will ſee that the affectation of making too great a parade of his erudition, makes him intermix certain particulars in his anſwers that hurt his cauſe. He begins with the metamorphoſis of Jupiter into the bird called Cuckoo, and ſays of it as follows (12).

(†) In Corinth.

(11) Coſtar, Suite de la Défenſe, pag. 382. refutes this by the following words: Ariſtotle relates ſome where in his Rhetoric, that Hegeſippus, being returned from Elis, whither he went to conſult the Oracle of Jupiter, would alſo conſult that of Delphi, where he asked Apollo, in the moſt familiar manner, the following queſtion; Will you be of the ſame opinion with your father? Dare you contradict him? But Girac, in his Anſwer, pag. 551. complains that his words have been falſified. He proves that he knew very well that Jupiter gave anſwers in other places, but gave none through his ſtatue, except in Egypt.

Jupiter, who ſaw her at that time, was ſo "charmed with the Goddeſs that he was ſmit with a "violent paſſion for her; and being no longer able to "live without ſoothing it, he aſſumed a cuckoo's form "and plumage, and raiſing an extreme cold in the "air, he flew trembling and frozen, into the arms of "the Goddeſs, and then reſuming his uſual form, and "promiſing her marriage, he obtained his wiſhes. "The cold which Jupiter raiſed on that occaſion, was "not more intenſe than that of the inſipid raillery of "our learned author. And indeed it appears that it "was not a love for cuckoldom that made Jupiter a "cuckold; ſince neither among the Gods, nor "among men, the name of that bird ſignified then "a huſband, whoſe conjugal bed his wife violated; "at leaſt we do not find any footſteps of this among "the antients. So far from this, ſome women in Plautus "call their huſbands, whom they catch in adulterous "acts, cuckold; and Juvenal () gives the name of hedge-ſparrow to a poor fellow whoſe wife was unfaithful "to him, doubtleſs becauſe the hedge-ſparrow feeds "the cuckoo's young ones, that bird laying them in "the hedge-ſparrow's neſt." Coſtar proceeds afterwards but ought not to have had that province allotted to her. This was inauſpicious, ſhe leading a bad life with her huſband; and notwithſtanding all the ſtrong reaſons which prompted him to bear with her, after the many juſt occaſions ſhe had given him to be jealous wards to the conſideration of the horns, and expreſſes himſelf as follows (13). Has Mr. de Girac ſeen ſome old manuſcript which proves very manifeſtly, that in thoſe times horns were indications of cuckoldom? And you, SIR (14), who know all things, could you ſhew me that thoſe forms of ſpeech, to wear horns, and plant horns, in the ſenſe wherein we employ them, were of much greater antiquity than Artimedorus who flouriſhed under Adrian? The horns of Jupiter Ammon were not thoſe of a cuckold, but of a great ram, propheſying on the ſands of Lybia, to ſpeak after our Ronſard. He examines very circumſtantially the horns of certain deities whom Girac had mentioned; and plainly ſhews they bore no relation to the condition of thoſe huſbands whom we call cuckolds, and that they were not wore out of complaiſance to Jupiter; and here follow his concluſions (15). If out of all this, Mr. de Girac can make any thing that may be ſerviceable to his deſign, I am not reſolved to oppoſe him; but I am greatly miſtaken if he will ſucceed in it; and ſhall force me to acknowledge that Jupiter, when he ſettled his houſhold, did not forget cuckoldom which had always been of ſo much ſervice to him. This is a good concluſion; for it is bringing back things to the ſtate of the queſtion and that is the center in which all the lines ought to terminate.

Let us examine the reply. Girac thinks it very ſtrange, that Coſtar ſhould treat this matter with a ſcholaſtic ſtrictneſs, and after a ſerious manner (16). He requires me to prove by demonſtration and authority, that it was the love of cuckoldom that made Jupiter a cuckold. He will not be ſatisfied, unleſs I ſhew him manuſcripts, which prove very evidently that from that age horns were an indication of cuckoldom. Is not this man unjuſt? He does nothing but banter in all his writings; he himſelf owns that he cannot ſay one word without the aſſiſtance of his dear irony; and yet he will not permit me to joke once... Though my raillery ariſe out of my ſubject, and is ſupported by noble antient teſtimonies; for was not Jupiter a notorious cuckold, ſince Eurymedon the giant firſt obtained favours of his wife Juno in an amorous way? The reader will find the ſequel of this paſſage above (17). It would be to no purpurpoſe to tranſcribe it here: the paper it would take up will be better employed in the two following remarks. The one is, that though a writer is allowed to jeſt in a criticiſm, he yet is not permitted to reaſon wrong in it. A writer may joke if he pleaſes; may ſpeak either in jeſt or earneſt, as his ſubject may require: but then he muſt be aware of employing a falſity; and never pretend that in joking on a falſe ſuppoſition, or in raiſing ſtrokes of wit on a miſtake of ignorance, he either will form good objections or ſolid anſwers to an objection (18). My ſecond remark is, that the adventures or the giant, and the infidelities of Juno come too late. The author had ſaid nothing about them in his anſwer, ſo that they can make nothing againſt Coſtar, who was not obliged to direct his meaſures by what his adverſary ſhould ſay one day. They cannot bring de Girac off; for beſides that he did not make uſe of them to enforce his criticiſm, they can no ways prove the affair in diſpute. Though Juno ſhould have been engaged an hundred times in acts of gallantry, does this prove that Jupiter remembered cuckoldom when he ſettled his houſhold? It is plain to every one, that my firſt remark quite deſtroys Girac's cauſe, ſince that whatever he cites is grounded on a falſe ſuppoſition. He might be reduced to this troubleſome dilemma. If you were ignorant that, in the time that Jupiter transformed himſelf into a cuckoo, thoſe huſbands who were diſcovered by the infidelity of their wives were not called cuckolds and cornuto's, your raillery is very impertinent; for according to your own rules, raillery is bad, when grounded on the ignorance of things which a writer is under an obligation of knowing (19). But in caſe you knew, that, in this age, people did not affix the ſame ideas to words as at this time, you are very much in the wrong for employing proofs which you knew to be falſe. Let us ſee the ſequel of his reply.

Notwithſtanding all this, ſays he (20), our Sophiſt is urgent with me to ſhew him, that when the father of the Gods aſſumed the cuckoo's form and plumage, the name of that bird ſignified a huſband, whoſe wife was unfaithful to him. I promiſe and engage my word to ſatisfy him, when he ſhall have proved to me, by good authorities, that it was antiently reproached to Jupiter, viz. that in ſettling the affairs of his houſhold he had not thought of cuckoldom. With regard to horns, that word, in the ſignification I have given it, is more antient than is generally thought! Nicetas informs us, that Andronicus the Emperor, to ridicule the inhabitants of Conſtantinople, and reproach them with the lewdneſs of their wives, uſed to cauſe to be ſet up, in the places of public reſort of that great city the fineſt and largeſt ſtag's horns that could be met with; and Artemidorus, who lived above fifteen hundred years ſince, employs (††) the expreſſion, to plant horns, as a proverb that was common, and did not begin in his time. (21). It would be trifling away time to ſearch for the origin of it, and to enquire whether it was uſed in the time of Jupiter Ammon. However this be, my antagoniſt, who pretends to be ſo very ſubtle, did not perceive this time that I only laughed at him. It is plain from this paſſage, that Girac has loſt his cauſe. He is not able to prove what is denied him, and without which a criticiſm is of no force; and he boaſts that he deſigned to ridicule his adverſary. There is no writer but may employ ſuch ſubterfuges when he is nonpluſſed. We ſhall now ſee Coſtar a little puzzled: his knowledge forſook him when he quoted the authority of Eraſmus in a thing where Eraſmus was in the wrong (22). What was it to him if Jupiter did not metamorphoſe himſelf into a cuckoo? How was it poſſible for him not to perceive that this metamorphoſis is full as credible as ſo many others we meet with in Ovid? Does he not ſhew by his anger at thoſe who have related it, that he conſiders it as an incident which may be of advantage to his adverſary? And does not he groſly deceive himſelf to his enemy's advantage? Accordingly Girac did not fail to take advantage of it. Weigh well all the following paſſage which is copied from Girac (22). "Being unable to "deny, that I very properly mentioned the metamor- "phoſes of Jupiter into a cuckoo; he has taken it "into his head to call this fable, an old woman's ſtory, "and a ridiculous invention; as though the metamor- "phoſis of the ſame God into a ſwan, a bull and an "eagle, had ſomething in it more ingenious and "better: as though all fables in general were not "equally trifling; and that this, like the reſt, had "not its allegory and mythological application. But "when Mr. Coſtar aſſerts, that it is the invention of "a Grammarian who trifled away his time; that it is "borrowed from a ſcholiaſt on Theocritus; and that he "proves by the authority of Eraſmus that it is not found "in any author of ever ſo little antiquity; what does "he but ſhew that he is ignorant with others; and "that he reads authors with no other view but to learn "their errors? And indeed, I do not find that any "fable has been celebrated by a greater number of "famous writers than this. And even the ſcholiaſt "who is mentioned by Coſtar (ſo great is this man's "ſtupidity!) affirms, that he borrowed it from a trea- "tiſe (*) which Ariſtotle had made in the temple of "Hermione. Plutarch likewiſe mentioned it in his "book concerning rivers; Pauſanias ſpeaks of it in "ſeveral places of his Corinthiaca; and Didymus, "upon the fourteenth Iliad, relates it from Euphorion "a very antient author; not to cite the ſcholiaſt on "the Greek epigrams; nor a numberleſs multitude "of others, the catalogue whereof would be too te- "dious." I omit the other particulars on which Girac animadverts upon him in a juſt and learned manner, on the ſubjects of horns and the cuckoo. The great number of good authors, who have mentioned this metamorphoſis of Jupiter, gives me pain out of kindneſs to Eraſmus. It were to be wiſhed that he, for his glory, had not touched the old ſcholiaſt. He had better have been aſleep, than writ ſuch a thing as this. Had he not read what Pauſanias (24) ſays concerning mount Thornax (25), which was named Coccygius, or Coccyx, after that Jupiter, under the form of a cuckoo, had kiſſed Juno? It is a mountain of Laconia. The ſame author ſays, that the reaſon why the Theſe three temples had been built in her honour by Temenus, under whom ſhe had been brought up. The laſt mentioned was built at the time that ſhe lived in Stymphalum, whither ſhe had retired after her divorce. The reader may ſee in the Dictionary of Charles Stephens augmented by Lloyd (29), in what manner Jupiter cauſed Juno to return back to him He made a report to be ſpread, that he was going to marry the daughter of Aſophus, which made a ſtronger impreſſion on the heart of that exaſperated Goddeſs, than all the intreaties of Jupiter. Jupiter made her call to mind that time, when he was informed of the trick ſhe had played him during the ſiege of Troy. Juno had the art of charming him to ſuch a degree, and lulling him in her arms, that Neptune had all the time he wanted, in order to prejudice the affairs of the Trojans. I ſhall ſpeak at large of this artifice in the following remark. Jupiter who had ſaid ſo many tender things to her, and procured her ſuch exquiſite pleaſures, no ſooner heard of the prejudice which had accrued to the Trojans, whilſt he was enjoying her, but he reprimanded her in very ſevere terms. He threatened to whip her (30) ; and aſked whether ſhe had forgot the time when he faſtned an anvil to both her feet, and had ſuſpended her between heaven and earth in the ſight of all the Gods, who endeavoured, but in vain, to unlooſe her ; he hurling from heaven to earth as many of them as he could catch.

It was Juno's buſineſs to be ſubmiſſive ; ſhe excuſed herſelf by falſe oaths, and promiſed to comply with her huſband's deſires. The quarrel was carried no farther at that time. I muſt not omit that Juno occaſioned the wars of the Titans. She prompted them to dethrone her huſband (32), and to reſtore Saturn whom Jupiter had dethroned. Jealouſy was then more powerful than ambition ; for the indignation ſhe conceived when ſhe found that a Kingdom was beſtowed on Epaphus (33), made Juno chooſe rather to be a dethroned Goddeſs, provided her huſband might alſo be dethroned, than to reign with him. But perhaps ſhe might propoſe to herſelf ſuch a vengeance as might be no check to her ambition. She might flatter herſelf with the hopes, that in preferring the intereſt of her father, who had been unjuſtly driven from his throne, to that of her huſband who was an uſurper, ſhe might ſhare in the government under her father when he ſhould be reſtored ; and be ſeparated eternally from Jupiter. The reader will ſee below (34) another plot in which ſhe engaged againſt her huſband.

(34) In the remark [F] of the article JUPITER.

I cannot think of Juno ſuſpended between heaven and earth, without propoſing to my readers a paſſage which I do not underſtand. Hyginus (35) relates that Vulcan having made golden ſhoes for Jupiter and the reſt of the Gods, Juno was no ſooner ſeated, but ſhe found herſelf ſuſpended in the air. Vulcan was told of this, in order that he might come and unlooſe his mother ; but he anſwered, I have no mother. He had been hurled from heaven, and he was ſtill exaſperated at the treatment he met with on that occaſion. Here follows Hyginus's Latin. Vulcanus Jovi cæteriſque Diis ſoleas aureas ex adamante cum feciſſet, Juno, cum ſediſſet, ſubito in aere pendere cœpit. Quod cum ad Vulcanum miſſum eſſet, ut matrem quam ligaverat ſolveret, iratus quod de cœlo præcipitatus erat, negat ſe matrem ullam habere. I applaud thoſe critics who have made ſuch learned remarks on the firſt words of Hyginus (36) ; but I wiſh they would have informed me how, by the means of a pair of ſhoes, a woman the inſtant ſhe ſits down, finds herſelf ſuſpended in the air. I do not ſee even how a chair or a throne can have ſuch an effect, and eſpecially with regard to a perſon who is bound. Methinks we might juſtly ſay that the hiſtorian wanted judgment on this occaſion. Could he think that his readers would be ſatisfied with ſo mutilated and falſified a relation ? Why did he not ſay, that as ſoon as Juno was ſeated, the celeſtial floor ſplit aſunder ; and that her chair being thus unſupported, fell towards the clouds, and ſtopt in the ſpaces ſituated between heaven and earth ? This would have preſented an intelligible image to the reader. Servius relates this incident better ; he ſaying that Vulcan made a chair, on which Juno being ſeated, ſhe could not riſe from it notwithſtanding all her efforts (37), till ſhe had granted Vulcan's requeſt, which was to know thoſe, to whom he owed life. Alii dicunt quod cum Vulcanus parentes ſuos diu quæreret, nec inveniret : ſedile fecit tale, ut cum eo qui ſediſſet ſurgere non poſſet ; in quo cum adſediſſet Juno, nec poſſet exſurgere ; Vulcanus negavit ſe ſoluturum omnino, niſi prius parentes ſuos ſibi monſtraſſet, atque ita factum eſt ut in Deorum numerum reciperetur (38). i. e. " According to other wri" ters, when Vulcan had long ſought his parents,
" and could not find them, he made ſuch a chair,
" that whoſoever ſate in it could not riſe up from it.
" Now Juno ſeating herſelf in it, and not being able " to get up, Vulcan declared he would not releaſe
" her, unleſs ſhe firſt ſhewed him his parents, and by
" this means he was received in the number of the " Gods." The reader may conſult Pauſanias, who informs us that Vulcan, to revenge himſelf of Juno, ſent her a golden throne, in which, the inſtant the Goddeſs had ſeated herſelf, ſhe found herſelf faſtened (39). Bacchus only was able to perſuade Vulcan to return back into the heavens (40) ; and he was forced to make him drunk before he could prevail with him to undertake that journey. The Athenians had a picture repreſenting Bacchus leading Vulcan back to heaven (41) ; and there was a piece of ſculpture in Lacedæmonia, which repreſented Vulcan unlooſing his mother (42).

acquainted with the origin of an adventure which he takes from Plato, and expreſſes a little too wantonly [I]. Authors are not agreed concerning the place where Juno was brought dependent on them.] When Terence ſuppoſes that Glycerium the Courtezan, when juſt going to be delivered, makes uſe of the following prayer, Juno, Lucina, fer opem, ſerva me obſecro (43). i. e. "Help, Juno, "Lucina, ſave me, I beſeech thee," he ſhews plainly that Juno was the Goddeſs who preſided at childbirths. She was called (44) Opigena and Lucina, when in that character, ſive te Lucinam quod lucem naſcentibus tribuas ac Lucetiam convenit nuncupari (45). i. e. "Whether "we ought to call thee Lucina or Lucetia, becauſe "thou giveſt light to thoſe who are born." Other particular names were beſtowed upon her, according to the various ſervices that were expected from her in thoſe conjunctures; for ſhe was called Fluonia, becauſe ſhe could prevent too great a flow of blood. Fluoniam Junonem mulieres colebant, quod eam ſanguinis fluorem in conceptu retinere putabant (46). She was called Februa, from her preſiding at the ceremony of the purification of lying-in women. Theſe are the limitations which Martianus Capella gives to the ſurnames Fluonia and Februa; for he introduces Philology who declares, that being a virgin, ſhe has no need to invoke the Goddeſs Juno on thoſe two accounts; Nam Fluvoniam Februalemque ac Februam mihi poſcere non neceſſe eſt, cum nihil contagionis corporeæ ſexu intemerata pertulerim (47). She might have had occaſion for her in another reſpect, ſince St. Auſtin affirms that Varro had related, that Juno preſided over the flowing of the menſtrual blood. Ibi eſt & Dea Mena, quæ menſtruis fluoribus præeſt, quanvis Jovis filia, tamen ignobilis. Et hanc provinciam fluorum menſtruorum, in libro ſelectorum deorum ipſi Junoni idem autor aſſignat, quæ in diis ſelectis etiam regina eſt; & hic tanquam Juno Lucina cum eadem Mena privigna ſua eidem cruori præſidet (48). I am not ignorant that the Goddeſs who preſides over child births, was, according to ſeveral authors, different from Juno; for ſome aſſerted that Lucina was her daughter (49), and others affirmed that Diana was appointed to aſſiſt women in labour (50). But without inſiſting on the hypotheſis, that Lucina, Ilithya, Diana, Luna and Juno were the ſame Deity (51); I ſay it is very probable that Juno was looked upon as the principal in this function or office, and as having deputies and ſubſtitutes in various places (52). If therefore my readers will not acknowledge her directly and immediately for the Goddeſs Levana, who cauſed new-born children to be owned by their fathers (53); nor for the Goddeſs Rumina, who preſided over the action of giving them ſuck; nor for the Goddeſs Cunina, who preſided over their cradles; nor for the Goddeſs Nundina, who preſided over the naming of them; nor for the Goddeſs Vaticana, who preſided over their cries (54); nor for the Goddeſs Fabulina who preſided over the firſt looſning of their tongues, that is, over the firſt words they ſpoke; let, I ſay, my readers believe, that all theſe Goddeſſes were ſo many ſubdelegates to Juno, the intendant-general. The ſame may be ſaid with regard to the Goddeſs Proſa and the Goddeſs Poſtverta, who were worſhiped, to prevent infants from throwing themſelves into a diſadvantageous poſture, at their coming into the world. Quando contra naturam forte converſi (pueri) *in pedes: brachiis plerumque diductis retineri ſolent, ægriuſque tunc mulieres eniituntur. [I] Montagne . . . . expreſſes himſelf a little too wantonly.] "It was from ſome hungry poet, who was "very greedy of this ſport, that Plato borrowed "the following ſtory; that Jupiter being one day fired "with a very hot fit of love, and ſo very impatient, "that he could not hold till ſhe was come into bed "to him, he threw her on the floor, and thro' "the extaſy of the pleaſure, forgot the mighty and "important reſolutions he had juſt before taken with "the reſt of the Gods in his celeſtial court; boaſting "that this bout was as agreeable to him, as when he "firſt defloured Juno unknown to her parents (55)." Theſe are Montagne's words. But he is miſtaken in aſcribing this idea to ſome poet, who was greedy of the amorous ſport, ſince Homer, the author of this tale, has manifeſtly declared, that he did not believe it probable, that a huſband could be fired with ſuch a tranſport for his wife. 'Tis in this view he ſuppoſes (57), that Juno was not ſatisfied with putting on her beſt attire, but alſo had the policy to borrow Venus's girdle, an infallible charm, a philter, that never failed to produce its effect. 'Tis to this borrowed aſſiſtance that he aſcribes the power, which Juno had to inſpire her husband with ſo violent a fit of love. Several other things might be anſwered in the above paſſage of Montagne (58), had he not been ſo prudent as to cite Plato. We therefore muſt not impute to him the faults, which that Philoſopher committed, but apply ourſelves to Plato.

'Tis certain that it does not give a juſt and faithful Relation after Homer. His words are as follow. Ἡ Δία καθευδόντων τῶν ἄλλων θεῶν τε καὶ ἀνθρώπων ὡς μόνος ἐγρηγορὼς, ἃ ἐβουλεύσατο, τούτων πάντων ῥᾳδίως ἐπιλανθανόμενον, διὰ τὴν τῶν ἀφροδισίων ἐπιθυμίαν; καὶ ἔτως ἐκπλαγέντα, ἰδόντα τὴν Ἥραν, ὥστε μηδ' εἰς τὸ δωμάτιον ἐλθεῖν, ἐλθεῖν, ἀλλ' αὐτῇ βουλόμενον χαμαὶ ξυγγίγνεσθαι, καὶ λέγοντα ὡς ἔτως ὑπὸ ἐπιθυμίας ἔχεται, ὡς οὐδ' ὅτε τὸ πρῶτον ἐφοίτων πρὸς ἀλλήλας — φίλας λήθοντε τοκῆας (59). i. e. "Jupiter, the reſt of the "Gods as well as men being aſleep, through a ſtrong "deſire for the luſcious pleaſure, forgot all his reſolu"tion; and was ſtruck ſo forcibly by the ſight of "Juno, that he could not ſtay till he got home, but "would ſport with her that inſtant on the ground, "ſaying that he was enflamed with a yet ſtronger "guſt, than when they uſed to embrace unknown to "their parents." Plato's meaning is, that one of the reaſons for which Homer's Poems ought to be read is, that we there find, that whilſt the other Gods and men are taking their reſt, Jupiter tempted by looſe thoughts, cannot ſleep, and forgets all the reſolutions he had taken; and that the ſight of his wife fires him with ſo ardent a paſſion, that he is determined to enjoy her that moment, without ſtaying till ſhe can get to bed &c. I again repeat it, Plato alters the ſtory, for Homer does not ſay that the reſt of the Gods ſlept, nor that men were taking their reſt: He ſays on the contrary, that the Greeks and Trojans fought with great vigour, and that Neptune was in action againſt the Trojans. Nor does he ſay that Jupiter forgot his reſolutions. He ſuppoſes Jupiter had poſted himſelf on the ſummit of mount Ida; and that Juno ſpying him there, formed a deſign of firing him with a deſire of lying with her. He ſuppoſes that, to execute her project in the beſt manner poſſible, ſhe went and waſhed herſelf with Venus's girdle. By this he undertakes to deſcribe Jupiter as a very amorous God, ſince the moſt powerful charms were contained in that girdle.

I don't pretend to excuſe him, and I confeſs that Plato cenſures him very juſtly; for in ſhort 'tis very ſcandalous, for an author to ſport in this manner with the chief of all his Gods. By the way, Jupiter's eagerneſs and paſſion were not ſo violent, but that they allowed him time to repeat a long catalogue of his miſtreſſes. Some criticks are of opinion that Homer has not placed this ſtory with propriety. It is not, ſay theſe, prudent in a husband who is addicted to gallantry, to inform his wife of the intrigues he may have had with other fair ones; this is not a good way to coax her.

POPE.

I add that Homer has obſerved a decorum with reſpect to Juno. He makes her repreſent to her huſband the indecency there would be in caſe any God ſhould happen to ſee them lying together on mount Ida, and go and inform the reſt of it; however, ſays ſhe to him, ſince you have a fancy for it, lets go up into the chamber. But Jupiter did not approve of this expedient, and found out another, which was, to raiſe ſo thick a cloud round his wife, that even the ſun could not pierce it; and 'twas under this cloud that he indulged his fierce paſſion. He did not throw his wife on the floor, as Montagne ſays; but on the bare ground, in the open air. The earth indeed ſhot forth, inſtantly, graſs and flowers (62), which ſerved them very well for a quilt. Neither Homer nor Plato make Jupiter ſay, as Montagne does, that he had found that bout as tranſporting as when he firſt deflowered her unknown to their Parents. Homer ſays only (63), that Jupiter ſpying Juno, was fired with as ſtrong a paſſion for her as when he firſt enjoyed her beauties. I am willing it ſhould be ſaid, in order to excuſe Montagne, that he did not think there was much difference between theſe two things.

POPE.

Had Juno been allotted Venus's Girdle, that ſo very effectual charm to work a change in married people who have ſeparate beds, ſhe had very juſtly been made to preſide over marriages; but ſhe has occaſion to borrow the pacific method, and powerful inſtrument of reconciliation: Why was not this employment given to the Goddeſs from whom the girdle was to be borrowed? I leave it to perſons who have leiſure to enquire into the reaſon of this.

With regard to her education in Samos, conſult Pauſanias, who ſays that the inhabitants of this iſland aſſerted, that Juno was born there under a little tree which they ſtill ſhewed (66). The temple of that Goddeſs was very antient (67). There is no one but remembers the following words of the Æneid.

The iſland was named Parthenia, becauſe Juno had been brought up there whilſt a virgin (69). There alſo her nuptials with Jupiter were ſolemnized, whence ſhe was repreſented in her temple as a maiden who is marrying, and the anniverſary of her feſtival was ſolemnized as a wedding. Inſulam Samum ſcribit Varro prius Partheniam nominatam, quod ibi Juno adoleverit, ibique etiam Jovi nupſerit: Itaque nobiliſſimum, & antiquiſſimum templum ejus eſt Sami, & ſimulachrum in habitu nubentis figuratum, & ſacra ejus anniverſaria nuptiarum ritu celebrantur (70).

[L] There was no city in which greater honours were paid her than in Argos.] The Argives pretended, that the three danghters of the river Aſterion had brought up Juno. One of them called Eubœa, had her name given to the mountain on which Juno's temple was built; and Eupolemus a native of Argos was the architect of it. In the porch of it were the ſtatues of all the Prieſteſſes of the Goddeſs (71): their office was very conſiderable, as I obſerved, when I ſpoke of the unhappy Prieſteſs who occaſioned the burning of the temple (72). Pauſanias ſays (73) that ſhe eſcaped to the altar of Pallas in Tegea; and that notwithſtanding the indignation of the Argives, they nevertheleſs ſuffered her ſtatue to ſtand. He ſays that the moſt antient ſtatue of that Goddeſs was made of a wild pear-tree, and it was kept with great care. Piraſus the ſon of Argus had carried it to Tyrinthus; but the Argives having demoliſhed that city, brought it back to the temple of Juno (74). According to Homer (77) the three cities which Juno loved beſt were Argos, Lacedæmonia and Mycene. It is ſtrange he ſhould ſay nothing of Samos, the only place mentioned by Virgil, where he ſpeaks of the preference which Juno gave to Carthage.

(77) Iliad. lib. 4. ver. 51.

Let us ſay ſomething of the founder of the temple which Juno had in Argos; for thereby we ſhall diſcover the antiquity of the edifice. It was built by Phoroneus, ration at Carthage [M], and in Olympia. In this laſt city ſixteen Ladies were appointed as overſeers over the Games which were ſolemnized in Juno's honour every five years. Three claſſes or bands of young maidens uſed to diſpute there for the prize in the race; came down to run in the Olympic Games, and uſed to take up almoſt the whole time they laſted. Such Ladies as were victorious received an olive crown; and uſed to make a Peplus (f), which they conſecrated to that Goddeſs every five years (g). By the way the conjugal infidelities of Jupiter were ſo much the more inexcuſable, as Juno had the ſecret of becoming a virgin every year [N]. The love ſhe had for Jaſon has not been much talked of [O]; and ſhe freed herſelf with honour from the ſnares which Ixion had laid roneus, the ſon of Inachus, and he was the firſt who gave arms to that Goddeſs, in recompence whereof he was the firſt who reigned. Phoroneus Inachi filius templum Argis Junoni primus fecit. Hyginus ſays this in his CCXXVth Chapter. Phoroneus Inachi filius, ſays he in his CCLXXIVth Chapter, arma Junoni primus fecit, qui ob eam cauſſam primus regnandi poteſtatem habuit. Some critics will have us read, inſtead of arma, aram or ſacra; but others inſiſt on the common reading, and confirm it by a paſſage of Caſſidorus, in Chapter XVIII of Book VII Variorum. See the commentators of Hygynus in the Amſterdam edition of 1681. With regard to the antiquity of Phoroneus, ſee Scaliger's notes page 19 on Euſebius's Chronicon. It is ſufficient to remember that Phoroneus was cotemporary with Abraham, or wanted but little of being ſo.

[M] She likewiſe was in high veneration at Carthage.] I imagined for a very long time, that Virgil made uſe of a poetical licence, without paying any regard to hiſtory, when he repreſented Carthage as Juno's favourite city (78); and I did not think myſelf obliged to change my opinion, on reading in Ovid and Silius Italicus, the confirmation of Virgil's aſſertion; for no one can reaſonably doubt but that he was the occaſion why Ovid makes Juno ſpeak thus, and yet Silius Italicus aſſerted what was ſeen above (80): but having examined other paſſages of various authors, I began to think that Virgil's hypotheſis was grounded on tradition. Pſyche's prayer is not of the leaſt force with me: Magni Jovis germana, ſays ſhe (81), & conjuga: ſive tu Sami, quæ querulo partu vagituque & alimonia tua gloriatur, tenes vetuſta delubra; ſive celſæ Carthaginis, quæ te virginem vectura leonis cælo commeantem percolit, beatas ſedes frequentas: ſive prope ripas Inachi, qui te jam nuptam Jonantis, & reginam dearum memorat, inclytis Argivorum præſides mœnibus: quam cunctus oriens Zygiam veneratur, & omnis occidens Lucinam appellat: fis meis extremis caſibus Juno Soſpita, meque in tantis exantlatis laboribus deſeſſam, imminentis periculi metu libera. i. e. " Thou ſiſter " and wife of mighty Jove; whether thou dwelleſt in Sa- " mos, which glories in giving thee birth, and bringing " thee up in thy infancy; or whether thou frequenteſt " the bliſsful ſeats of lofty Carthage, which worſhips " thee, as a virgin, drawn by lyons from the ſkies; or " near the banks of Inachus, who now commemo- " rates thee, conſort of the Thunderer, and Queen of " the Goddeſſes, thou preſideſt over Argos's renowned " walls; whom the whole eaſt adores by the name of " Zygia, and every part of the weſt calls Lucina: " be thou to me, (O Juno) in the extremes to which " I am reduced, a preſerver; and free me, exhauſted " with theſe toils, from the fear of impending danger." This relates directly, and without the leaſt ambiguity, to Juno. The paſſage in Herodian with regard to Urania (82) of Carthage does not appear to me equally ſtrong; for it would incline one to think, that this Urania was not Juno but Luna. Now I do not here conſider the Theology of thoſe, who reduce many of the Heathen Deities to one; but keep only to the notion generally received, viz. that Juno was worſhipped as the ſiſter and wife of Jupiter; and as an object different from Minerva, Diana, Luna, Proſerpine, &c. By the way, I cannot reflect on the worſhip that was paid to that Goddeſs in ſo many places (83), and with ſo much pomp; I cannot, I ſay, reflect on it, without thinking that there was mixed with it, I know not what impreſſions of the cuſtom that is obſerved with reſpect to women. When a woman ſhares in the government, ſhe is much more waited upon, honoured and reſpected, than a man is who has the like authority. Conſider only how much court is paid to the wives of Governors of Provinces, when they are known to have great credit and authority. Greater honours are paid to them than to their huſbands. This is the practice upon earth, and it is carried into heaven. Jupiter was attended upon and ſerved as a King; and Juno as an ambitious, haughty, revengeful Queen, who ſhared the government of the world with him, and aſſiſted in all his councils.

I dare be ſo bold as to ſay, that the extravagancies into which Chriſtians have run with reſpect to the Virgin Mary; extravagancies which ſurpaſs every thing the Heathens could invent in honour of Juno, flow from the ſame ſpring; I mean from the cuſtom eſtabliſhed of honouring women, and paying court to them with much more aſſiduity and reſpect than to the other ſex. We cannot live without women, either in religious or civil life. Whoever ſhould take from the Romiſh communion its devotion for ſhe-ſaints, and eſpecially for her who therein is called Queen of Heaven, and Queen of Angels, would leave a dreadful chaſm in it; the reſt would fall to pieces, and be arena ſine calce, ſcopæ diſſolutæ. Eraſmus cenſuring the cuſtom of ſaluting the Virgin Mary in the pulpit, after the opening or beginning of the ſermon, ſays, " That it is contrary to the example of all the an- " tients, who ought rather to be imitated than I " know not what people, who, perhaps to pleaſe wo- " men, have followed the Heathens in that parti- " cular (85)."

[N] Juno had the ſecret of becoming a virgin every year.] For this purpoſe ſhe needed but waſh herſelf in a fountain (86). " Juno was very aſſiduous, ſays the " author of a Dictionary (87)) in waſhing herſelf an- " nually in the fountain or ſpring of Canathus, near " Nauplia, called at this time Napoli di Romania, " where ſhe always received her maidenhead, a cir- " cumſtance that endeared her to Jupiter. Pauſan. " lib. 8." Now Pauſanias does not obſerve, that this circumſtance endeared Juno to her huſband; all he ſays is, that the Argives ſpoke of this reſtoration of Juno's virginity, and grounded what they ſaid on this occaſion, on the practice of their occult ceremonies in the myſteries of that Goddeſs. Many writers, in quoting an author, commit this fault, viz. that they make him ſay all that, according to them, he ought to have ſaid. Hence it was that the writer in queſtion ſuppoſes Pauſanias to ſay, what he really did not. The author who thus aſcribes falſely, probably had his thoughts full on what he had before related. " Die- " go de Tourez, in his hiſtory of the Cherifs or Ze- " rifs, ſays, that among the felicities, which the " Turks hope to enjoy in the life to come, they ima- " gine that their wives will bring them new maiden- " heads, cap. 74." The vertue of the fountain of youth, ſo greatly celebrated by our old Poets, and writers of romances, was not to be compared to that of Canathus.

laid for that Goddeſs [P]. If ſome authors may be credited, ſhe had no children by her huſband; and ſhe never conceived but after a moſt extraordinary manner [Q]; but ſhe had milk as women uſually have in thoſe caſes; and this muſt neceſſarily be ſuppoſed, ſince ſhe is ſaid to have ſuckled one of her huſband's baſtards. He was forced to employ a ſtratagem in order to prevail with her to do it; and then, as we are told, was formed in the ſkies, what was called the Milky Way [R]. Some of thoſe authors who tirely the kindneſs and protection which that Goddeſs indulged him, to the good ſervice he had done her, without knowing who ſhe was. Juno, diſguiſed under the form of an old woman, deſired him to carry her over a river; which he accordingly did, and loſt one of her ſhoes as he was doing her that office; but others ſay that he was obliged to his beauty for the favour ſhe ſhewed him. Juno, not being able to reſiſt ſuch a blaze of charms, fell diſtractedly in love with this lovely youth. The reader will find this incident related more at large in Hyginus (90), with the teſtimonies of gratitude which Juno gave on that account. Valerius Flaccus ſuppoſes that it was extreme bad weather when ſhe received this ſervice; and he adds, that Jaſon knew her to be a Goddeſs by the dread with which ſhe was ſeized, becauſe ſhe knew that thunder to be the voice of Jupiter who called her. She was there flying away; ſhe had left her huſband, and did not care much to return home to him.

[P] She freed herſelf with honour from the ſnares which Ixion had laid for her.] Ixion, guilty of a parricide (92), from the guilt of which he could not find any perſon to abſolve him, at laſt received this good office from Jupiter himſelf. He retained ſo deep a ſenſe of gratitude on that account, that he endeavoured to cuckold his benefactor; he being inflamed with a paſſion for Juno, and earneſtly intreating her to comply with his wiſhes. However, the Goddeſs refuſed, and complained to Jupiter, who reſolved to try whether this accuſation were juſtly grounded, formed a cloud in the exact ſhape of his wife, and left it to Ixion's diſcretion, who being ſtrongly fired with love, made exactly the ſame uſe of it as he would have done of the Goddeſs, and hence ſprung the Centaurs. He afterwards boaſted his having had an affair of gallantry with Juno; and it was then, as we are told, that Jupiter loſing all patience, hurled him down to hell, and ſentenced him to the puniſhment of the wheel (93). He did not behave like a jealous huſband; for what Italian would permit his wife's gallants to ſatiate their paſſion on her form or figure? He would prevent, if poſſible, their diverting themſelves with her in imagination or in a dream.

(92) He had killed his wife's father, in a treacherous manner.

She conceived of Hebe, by eating greedily of lettuces. This maiden was the Goddeſs of Youth, and ſerved as Cup-bearer to the Gods till the following misfortune happened to her in a grand entertainment. She fell, and ſo diſcloſed to the Gods whatever was hid under her petticoats, by which accident ſhe loſt her employment (97). I am not ignorant that other authors declare her to be daughter of Jupiter and Juno, after the common way.

I muſt here refute Natalis Comes, who probably has miſguided ſome Lexicographers. He ſays that Juno, exaſperated at the birth of Minerva, beſought heaven and earth, and the celeſtial and infernal Gods, to cauſe her to bring forth without the conjunction of a male. She ſtruck the earth with her hand, and at the expiration of a certain term the earth brought forth Typhon. Quæ cum manu humum percuſſiſſet, ſequenti poſtea tempore natus eſt ex ea terra Typhon, &c. (98). To prove this he quotes ſome Greek verſes, which manifeſtly ſignify that Juno brought forth Typhon. How well does he underſtand what he alledges?

Homer, in the Hymn to Apollo, relates this ſtory ſo clearly, that it is ſurprizing ſo many authors ſhould have taken one for the other. He ſays that Juno having invoked heaven and earth, and all the infernal Gods, in order that ſhe might bring forth a ſon without the aid of Jupiter, ſtruck the earth and made it tremble, and took this earthquake for a good omen, and lived apart from her huſband during a year, at the end of which ſhe brought forth a ſon, who did not reſemble either men or Gods; and this was Typhon.

The father of the people, the magnificent, the great, the juſt, the wiſe, &c. are epithets or titles of diſtinction appropriated to certain Princes; but this cannot be ſaid of the title of King of France: nor can it be ſaid of the title of Queen of France. Now Juno in the above-mentioned verſe of Virgil is called Queen of the Gods, in the ſame manner as Anne of Auſtria, wife of Lewis XIII, was called Queen of France. Juno was the wife of Jupiter, King of Gods and men, Divum pater atque hominum Rex (106), as ſhe herſelf ſtiles him in the Æneid (107). In another place (108) ſhe tells him, that he reigns over all the Gods, σὺ δὲ πᾶσι μετ' ἀθανάτοισιν ἀνάσσεις. Had proofs been ſought for in Livy, good ones would have been found. [T] She did not begin to favour the Romans, till the ſecond Punic War.] Camillus, preparing to ſtorm the Veientes, offered the tenth part of the plunder to Apollo; and beſought Juno, protectreſs of the beſieged, to abandon them, in order to go to Rome, where a temple worthy of her ſhould be built. Tuo ductu, inquit, (Dictator) Pythice Apollo, tuoque numine inſtinctus pergo ad delendam urbem Vejos: tibique hinc decimam partem prædæ voveo. Teſimul, Juno Regina, quæ nunc Vejos colis, precor ut nos victores in noſtram tuamque mox futuram urbem ſequare: ubi te dignum amplitudine tua templum accipiat (110). After the ſacking of the city was ended, they proceeded to the removal of the Gods, and behaved with great reſpect on that occaſion. Some one aſked the ſtatue of Juno, whether ſhe was willing to come to Rome; whereupon ſhe made a ſign that ſhe was; and it is even pretended that ſhe ſaid yes. It was no trouble to remove her; and one would have thought that ſhe moved herſelf in order to follow the victors. Camillus conſecrated a temple in her honour on mount Aventinus, purſuant to the promiſe he had made her. Tum Junoni Reginæ templum in Aventino locavit dedicavitque Matutæ matri (111). Livy's words are ſo beautiful and remarkable, that the perſons who underſtand Latin, will be well pleaſed to read them, without having the trouble to ſtir out of their places. *Cum jam humanæ opes aſportatæ egeſtæque à Veiis eſſent, amoliri tum Deum dona ipſoſque Deos, ſed colentium magis quam rapientium modo, cœpere. At laſt one of them, " whether by inſpiration, or out of a juvenile frolick, " ſaying, Juno, will you go to Rome? the reſt cried " aloud that the Goddeſs nodded; whence a fable " was added, that a voice was alſo heard, which " ſaid yes. It is certain, that the removal of her " gave very little trouble, and that ſhe was carried " entire to mount Aventinus, her eternal ſeat or reſi- " dence, to which the vows of the Roman Dictator " had called her, and where the ſame Camillus af- " terwards conſecrated a temple in her honour." Plutarch makes Livy ſay, that Camillus, upon his deſiring Juno to come to Rome, touched the ſtatue of that Goddeſs; and that ſome anſwered that ſhe conſented, and would willingly follow him. Λιβιος δὲ φησιν εὔξασθαι μὲν τὸν Κάμιλλον ἀπόμενον τῆς θεᾶ καὶ παρακαλεῖν, ἀποκρίνασθαι δὲ τινας τῶν παρόντων ὅτι καὶ βούλεται καὶ συγκαλαινεῖ, καὶ συνακολουθεῖ προθύμως (113). Livius tradit inter precandum attrectaſſe Camillum Deam & invitaſſe: inde velle & annuere ac ſequi libentem reſpondiſſe ex adſtantibus nonnullos. Compare this with Livy's words, and it will appear very evidently that Plutarch did not underſtand them in any manner; or rather that he cites them without looking into that author, and that he has adulterated the circumſtances; and as he probably truſted to his memory on a numberleſs multitude of occaſions, I am afraid that, with regard to a great number of incidents, we find in Plutarch's writings, not what he had really read; but the idea which the hiſtories he had read, left in his imagination. The prayers which Livy aſcribes to Camillus, with reſpect to Juno, was before the taking of Veii; how then could he ſay that Camillus offered up his prayers, with his hands fixed on the ſtatute? Plutarch adds, that thoſe who aſſert that Juno's ſtatue ſpoke, either by ſigns or by words, that ſhe granted Camillius's prayers, have a very powerful argument to alledge, I mean the proſperity of Rome; for that city, ſays he, having been ſo ſmall, could not have raiſed itſelf to ſo exalted a pitch of power, had it not been perpetually favoured with the preſence of a God. Caius Cornelius Cethegus, who had devoted it four years before, when, being Consul, he was engaged in war against the Insubres (k), consecrated it in quality of Censor (l). And nevertheless, because some Poets have taken it into their heads to remove this æra to the (117) second Punic war (118), the Commentators depend on this fiction more than on the credit and authority of Historians. I here observe, that Juno, besides the temple which she had on mount Aventin, shared the temple of the Capitol with Jupiter and Minerva (119). The temple of Juno Moneta, which I shall mention in the following remark, furnishes me with a good proof.

[U] She was honoured at Rome . . . under . . . the title of . . Moneta.] It appears from several passages of the antients (120), that the epithet Regina was appropriated to the Juno, whom Camillus removed to Veii, and in whose honour he built a temple on mount Aventine. As to Juno Moneta, her seat was in the capitol. Valerius Maximus is perhaps the only author, who has confounded her with that Juno, in whose honour Camillus the Dictator built a temple on mount Aventine. I do not doubt but this is one of the numerous mistakes which are found in Valerius Maximus. Nec minus voluntarius, says he (121), Junonis in urbem nostram transitus. Captis a Furio Camillo Vejis, milites jussu Imperatoris simulachrum Junonis Monetæ, quod ibi præcipua religione cultum erat, in Urbem tralaturi, sede sua movere conabantur. Quorum ab uno per jocum interrogata Dea, an Romam migrare vellet, Velle se respondit. Hac voce audita, lusus in admirationem versus est. Jamque non simulachrum, sed ipsam cœlo Junonem petitam portare se credentes, læti in ea parte montis Aventini, in qua nunc templum ejus cernimus, collocaverunt. i. e. " Nor was the removal of Juno to our " city, less voluntary; for Veii having been taken " by Furius Camillus, the soldiers being ordered by " the Generalissimo to convey the statue of Juno Moneta, to which particular adoration was there paid, " to Rome, they accordingly set about removing it. " One of the persons who were employed on that occasion, asking the Goddess in a joking way, whether she would go to Rome, she answered yes. " The hearing her speak in this manner turned " their jesting into admiration: so that now imagining they were not carrying a statue, but the Goddess herself, they placed her joyfully in that part of " mount Aventine where her temple is now seen." Valerius Maximus's own words are sufficient to shew how strangely he confounds things; for he relates in another book (122), that the temple of the Goddess Moneta was on the capitol, in that part where Manlius's house had stood. Now Livy says, that the temple which was built where the house in question had stood, was devoted to Juno Moneta during the war of the Arunci; and it was consecrated the year after, i. e. the year of Rome 413 (123). Ovid, in the sixth book of the Fasti, agrees exactly in that particular with Livy. The verses where he mentions this informs us, that this temple was devoted by Camillus; upon which a critic observes (124), that nevertheless Plutarch does not say in any manner that Camillus had made such a vow; and relates only, that Manlius's house was razed with the ground; and that the temple of the Goddess Moneta was built on the same spot where the house in question stood. Doubtless this critic thought that the Camillus whom Ovid speaks of is the same whose life is written by Plutarch; he, I say, who exerted himself so strenuously in order to get Manlius punished. I do not think that Ovid is so grosly mistaken. The person who devoted the temple of Juno Moneta was the younger Camillus. We therefore must not wonder that the historian of Camillus the father should take no notice of that vow; but he may be blamed for relating so negligently the fate of the house of this Manlius. He says (125), that the Romans having demolished it, built on the same spot the temple of the Goddess Moneta, and enacted that thenceforward no Patrician should live in the capitol. No reader but would conclude, from such relations, that these three things were done at the same time. Who would imagine that this temple was not devoted till above forty years after the execution of Manlius? There is a circumstance in Cicero which perplexes a little here, viz. that Juno, who had a temple on the capitol, was sirnamed Moneta, because she had advised the Romans to sacrifice a sow big with young. Scriptum a multis, cum terræ motus factus esset ut sue plena procuratio fieret, vocem ab æde Junonis ex arca exiisse, quocirca Junonem illam appellatam Monetam (126). i. e. " It is " related by many authors, that an earthquake happen- " ing, a voice issued from the shrine in Juno's temple, " commanding an expiation to be made by sacrificing " a sow big with young, whence that Juno was called " Moneta." According to this, we should say that there was a temple of Juno on the capitol, before that the younger Camillus the Dictator devoted the temple of Juno Moneta; or we should say that he only devoted a temple to Juno; but that in after-ages this Goddess got the surname of Moneta, because of the counsel she gave in that temple. The first of these two hypotheses has no foundation in any author; and the second would prove historians to be guilty of an extreme negligence, since they observe expressly that this Camillus the Dictator devoted a temple to Juno Moneta, which was built on the same spot where Manlius had lived. Perhaps this obscurity might be removed, if it were supposed that the place whence Juno gave the advice or counsel, was the chapel which had been built in her honour on the capitol (127). From that time she might have been (128) sirnamed Moneta, without having a particular temple built to her under that epithet; but during the war of the Aurunci, Camillus would have built a temple in her honour, under that sirname which she had already. This would be a proof that she had advised the Romans before the year 413, and consequently that her favour for Rome preceded the second Punic war. Rosinus (129) makes Cicero say, that the earthquake which was the occasion of Juno's advising the sacrifice of a sow big with young, happened before the Gauls took Rome. But Rosinus is mistaken, Cicero not having writ any such thing.

antiquity.] Tatius the collegue of Romulus had eſtabliſhed the honours which were paid to Juno Quiritia or Quiritis (130). It appears that under the reign of Tullus Hoſtilius, the Pontifs being conſulted with regard to the expiation of involuntary murthers, cauſed two altars to be ſet up, and there performed the ceremonies which they thought requiſite, in order for the purifying of Horace who had killed his ſiſter. One of theſe altars was conſecrated to Juno (131) and the other to Janus (132). It is related that (133) before this time there ſtood in Rome a temple of Juno built by Numa Pompilius; and that this Prince being deſirous of gaining the favour of that Goddeſs, *forbid, by an expreſs law, all looſe women from entering into that temple . . . or even touching it. This dialogue is not the leaſt beautiful paſſage in the Æneid; it contains Juno's reſolution not to perſecute Æneas any longer, and the favour ſhe aſked in recompence for her deſiſting on that occaſion. [Y] Very great honours were paid her in other cities of Italy] She was worſhipped under the title of Soſpita, with great devotion at Lanuvium, near Rome in the Via Appia. The Romans were ſo fond of this worſhip that the Conſuls at the beginning of their conſulſhips, were obliged to go and pay homage to that Juno. Nolite à ſacris propriis Junonis ſoſpitæ, cui omnes Conſules facere neceſſe eſt, domeſticum & ſuum Conſulem potiſſimum avellere (135). When the inhabitants of Lanuvium were made citizens of Rome, it was enacted, that this worſhip ſhould be common to them with the Romans. Lanuvinis civitas data, ſacraque ſua reddita cum eo ut ædes lucuſque Soſpitæ Junonis communis Lanuvinis Municipibus cum populo Romano eſſet (136). There was a treaſure in the temple of that Goddeſs, out of which Auguſtus took conſiderable ſums, and promiſed to pay the intereſt (137). 'Tis thought that this temple was founded by the Pelaſgi, who came originally from Peloponneſus; and this opinion is ſupported by Ælian's calling the Juno of Lavinium, Juno Argolica (138). Here follows a deſcription of the Goddeſs's dreſs. Noſtram ſoſpitam . . . tu nunquam me in ſomnis quidem vides, niſi cum pelle caprina, cum haſta, cum ſcutulo, cum calceolis repandis (139). i. e. " You " do not ſee Jupiter Soſpita, our Goddeſs, even in " dreams, without her goatſkin, her ſpear, her ſhield, " and her ſhoes bent backwards." It is not obſerved in this paſſage, whether the goatſkin had horns, but ſome very learned men do not doubt but it had. " It " is certain that the head of Juno of Lanuvium was " veiled with a goat's ſkin, on which were real horns; " and this is plainly ſeen in Goltzius's Roman me- " dals, and in that mentioned by Vigenere, in his an- " notations on Livy." Theſe are de Girac's words in ſection lxv. page 556 of his reply. In the margin of his book are the following words. Romani Junonem Soſpitam colebant, cujus caput pellis caprina cum cornibus exornabat (*). i. e. " The Romans worſhipped " Juno Soſpita, whoſe head a goat's ſkin with horns " adorned." Take particular notice of what follows. The ſerpent of the temple of Lanuvium was ſomething miraculous, it being able to tell whether a girl had loſt her virginity or not. See Ælian (140).

Juno LACINIA, whoſe temple was ſix miles from Crotona, was prodigiouſly famous. This temple was twice as ſpacious as the greateſt temple in Rome (141). It was covered with marble tiles, if I may uſe the expreſſion, part whereof were carried to Rome, to cover the temple of Fortuna Equeſtris, which Quintus Fulvius Flaccus the Cenſor was building; but as he loſt his life in a miſerable manner, the Senate cauſed the tiles to be carried to the ſame place whence they had been taken (142). Hannibal did not execute the deſign that was formed, viz. of carrying off the golden column that ſtood in the temple of this Juno (143). Pliny relates that the aſhes which were left on the altar of that Goddeſs, expoſed to all the inclemencies of the weather, never moved from the place where they had been laid. In Laciniæ Junonis ara ſub dio ſita, cinerem immobilem eſſe perflantibus undique procellis (144). Servius relates another miracle; viz. that if any one carved or engraved his name on the tiles of this temple the engraving faded away the inſtant ſuch perſon died. In hoc templo illud miraculi fuiſſe dicitur, ut ſi quis ferro in tegula templi, ipſius nomen incideret, tamdiu illa ſcriptura maneret, quamdiu is homo viveret qui illud ſcripſiſſet (145). Livy alſo relates a miracle, viz. that the cattle of all kinds conſecrated to the Goddeſs grazed in the meads belonging to the temple, without any perſon's looking after them; and uſed to retire voluntarily in the evening, for ever unmoleſted with wild beaſts or robbers. Læta in medio paſcua habuit (Lucus) ubi omnis generis ſacrum Deæ paſcebatur pecus ſine ullo paſtore, ſeparatimque egreſſi cujuſque generis greges, nocte remeabant ad ſtabula, nunquam inſidiis ferarum, non fraude violati hominum (146). He intimates plainly enough, that he would not ſwear this was true; and that the ſtory concerning the immoveable aſhes was no leſs doubtful. Somes miracles, ſays he, are generally aſcribed to theſe ſorts of places. Miracula aliqua affinguntur plerumque tam inſignibus locis. Fama eſt aram eſſe in veſtibulo templi, cujus cinerem, nullus unquam moveat ventus. No people underſtand this better than the Chriſtian Monks. He adds that this temple was not only famous for its holineſs but alſo for its riches. Inclytum divitiis etiam non tantum ſanctitate fuit (147).

It is no wonder that opinions have been divided with reſpect to the founder of this temple, and the occaſion of its foundation; for all nations are prompted to invent a thouſand pretty particulars on thoſe ſubjects. See Servius (148) who relates, among other opinions, that King Lacinius built it in honour of Juno, becauſe ſhe hated Hercules whom he had refuſed to entertain in his palace. But if we ought not to wonder at the variations in this reſpect, we nevertheleſs cannot but wonder that authors ſhould not be agreed concerning the ſituation of this edifice. Livy fixes it at ſix miles diſtance from Crotona. Sex millia aberat ab urbe (149) nobile templum ipſa urbe nobilius, Laciniæ Junonis ſanctum omnibus circa populis (150). i. e. " At ſix miles diſtance from the city, was a noble " temple erected to Juno Lacinia, which boaſted " greater magnificence than the city itſelf, and was " held as ſacred among all the people." But Valerius Maximus fixes it at Locri, and this is not the only point in which he differs from Livy. Here follow his words: Q. Fulvius Flaccus impune non tulit quod in cenſura tegulas marmoreas ex Junonis Laciniæ templo in ædem Fortunæ Equeſtris, quam Romæ faciebat, tranſtulit. Negatur enim, poſt hoc factum, mente conſtitiſſe: quin etiam per ſummam ægritudinem animi expiravit, cum ex duobus filiis in Illyrico militantibus, alterum deceſſiſſe, alterum graviter audiſſet affectum. Cujus caſu motus ſenatus tegulas illico Locros reportandas curavit: decretique circumſpectiſſima ſanctione impium opus cenſoris retexuit (151). i. e. " Q. used in it as the Argives had consecrated to her worship. This we are told by Dionysius Halicarnasseus in the twenty first chapter of his first book.

I should be glad to know, whether any of the Sages among the Heathens took notice of a circumstance, which methinks occurs very naturally, viz. that no one participated less of a happy life, a state that is very essential to the Divine Nature (n), than the greatest of all the Goddesses. It is scarce possible to figure to one's self a more wretched state than that of Juno. I do not infer this from the nature of her employments, how laborious and disagreeable soever they might be [Z]; and though they have so disordered in his senses after this action; nay, that extreme sorrow killed him, when news was brought that, of two sons who served in the wars at Illyricum, the one was dead, and the other very sick. The Senate being struck with this action caused the tiles to be carried back immediately to Locri; and, by the most circumspect sanction of a decree, took down the Censor's impious work." I have followed the relation above with regard to the motive which prompted the Senate to restore the tiles; but I reserved to my self the right of rectifying particulars, as occasion might require, from the account which Livy gives. The reader therefore is to know, that this grave Historian observes that Fulvius Flaccus the Censor used his utmost endeavours, in order that the temple which he was building might not be inferior to any temple in Rome, with regard to magnificence and grandeur. He imagined that a marble roof would greatly heighten the splendor of this edifice, and therefore he half uncovered the temple of Juno Lacinia. Profectus in Brutios, ædem Junonis Laciniæ ad partem dimidiam detegit, id satis fore ratus ad tegendum quod ædificaretur (152). This was enough for his purpose. Having removed those marble tiles to Rome, he was far from blabbing whence he had taken them; however, it was publickly known, which occasioned such murmurings, that the Consuls were forced to consult the Senate on that affair. The Senate then sent for Flaccus; and having suffered him to be some time exposed to the most bitter taunts of every kind, they made an unanimous resolution, that the tiles should be carried back to Juno's temple; and that the Goddess should be appeased by those things which the ceremonies prescribed. Livy's words have inchanted me to such a degree, that I fancy they will be very agreeable to most of my readers, the expressions being charming, and the thoughts very elevated. Postquam censor rediit, tegulæ expositæ de navibus ad templum portabantur: quanquam unde essent silebatur, non tamen celari potuit. Fremitus igitur in curia ortus est: ex omnibus partibus postulabatur, ut consules eam rem ad senatum referrent. Ut verò accersitus in curiam censor venit, multo infestius singuli universique præsentem lacerare: Templum augustissimum regionis ejus, quod non Pyrrhus, non Annibal violassent, violare parum habuisse, nisi detexisset fœde ac prope diruisset. Detractum culmen templo, nudatum tectum patere imbribus putrefaciendum. Censorem moribus regendis creatum, cui sarta tecta exigere sacris publicis & loca tuenda more majorum traditum esset; eum per sociorum urbes diruentem templa, nudantemque tecta ædium sacrarum vagari, & quod, si in privatis sociorum ædificiis faceret, indignum videri posset, id Deûm immortalium templa demolientem facere, & obstringere religione populum Romanum, ruinis templorum templa ædificantem: tanquam non iidem ubique Dii immortales sint, sed spoliis aliorum alii colendi exornandique. *Quum, priusquam referretur, appareret quid sentirent Patres: relatione facta in unam omnes sententiam ierunt, ut hæ tegulæ reportandæ in templum locarentur, piacularia*que Junoni fierent (153). i. e.

(152) Tit. Liv. lib. 42. cap. 3. It was this made me say, above, after Cluverius, Ital. Antiquæ, lib. 4. cap. 15. that the temple of Juno Lacinia was twice as spacious as the greatest temple in Rome.

"After the Censor's return, the tiles were carried "from the ships into the temple; and though endeavours were used to conceal the place whence they "came, yet this could not be done. Upon this a "murmur broke out in the Senate; all insisting to "have the Consuls lay that affair before the Senate. "But when the Censor, upon his being summoned, "came in, all the assembly attacked him with still "greater violence: Was it not, said these, sufficient, "that he did not scruple to violate the most august temple in all that country, which Pyrrhus as well as "Hannibal had spared; but he must shamefully uncover it, and almost pull it down; that when the roof "was taken from the temple, it was exposed to the inclemency of the weather: that a Censor, elected in "order to superintend the morals of the people; and to "whom, pursuant to the custom of our ancestors, the "care of repairing places devoted to public worship is "committed; this Censor, I say, marched up and down "the cities of the allies, uncovering and beating down "their temples; and behaving with that indignity towards the temples of the immortal Gods, which, if done "to the private houses of our allies, would be thought "shameful: that he had laid a burthen on the consciences of the Romans, raising temples with the ruin of temples; as if the immortal Deities were not the same in all "places, but that some were to be adorned and embellished with the spoils of others. The opinion of the "Fathers being given before the question was put, "they all unanimously declared, that the tiles in "question should be carried back to the temple, and "offerings made to Juno, in order to appease that "Goddess." The decree made by the Senate was not executed in all respects; for those persons who were commanded to see the roof repaired, declared, that no workman had been able to fix the tiles again in their places, and therefore they had been left in the court of the temple. Quæ ad religionem pertinent cum cura facta: tegulas relictas in area templi, quia reponendarum nemo artifex inire rationem potuerit, redemptores nuntiarunt (154). Flaccus did not leave off building; he compleated, consecrated it, and exhibited the Ludi Scenici for four days, and the Circensian Games for one day. Fulvius ædem Fortunæ equestris, quam Proconsul in Hispania dimicans cum Celtiberorum legionibus voverat, annos sex postquam voverat, dedicavit, & scenicos ludos per quatriduum, unum diem in circo fecit (155). Here then is a notable difference between Livy and Valerius Maximus, and which shews that the latter of these two authors has done great injury to the Roman Senate; he supposes that they did not think of repairing the damage, till after they had seen the grievous punishment which heaven had inflicted on Flaccus the Censor. But Livy informs us, that the Senate was prompted to this action of piety and justice, from the bare consideration of the incident, and without having seen any traces of the wrath of heaven. He does not deny the fatal end of this Censor, and even represents it more fatal than Valerius Maximus has done; for he says that Fulvius Flaccus hanged himself; and adds, that it was a saying among the common people, that Juno had deprived him of his senses. Q. Fulvius Flaccus pontifex, qui priore anno fuerat censor . . . . . fœda morte periit. Ex duobus filiis ejus qui tum in Illyrico militabant, nunciatum alterum decessisse, alterum gravi & periculoso morbo ægrum esse. Obruit animum simul luctus, metusque: mane ingressi cubiculum servi, laqueo dependentem invenere. Erat opinio, post censuram minus compotem fuisse sui: vulgo Junonis Laciniæ iram ob spoliatum templum alienasse mentem ferebant (156). The incident with respect to the taking away the marble tiles from the temple of Juno, is fixed to the year of Rome 579.

They mention a hundred ſuch paſſages, and ſpeak of the epithets pronuba, jugalis, ζυγία, γαμηλία, παράνυμφος, &c. which were appropriated to the conſort of Jupiter, becauſe ſhe preſided over matrimonial contracts. See the following remark. This office or employment required great care and aſſiduity; there were a numberleſs multitude of things to do, and it was exceedingly difficult to diſcharge it with honour. Had ſhe had no other buſineſs but to join people together in wedlock, the difficulties would not have been ſo conſiderable; the diſpoſition of the parties and the inclination which nature inſpires, might have ſaved the ſuperintendant-general much trouble; but a Goddeſs of the firſt rank was prompted from the motives of her honour and glory, to take care that people ſhould marry happily; I mean that conditions and tempers ſhould be ſo matched as to form an indiſſoluble bond of friendſhip and concord; and hence all marriages that were ill ſuited and unhappy, muſt neceſſarily give her uneaſineſs; they being as ſo many blots to her reputation, and ſo many juſt occaſions of reproaching her, that the care which had been taken to invoke her, and to honour her on the nuptial day, was all loſt labour. All thoſe who ſhould be inclined to ſlander her, had a fine handle; for in ſhort, either Juno uſed her utmoſt endeavours to procure happy marriages, or ſhe did not. If the former, people had reaſon to conclude, that ſhe was very miſerable, in having an employment wherein ſhe exhauſted all the efforts of her ſtrength and induſtry, and yet could not help being unſucceſsful on a thouſand occaſions. The numberleſs experiments, wherein the unſucceſsfulneſs of her endeavours appeared, was a proof, either that the ſubject ſhe had to work upon was very difficult, or that her power was greatly limited. In the firſt caſe, her ill fortune, or the deplorable rigour of her fate, or her imprudence were manifeſt; for, if ſhe was not allowed to reſign an imployment, wherein, tho' ſhe uſed her utmoſt endeavours, ſhe yet could not help being unſucceſsful on a thouſand occaſions, her fate merited compaſſion. But on the other ſide, if ſhe were allowed to reſign her office, and yet ſhe was reſolutely determined to keep it, her judgment and prudence might juſtly be called in queſtion (158); and ſhe continued unjuſtly in an office, that was above her abilities, and which ſhe diſcharged to her diſhonour. It would have been a trifling excuſe for her to ſay, that her good intentions were traverſed by the whim and caprice of another Goddeſs.

This would have been to acknowledge the limitation and dependence of her power; a confeſſion that would have been inexpreſſibly mortifying, with regard to a Goddeſs of ſo haughty a diſpoſition as Juno. This is what might be ſaid upon the ſuppoſition that ſhe diſcharged the duties of her office to the beſt of her power; but if it had been ſuppoſed that ſhe could have acquitted herſelf better in it, ſhe would have been thought guilty of extreme negligence or malice; and conſequently as very unworthy of the honours that were paid her, and the employment with which ſhe was inveſted. Such are the reflexions which the heathens ought to have made naturally. Now the reſult of theſe ideas is, to judge that her condition was unhappy, either by reaſon of the great pains her employment required, or becauſe of the ill ſucceſs it was attended with. Her rank and her ſex made her extremely affected with contempt and diſgrace; and it might naturally be ſuppoſed that ſhe had ſenſe enough not to be ignorant of what things might be cenſured in her adminiſtration; and to imagine that the reſt of the Gods blamed her for it (160); and that if they had the complaiſance not to do it in her preſence, or not to inform her of the diſadvantageous things which were ſaid of her, they nevertheleſs aſperſed her behind her back, or at leaſt thought diſadvantageouſly of her. This was enough to afflict a captious, haughty, ambitious perſon; and 'tis a ſufficient mortification to ſuch a one, to be ſenſible that her faults are known to the world.

(160) The Heathens imagined that the Deities were ſuſceptible of jealouſies, quarrels, diviſions and ſuch like irregularities.

All the reflexions abovementioned, might be made with regard to Juno, as the Goddeſs who preſided over child-births. How troubleſome muſt that office be! 'twas the way not to enjoy a moment's reſt, and to be obliged to labour in a thouſand places at the ſame time. This employment is obnoxious to many unpleaſing accidents. In ſpite of all the art of the ableſt ſurgeons, yet many children who, at their coming into the world, lie croſſwiſe, ſome one way and ſome another, loſe their lives with their mothers. Theſe misfortunes were ſo many ſubjects of reproach for the cenſurers of Juno, who had been fruitleſsly invoked under particular and ſpecific names, according to the diverſity of the caſes (161). I am ſenſible it may be aſſerted with great probability, that we muſt not reduce to Juno ſingly, but variouſly named, all the Deities who preſide over marriages, childbirths &c; but on the other ſide it is very probable, that thoſe Deities ought to be conſidered as ſo many Subſtitutes or Deputies of the Superintendant-General; whence it follows that the diſorders and misfortunes might very juſtly be imputed to the Goddeſs Juno, in like manner as the male-adminiſtration of the Governours of provinces is aſcribed to a Prince when he does not apply a remedy to it. Beſides, Juno's having ſo many Subſtitutes ſhews, that her employment was thought too laborious. Now thoſe ſeveral ideas or reflexions include ſuch a judgment as is diſadvantageous to her. We muſt add to all this, that the Goddeſs was diveſted of her two moſt glorious employments; for the care of reconciling married perſons was committed to another Deity Viriplaca (162) by name; and the care of the converſion of wives, whoſe unchaſte conduct had gained them the ill-will of their husbands, was committed to Venus Verticordia (163). Now was it not a ſignal affront to Juno, to diveſt her in this manner of part of her ſuperintendance over marriage?

[AA] ... and though they have ſo juſtly given occaſion for turning the theological ſyſtem of the heathens into ridicule.] The ſurnames of Pronuba, Jugalis, &c, which the reader may have ſeen above (164), were not the only ones which were peculiar to Juno, as the Goddeſs who preſided over marriages: ſhe alſo had particular ſurnames, grounded on her preſiding over the behaviour and conduct of brides, over their huſband's houſe... and over the anointing which the bride made on the door-poſts of her huſband's houſe... and becauſe ſhe aſſiſted the bridegroom in looſing the virgin zone (165). The reader will find theſe ſurnames in the following Latin paſſage, extracted from a prayer offered up to Juno (166): Interducam, or Iterducam, & Domiducam, Unxiam, Cinctiam (167) mortales puellæ debent in nuptias convocare, ut earum & itinera protegas, & in optatas domos ducas, & cum poſtes ungent, fauſtum omen affigas, & cingulum ponentes in thalamis non relinquas. It was not expected that ſhe ſhould ſtop at the door of the nuptial chamber; her aſſiſtance was likewiſe deſired in the nuptial bed, ſhe entring it under the title of Dea mater Prema, and of Dea Pertunda, accompanied with Deus pater Subigus. It is upon this that St. Auſtin has ridiculed heatheniſm; and as it was ſcarce poſſible to employ only grave expreſſions on ſuch a ſubject, he has ſhewed the impertinence of it after a pretty free as well as gay manner. I ſhould expoſe myſelf to the cenſure of all thoſe who ſet up for ſcrupulous judges of ſtyle, and of all readers of a ſerious caſt of mind, ſhould I tranſlate exactly into French the words of that father, and for that reaſon I ſhall give them in Latin (168). Cum mas & fœmina conjunguntur, her husband's mistresses and bastards, merely to sooth the jealousy with which she was tortured. She was as strongly affected with this passion as could be expected from her haughty and imperious humour, which her characters of sister and wife to the greatest of all the Gods inspired. This sensibility made her tortures less supportable, and prompted her to hurry over land and sea, to procure the pleasure that arises from revenge. She did not omit any thing to satiate it, and was restless; but she never had the satisfaction of a complete and perfect success [BB], and she was for ever obliged to begin junguntur, adhibetur deus Jugatinus. Sit hoc ferendum. Sed domum est ducenda, quæ nubit, adhibetur deus Domiducus. Ut maneat cum viro, additur dea Manturna. Quid ultra quæritur? Parcatur humanæ verecundiæ: peragat cætera concupiscentia carnis & sanguinis procurato secreto pudoris. Quid impletur cubiculum turba numinum: quando & paranymphi inde discedunt? Et ad hoc impletur, non ut eorum præsentia cogitata major sit cura pudicitiæ, sed ut fœminæ sexu infirmæ, novitate pavidæ, illis cooperantibus sine ulla difficultate virginitas auferatur. Adest enim dea Virginensis, & deus pater Subigus, & dea mater Prema, & dea Pertunda, & Venus, & Priapus. Quid est hoc? Si omnino laborantem in illo opere virum ab diis adjuvari oportebat: non sufficiebat aliquis unus, aut aliqua una. Nunquid Venus sola parum esset, quæ ob hoc etiam dicitur nuncupata, quod sine ejus vi fœmina virgo esse non desinat? Si ulla est frons in hominibus, quæ non est in numinibus? Nonne cum credunt conjugati tot deos utriusque sexus præsentes, & huic operi instantes, ita pudore afficiuntur, ut & ille minus moveatur, & illa plus reluctetur? Et certe si adest Virginensis dea, ut virgini zona solvatur: si adest deus Subigus, ut viro subigatur; si adest dea Prema, ut subacta ne se commoveat, prematur, dea Pertunda ibi quid facit? Erubescat, eat foras, agat aliquid & maritus. Valde inhonestum est, ut quod vocatur illa, impleat quisquam nisi ille. Sed forte ideo toleratur, quia deæ dicitur esse, non deus. Nam si masculus crederetur, & Pertundus vocaretur, majus contra eum pro uxoris pudicitiæ pesceret maritus auxilium, quam Fœta contra Silvanum (169). Sed quid hoc dicam, cum ibi sit & Priapus nimis masculus, super cujus immanissimum & turpissimum fascinum sedere nova nupta jubebatur more honestissimo & religiosissimo matronarum? These objections are prodigiously strong; and I do not see how it would be possible for the ablest apologists for the heathen religion to evade them well. The censure, which St. Austin grounds on the unnecessary multiplication of Deities, was alone sufficient to confound them. Was it not the utmost diffidence of human strength to imagine that Venus stood in need of the succour of three or four other Deities? We only conceive that an apologist might have answered, that St. Austin was in the wrong to object, as an useless circumstance, and which left nothing for the husband to do, the joyning of the Goddesses Pertunda, and mater Prema; for according to this detestable system of theology, the one was not less or more necessary than the other, and neither of them excluded the efforts of the bride and bridegroom. There therefore was some little inaccuracy in this part of St. Austin's objections. Perhaps the common answer of the heathens at that time was to say, that the multiplication objected to, was only a multiplication of the names of the same Deity. But this would have been a poor answer; the books of the heathens themselves suggesting the refutation of it.

(169) St. Austin had observed just before, that some Deities were appointed to look after lying-in women, in order that the God Sylvanus might not come and torment them. Mulieri fœtæ post partum tres Deos custodes commemorat (Varro) adhiberi, ne Sylvanus Deus per noctem ingrediatur & vexet.

It may be observed transiently that those Philosophers who undertook to answer the Christian Doctors, had a very hard task. They were punished for the folly of others. The antient Priests had committed the fault, by ridiculously transplanting the vile fictions of the Poets into the public worship; and the Philosophers were obliged many ages after, to bear all the ignominy of these fopperies; and to torture their brains day and night, to parry thrusts that pierced them through. If those who invented so ridiculous a worship, had been attacked by as dextrous and powerful adversaries as St. Austin, they would have been more circumspect, and not have given such a loose to their impostures; and this is one disadvantage that results from the unity of religion. It must be owned that the diversity of religions has also its inconveniences, and even such as may be very justly dreaded; but then it hinders depravity and corruption from making a certain progress, and obliges the members of the several religions to stand in awe of one another.

[BB] Her jealousy ... prompted her to hurry over land and sea, to procure the pleasure that arises from revenge ... but she never had the satisfaction of a compleat and perfect success.] Consider the journey she took from heaven to earth, the instant she suspected that a cloud which she spied, might serve as a veil under which her faithless husband was clasped in the embraces of some damsel. Juno was not mistaken, Jupiter being at that time with Io. He transformed her into a heifer, to prevent his wife from catching him in the act. Juno requested to have this heifer, and had it watched by Argus; and afterwards tormented her with a fury which made her run up and down to every part of the earth; and at last was forced to let Io resume her first shape, and become the Goddess Isis (170). Consider also the supplications which Juno went and made to Tethys and Oceanus, after she had spied the same Calisto among the stars which she had changed into a bear. She had treated this mistress of Jupiter in a most outrageous manner; had taken her by the hair of her head, and thrown her upon the ground.

But let us hear her doleful lamentations. Nothing can be more dismal. She is afraid of being hereafter the butt for all affronts, since the efforts she employs to satiate her vengeance, terminate only in the glory of her enemies.

If ever ſhe had reaſon to be ſatisfied, it was when ſhe perſecuted the nymph Thalia (175) whom Jupiter had got with child. The only way by which this nymph could poſſibly eſcape, was, to be ſwallowed up in the bowels of the earth; but when her reckoning was out, the two children ſhe went with ſprung forth nevertheleſs, and became afterwards two celebrated deities (176) to whom extraordinary veneration was paid (177); and thus Juno's joy was very ſhortlived. She diſcovered ſo much obſtinacy in perſecuting Hercules, that Porphyrius has compared her to ſuch of the moſt wicked devils, who perſecute perſons of virtue and probity. Τὸς γὰρ Δαίμονας διαγράφων τῷ λόγῳ (ὁ Πορφύριος) λέγει που, τὸς φαυλοτάτους Δαίμονας τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς ἀνδράσι λόχας καὶ ἐνέδρας καθίζειν, καὶ ἐξαίφνης ἐπιτίθεσθαι, καθάπερ ἡ Ἥρα τῷ Διονύσῳ καὶ Ἡρακλεῖ. Dæmones enim oratione deſcribens (Porphyrius) alicubi ait: peſſimos Dæmonas bonis viris inſidias & pericula tendere, exque eos inſidiis aggredi, ut Juno ſcilicet Baccho atque Herculi (178). But what did ſhe gain by this? Nothing except toil, ignominy and confuſion. She complained of this in the theatres, and in ſuch a manner as might have moved the moſt flinty hearts. Read the following verſes of Seneca; he therein declares that ſhe baniſhes herſelf from heaven, ſince it is filled with nothing but her huſband's whores and baſtards. She expects to ſee Hercules aſcend thither, whom ſhe had ſo often attempted to deſtroy, and who by that means had made himſelf immortal.

The ſatisfaction of ſeeing the ruin of Troy was a very inconſiderable conſolation for the torments ſhe had ſuffered during the long reſiſtance made by the Trojans; and ſhe ſoon was forced to toil anew in order to perſecute Æneas, and prevent his landing in Italy. She exerted her utmoſt endeavours on that occaſion; ſhe went to Æolus to requeſt a tempeſt from him; ſhe cajoled him, and behaved with great humility before him (181). Another time ſhe placed herſelf on a very cold cloud (182), and expoſed herſelf to the inclemencies of the weather, whilſt a battle was fighting between the party ſhe protected and the party ſhe hated. But all this was loſt labour. Read what deſpair extorted from her, before ſhe had recourſe to Æolus.

This is only a ſpecimen of the hiſtory of the Goddeſs in queſtion, but it is ſufficient to ſhew that the heathens muſt have been perſuaded that ſhe was one of the moſt unhappy Beings in the univerſe; and as fit to furniſh a picture of extreme infelicity as Prometheus on mount Caucaſus, Siſyphus, Ixion, Tantalus, the Danaides, and the reſt of the mighty offenders delivered over to infernal puniſhments. No words can be truer than thoſe of Horace:

This ſuits principally with the jealouſy that breaks out between huſbands and wives. What muſt it then be when it is joined to the uninterrupted toils occaſioned from a fruitleſs deſire of ſatiating one's vengeance? The being born immortal ſo far from ſoftning the pangs of this ſad condition, ſerves rather to increaſe it; for the hope of death's putting an end to a perſon's ſorrows and uneaſineſſes adminiſters ſome conſolation.

It may be obſerved, that if the heathens did not make the reflections diſplayed in the preceding and preſent remark, they are quite inexcuſable; for it was not only from the Poets that they were informed of this unhappy life of Juno; theſe ſtories were taken in as part of the public worſhip, and there were monuments of them in the temples; the conſecrated ſtatues, pictures of devotion, thoſe objects which are called the books of the ignorant, informed every one of the jealouſy of that Goddeſs &c.

[CC] The misfortune ſhe had to loſe her cauſe, in a diſpute for the prize of beauty.] Minerva and Venus were her two rivals. It is univerſally known that Jupiter (189) not being willing to ſit as judge in ſo delicate a trial, cauſed theſe three Goddeſſes to be carried on mount Ida, in order to plead their cauſe in that place, and that Paris ſhould decide the controverſy. Juno dreſſed herſelf in the moſt ſplendid manner poſſible, and promiſed Paris mighty things, in caſe he would decree to her the apple, which was to be given to the moſt beautiful of the three Goddeſſes. Both Minerva and Venus dreſſed themſelves to all the advantage in their power, and made the moſt laviſh promiſes to their judge. But the pains they took to trick themſelves up, and make ſpeeches were all loſt; Paris declaring that he would ſee the three competitors naked before he would pronounce ſentence.

He here only puts into verſe what Jean le Maire de Belges, Illuſtrat. de Gaule, liv. 1. chap. 33. pag. 108. had ſaid in proſe.

" Your mighty diſcord from your beauties ſpring;
" But here reveal your naked charms, and I

" And now the Deities were quite undreſs'd,
" In bright confuſion lay their ſhining crowns,
" Their girdles, ſtomachers, their pins and bracelets,
" Their precious rings, their petticoats and mantles,
" Whence ſcents exhal'd that quite perfum'd the air.
" But wiſely they their gilded ſlippers kept,
" To guard their tender feet from pointed thorns,
" They naked all to lovely Paris move,
" And dart their charms on his admiring eye.

The French Poet who gives us this deſcription, forgot one important circumſtance, viz. that the three Goddeſſes bathed in a fountain. This we are told by Euripides (191), and there are ſome epigrams on that ſubject in the Anthologia (192). Jupiter's wife was therefore forced to ſubmit to very diſagreeable conditions; for, after all, ſhe profeſſed modeſty; ſhe was grave and majeſtic, and knew how to maintain her ſtate; and notwithſtanding all this, ſhe yet was forced to appear ſtark naked before a mortal; and the worſt was, another Goddeſs appeared more beautiful in the eye of the appointed judge, and Venus carried off the golden apple. He did not ſo much as hint, that he ſaw any beauties in the face, ſhape or gait of the three litigants; on the contrary, he had declared, while he ſurveyed them dreſſed, that they appeared equally lovely in his eye. As he therefore gave ſentence againſt Juno, after comparing what their clothes had till then concealed, it was an indication that he diſcovered ſome ſignal imperfections in her. At leaſt this might be ſuſpected, and ſuch a reflection muſt neceſſarily be a cruel mortification to the Goddeſs in queſtion (193), and enough to make her quite frantic. I am ſurprized that Lucian did not exerciſe a little his pointed wit on this ſubject, in his Dialogue on the Judgment of Paris. Conſult the margin (194). Scarron was not ſo diſcreet, he jeſting as follows in his firſt book of Virgil Traveſti.

It is related that after her marriage was conſummated, ſhe waſhed herſelf in a ſpring or fountain lying between the Tigris and Euphrates; and that from this incident, the waters of that ſpring diffuſed a moſt agreeable odour, which perfumed the air round about it [DD]. Juno was a beautiful Goddeſs, on which account it may be ſaid, that the adulterous

An author who flouriſhed in the beginning of the 16th century, declares that Juno did not ſhew herſelf quite naked. She and Minerva, ſays he (196), being overcome with ſhame, and not willing to do it, did not anſwer a word when it was ſignified to them, that they muſt take the pains to diveſt themſelves of their noble robes, ſince their conteſt related to the compariſon of the beauty of their divine bodies; and in a prudent diſtinction of the choice and preference of their wonderful limbs. But Venus, the boldeſt of the three Goddeſſes, ſaid, that things were gone ſo far there was no going back, and thereupon began to unlooſe her girdle. " Juno ſeeing " this, ſpoke thus: Lady Venus, we do not intend " to refuſe this, for fear of being overcome: but I " think it indecent for immortal and chaſte Goddeſſes; " even for Pallas who is a virgin, and me who am " the wife of a King and Emperor, to appear naked " before any mortal man, how little you, who fre- " quent male company with ſo little ſcruple, may " think of it. However, ſince this is a thing that " muſt be done, we will not be the laſt . . . . (197). " Queen Juno, being full of the gravity that becomes " matrons, and decent modeſty, kept none of her or- " naments on, except that ſhe took a fine crape " handkerchief, long, wide, and extremely thin; all " hemmed with gold and ſilk fringes, with which " one of her nymphs was adorned. And ſhe put it " on her left ſhoulder hanging it ſcarf-wiſe, and tied " in a knot on her right ſide. And becauſe the ends, by " their being ſo light, wantoned ſometimes in the wind " more than ſhe would have them do, as ſhe walked a- " long ſhe held one of her hands on her breaſt (pis) (198), " and the other lower." Now I fancy that all this is a meer fiction of the author's invention, Lucian not hinting any thing like it. Be this as it will, Juno diſcovers an extreme reſentment for the horrid affront, which ſhe imagined her Judge had put upon her. This was a wound that continued bleeding a long time, and diſquieted her mind all the remainder of her life.

I ſhall obſerve by the way, that Macrobius is miſtaken in one of the differences he has obſerved between Virgil and Homer. His words are as follow: Nullam commemorationem de judicio Paridis Homerus admittit: idem vates Ganymedem non ut Junonis pelicem a Jove raptum, ſed Jovialium poculorum miniſtrum in cœlum a Diis aſcitum refert, velut Θεοπρεπῶς. Virgilius tantam deam, quod cuivis de honeſtis fœminæ deforme eſt, velut ſpecie victam Paride judicante doluiſſe, & propter catamiti pelicatum totam gentem ejus vexaſſe commemorat (200). It is certain that Homer has mentioned the judgment of Paris, and gives it as the cauſe of the implacable hatred which Juno entertained againſt the Trojans (201): it therefore is not true, as Macrobius aſſerts, that Virgil has departed from Homer with regard to that point. It would be to no purpoſe to ſay, here, that Euripides (202) and Coluthus (203) mention this judgment of Paris.

He tells us (204) that this fountain was tranſparent quite to the bottom; and that the inhabitants of the country, as alſo the Syrians, had the tradition abovementioned; and attributed to it the agreeable odour that was diffuſed in the neighbourhood of that place. Ἐς νῦν ὁ χῶρος ἡδείαν ἀναπνεῖ, καὶ πᾶς ὁ αὐλὼν κύκλῳ τούτῳ κίρναται (205). Unde locus etiamnum ſuavem odorem ſpiret, qui in vicinum etiam aerem circumquaque diſtribuitur. This ſhews the character of a ſuperſtitious and fabulous caſt of mind united. People are eaſily prompted to derive from ſome celeſtial origin, all the ſingular properties they obſerve in certain places of the world; and as the Heathens ſuffered themſelves to be impoſed upon by a chimerical and ſilly tradition of the amours and marriages of the Gods; they fancied that Juno, deſirous to bathe the day after her nuptials, made choice of a very clear fountain for that purpoſe, and left ſome marks of her preſence there. Obſerve that the Deities, according to Turnebus, were diſcovered by the odours they diffuſed (206).

and that another Poet declares that as much nectar flowed from this God, as was ſufficient to form the rivers of the golden age. Balzac adds that, he who is called in Matthieu's hiſtory the Chryſoſtom of France, did not ſcruple to ſay, in a ſermon he preached before Henry IV, Sir, though your Majeſty ſhould weep pearls, ſhould ſpit emeralds; though rubies ſhould iſſue at your ſneezing, and diamonds when you blow your noſe, &c. Now it would not have been a very difficult matter to perſuade the Heathens, that the Gods really did all this. Their children are made to believe, that Urganda, for inſtance, or ſome other fairy, whilſt her head is combing, and aſking, what is it that falls from my head? heard with pleaſure the following anſwer, gold and ſilver. Moſt people who believed this in their childhood, would entertain that belief all their life-time, were they not undeceived when they come to years of diſcretion; or if they found that theſe things were the common opinion in matters relating to faith. By the way, there are many natural properties, which the traditions of Chriſtians aſcribe to miraculous cauſes, in like manner as the Heathens aſcribed to Juno the fragrancy of the ſpring or fountain abovementioned. Do you ſee, (ſaid a perſon to me one day) that ſmall tract of land where the graſs looks ſo pale. It was that way ſuch a martyr went, when he was led from the priſon to the place of execution. adulterous amours of Jupiter were the more criminal [EE]. It would be meer wrangling to animadvert on Arnobius, who has formed that judgment of it. The ſuperſtition of the Romans roſe to that exceſs, that ſome women honoured Juno, by making as though they combed and dreſſed her, and by holding a looking glaſs to her [FF]; but others ſtood in little fear of Juno; for they uſed to go and ſeat themſelves in the Capitol, near her huſband, whoſe miſtreſſes they fancied themſelves to be. Read my laſt remark.

content themſelves with collecting thoſe particulars which relate to great cities; but a collection of what concerns pariſhes in villages would alſo be of value. This recalls to my memory what I heard a judicious man ſay, that his taſte was not like that of the antient father of the church, who wiſhed to have ſeen a triumphial entry into Rome. With regard to myſelf, ſaid the gentleman in queſtion, I had rather have been preſent during ſome months at the converſations of the citizens of Rome, and know the manner in which the women practiſed their devotions, and how they ſpoke of Jupiter and Juno; what was their common diſcourſe on a wedding day, on a day of child-birth, a day of a general proceſſion, a day of Lectiſternium &c. with regard to the Gods and Goddeſſes, Subigus, or Subiga, Fabulinus, Pertunda, and the reſt. Books do not teach thoſe minute particulars, and nothing but converſation can bring us to the knowledge of them.

[EE] Juno was a beautiful Goddeſs, on which account it may be ſaid, that the adulterous amours of Jupiter were the more criminal.] In this manner Arnobius argued: Et quid regi Saturnio matrimoniis fuerat cum alienis rei? Non illi fuerat ſatis Juno, nec ſedare impetum cupiditatum in regina poterat numinum, cum nobilitas eam commendaret tanta, facies, oris dignitas, & ulnarum nivei marmoreique candores (213)? i. e. "What buſineſs had Jupiter to concern himſelf "with the wives of others? Was not Juno ſufficient "for him; and could he not ſatiate his laſciviouſneſs "with the Queen of the Gods, ſo renowned for her "noble air, her beauty, and ſnowy arm?" A cavilling Sophiſter might attack this argument of Arnobius, and ſay that the beauty of women, at the end of a certain period, loſes all its power with reſpect to their huſbands; things being of ſuch a nature, that uſe makes us to be no longer affected with them, ab aſſuetis non fit paſſio. He would maintain, that the following political axiom, that thoſe are the beſt methods for preſerving of dominion and power, which were employed for the acquiring them; Imperium facile iis artibus retinetur quibus initio partum eſt (214), is falſe with regard to the empire of beauty; for if beauty atchieves conqueſts, it does not preſerve them; a huſband who fell in love with his wife merely for her outward charms, does not continue to be paſſionately fond of her, becauſe ſhe ſtill preſerves her beauty; cuſtom makes him grow obdurate with reſpect to that kind of charm, and he grows more inſenſible every day: ſome become ſooner ſo, and others later; but at laſt all arrive at it; and the fondneſs which may be, and is often perceived in reality, is not grounded on beauty, but on other qualities. Experience ſhews, that ſuch huſbands as have handſome wives, are not generally thoſe whoſe love for them is ſtrongeſt and moſt laſting. We muſt look elſewhere than in beauty for that charm which firſt unites hearts, and afterwards keeps them united.

A Sophiſt might produce ſeveral other obſervations of the ſame kind; but after all, he ought to be looked upon as a caviller; for it is certain that Arnobius's remark is grounded on a kind of common notion. A whole neighbourhood ſhall be much more ſcandalized at the amours of a man who has a handſome wife, than at the intrigues of another whoſe wife is ugly. A people, how numerous ſoever they may be, will unanimouſly be more indulgent to the gallantries of their King, when the Queen is deformed and very loathſome, than if he were married to a Princeſs of a rare and exquiſite beauty. Some one has inſerted in the Scaligerana a tale that has ſome relation to this. "Por- "thaiſe a famous Preacher, delivering a ſermon in Poic- "tiers, and having heard of the intrigues of one "Lumeau a Phyſician, who, though he had a pretty "handſome wife, went ſometimes aſtray; pointed him "out one day whimſically enough in the pulpit, "when, after having exclaimed againſt that vice in "general, he deſcended to particulars, and ſaid; We "have even heard with concern, that ſome men are "ſo abandoned as to commit adultery, though they "have wives at home who are ſo agreeable, that for "our parts we ſhould be very well ſatisfied with "them (216)."

[FF] Some woman honoured Juno, by making as tho' they combed and dreſſed her, and by holding a looking-glaſs to her.] What pity it is that we have not that book in which Seneca condemned that baſe ſuperſtition, and many others of the ſame caſt. St. Auſtin has cited it. In Capitolium perveni, ſaid Seneca (217), pudebit publicatæ dementiæ, quod ſibi vanus furor attribuit officii: alius nomina Deo ſubjicit, alius horas Jovi nunciat, alius lictor eſt, alius unctor, qui vano motu brachiorum imitatur ungentem. Sunt, quæ Junoni ac Minervæ capillos diſponant, longe a templo non tantum a ſimulachro ſtantes, digitos movent ornantium modo. Sunt quæ ſpeculum teneant . . . ſedent quædam in capitolio, quæ ſe Jove amari putant, nec Junonis quidem, ſi credere Poetis velis, iracundiſſimæ reſpectu terrentur. i. e. "I came "ſaid Seneca, into the capitol; you will bluſh at the "publick madneſs, which is idly practiſed under the "notion of honouring the God: One gives him a "catalogue of names; another informs Jupiter what "hour of the day it is; another is a lictor, another "an anointer, who, flouriſhing his arm, imitates "the action of one that anoints. Some are buſied in "diſpoſing the hair of Juno and Minerva, ſtanding "far, not only from the temple, but likewiſe from the "ſtatue; making a motion with their fingers as tho' "they were adorning the ſtatues. Some hold a look- "glaſs . . . . . Some women are ſeated in the capitol, "imagining that Jupiter is in love with them; nor "are terrified, if the poets may be credited, with the "aſpect of Juno, tho' moſt highly exaſperated." This may be confirmed by a paſſage extracted from a work that is ſtill exſtant: Deum colit qui novit. Vetemus lintea & ſtrigiles Jovi ferri, & ſpeculum tenere Junoni (218). i. e. "He worſhips a God who knows him. "I forbid towels and ſcrapers uſed in baths to be car- "ried to Jupiter, and the holding a looking-glaſs to "Juno."

Saturn who perpetrated this was treated ſo exactly in the ſame manner, that Jupiter employed, for the lopping of his Pudenda, the very ſame inſtrument with which he had emaſculated Cœlus (4). It is to be obſerved, that Saturn's party made a pretty long reſiſtance, it not being overpowered till after it had ſuſtained a ten years war (5). Saturn being overcome was loaded with chains, and precipitated into Tartarus, the darkeſt and deepeſt dungeon in Hell; and was as far diſtant from the earth, as the earth is from Heaven. The beſt allegories that can be found to be ſhadowed under theſe fictions, is to ſay that the antients intimated thereby that ambition extinguiſhes all natural affection, and all the duties of friendſhip and alliances. Natalis Comes who is very fond of allegories ſpeaks as follows (13): Nulla ſunt enim vel naturæ, vel amicitiæ, vel beneficentiæ ſatis firma vincula, ubi majeſtatis & imperandi furioſum deſiderium invaſerit: illa omnia ſiquidem facillime conculcantur & proſternuntur (13); and to ſay alſo, that poets and orators are ever ready to declare for that party which is victorious.

[B] He alſo committed inceſt with his ſiſters, his daughters and Aunts.] He lay with his ſiſter Juno before ſhe was his wife, and afterwards married her. This I have mentioned elſewhere (14). He debauched his other ſiſter Ceres, and had Proſerpine by her. He lay with three of his aunts, viz. Themis, Dione, and Mnemoſyne. From his inceſtuous commerce with the firſt ſprung the Horæ and Parcæ; by the ſecond he had Venus, and the nine Muſes by the third (15). Seeing one day his mother aſleep, he attempted to lie with her inſidiouſly; but ſhe waking, and making reſiſtance, he employed force; and would in all probability have accompliſhed his abominable deſign, had not the ſtruggles he made to overpower his mother, exhauſted his fire (16). Arnobius makes the following juſt exclamation on this occaſion. O rerum imaginatio indecora, o habitus fœdus Jovis ad obſcœni certaminis expeditionem parati! Ergone ille rex mundi, cum incautus & properus obreptionis eſſet rejectus à furto in impetum ſe vertit: & quum rapere voluptatem inſidioſa fraude non quivit, vi matrem aggreſſus eſt, & apertiſſime cœpit venerabilem ſubruere caſtitatem? Colluctatus ergo diutiſſime cum invita eſt, victus, fractus, ſuperatuſque, defecit: & quem pietas dijugare ab infando matris non valuit appetitu, effuſa libido dijunxit (17)? i. e. " O unſeemly " image of things! O foul attitude of Jupiter prepared " for the obſcene engagements! And did this monarch " of the univerſe, when he could not extort the bliſs " by inſidious fraud, attempt to raviſh his mother by " force? He ſtruggled long with the reluctant God- " deſs, and being at laſt defeated was forced to de- " ſiſt; and he whom filial piety could not reſtrain " from impiouſly coveting the embraces of his mother, " was prevented from enjoying her by his paſſion be- " ing extinguiſhed." He obſerves that the heathens took the advantage of theſe vain efforts of Jupiter, they ſaying that he impregnated a ſtone, and that it was delivered of a ſon ten months after. Et ſane hoc loco frugalitatis magnæ viri, & circa res etiam flagitioſi operis parciores, ne ſancta illa ſeminia fruſtra videantur effuſa, ſilex, inquit, ebibit Jovialis incontinentiæ fœditatem. Quid deinde, quæſo, conſecutum eſt, dicite? In ſinu medio lapidis, atque in illa cotis duritie informatus atque animatus eſt infans, Jovis magni futura progenies, &c (18). Such a kind of propagation was obſerved with regard to the efforts which Jupiter made to lie with his daughter Venus. This maiden, tho' on other occaſions ſo willing to grant the higheſt favours, did nevertheleſs reſiſt Jupiter with great vigour. I explain this in the margin, by the words (which indeed are a little coarſe) of a modern author (19). Arnobius mentions another attempt in which Jupiter was ſucceſsful; but it is according to the opinion of thoſe who ſaid that Ceres was that God's mother. Quondam Dieſpiter, inquiunt, cum in Cererem ſuam matrem libidinibus improbis atque inconceſſis cupiditatibus æſtuaret, nam genitrix hæc Jovis regionis ejus ab accolis traditur, neque tamen auderet id, quod procaci appetitione conceperat, apertiſſima vi petere, ingenioſas comminiſcitur captiones, quibus nihil tale metuentem caſtitate imminueret genitricem: ſit ex Deo taurus, & ſub pecoris ſpecie ſubſeſſoris animum atque audaciam celans; in ſecuram & neſciam repentina immittitur vi furens, agit inceſtius res ſuas, & prodita per libidinem fraude, intellectus, & cognitus evolat (20). i. e. beasts, in order to proceed in his intrigues. He even was guilty of sodomy, he carrying off the beautiful Ganymedes (a); and raised him to the employment of cup-bearer to the Gods, in order that he might be ever ready at hand, whenever he wanted to satiate his brutal passion with him. Frauds and perjuries, and in general all actions punishable by the Laws, were very familiar to him (b). It is even said that he devoured one of his wives [C]. Nothing therefore can be more monstrous than the Religion of the Heathens, according to whom such a Deity was looked upon as the supreme master of all things; and who adapted the religious worship they paid him to that idea. The fathers of the Church have laid great stress on this argument, to prove thereby the falsity of the Religion of the Heathens; and it may be asserted, that this system seemed calculated to deprave

" when she was unguarded, and perpetrated the incest; " but the obscene action discovering him, he fled a- " way." In vain Ceres was offended, this congress made her pregnant of Proserpine, who, when she was of age to inspire an amorous passion, underwent the same trials as her mother. Jupiter deflowered his daughter Proserpine. Quam (Proserpinam) cum verveceus Jupiter bene validam, floridam, & succi esse conspiceret plenioris, oblitus paulo ante quid malorum & sceleris esset aggressus, & temeritatis quantum, redit ad priores actus: & quia nefarium videbatur satis, patrem cum filia comminus uxoria conjugatione misceri, in draconis terribilem formam migrat: ingentibus spiris pavefactam colligat virginem, & sub obtentu fero, mollissimis ludit atque adulatur amplexibus (21). i. e. " The lecherous Jupiter observing Proserpine to be " strong, florid, and flushed with health, and for- " getting his rash actions, and the guilt he had lately " perpetrated, returned to his former pranks; and " because it looked as criminal for a father to be- " have towards his daughter as though she were a " wife, he assumed a serpent's dreadful form; he " winded his monstrous folds about the trembling vir- " gin; and under this savage disguise, he clasped and " sported with her in the softest manner." Meziriac (22) quotes several authors, who relate that Jupiter, transformed into a serpent, got his daughter Proserpine's maidenhead, and had by her the first Bacchus surnamed Zagræus. I will conclude this remark with a passage from Arnobius. Quid tantum, quæso, says he to the Heathens (23), de vobis Jupiter iste, quicunque est, meruit, quod genus est nullum probri infame, adulterium nullum, quod in ejus non caput, velut in aliquam congeratis vilem luteamque personam? i. e. " This Jupiter, whoever he be, how came he to de- " serve so well of you; he who did not scruple to " commit any crime though ever so infamous, nor " any adulterous action, like the meanest and most " abandoned of mortals?" This is quite putting the heathen system to a nonplus.

(25) Natal. Comes, Mytholog. lib. 2. pag. m. 90.

Since the first edition of this Dictionary, I have examined this matter with greater accuracy; and find that Natalis Comes does not advance any particular but what is founded on the words of Joannes Diaconus whom he cites. This Diaconus is a Greek author and a Christian, who composed allegories and scholia on Hesiod's Poem, intitled, Θεογονία, or the generation of the Gods. He declares in positive terms that Jupiter, having swallowed his wife Metis, brought forth Minerva; καὶ ταύτην καταπιὼν ἀποτίκτει ἐκ τῆς τριτογένειαν Ἀθηνᾶν; he uses, I say, those words, immediately after having employed the words contained in the passages of Natalis Comes above cited; and thereby evidently declares, that he would have it supposed that Minerva sprung from Jupiter's head, because Metis when big with child had been devoured by Jupiter her husband. But Hesiod does not lead us to this thought; nor so much as hints that the tragical end of Metis contributed to Minerva's birth. Here follows the substance of his narration (26). Metis, the first wife of Jupiter, was going to be delivered of Minerva, but Jupiter prevented her, he inveigling and imposing upon her with flattering words, and swallowed her into his belly. Cœlus and Terra had given him this counsel; and told him, that if he did not do this, he should lose his scepter, since the destinies declared that Metis, after being delivered of the wise Minerva, would bring forth a brave boy, who should reign over Gods and Men. Jupiter averted this fatal blow, he swallowing Metis before she became a mother; he shutting her up, I say, in his bowels, in order that she might foretel him good and evil. Ἀλλ' ἄρα μιν Ζεὺς πρόσθεν ἐὴν ἐγκάτθετο νηδύν, ὡς δή οἱ φράσσαιτο θεὰ ἀγαθόν τε κακόν τε. Sed illam sane Jupiter ante in suum condidit ventrem. Ut nempe ei indicaret dea bonumque malumque (27). He afterwards married Themis, who brought him many children, as did also his mistresses. Eurynome, daughter of Oceanus, brought him the three Graces; after which he lay with Ceres by whom he had Proserpine. He next fell in love with Mnemosyne, and made her mother of the nine Muses. Latona brought him a son and daughter, viz. Apollo and Diana; and lastly, he married Juno by whom he had three children, Hebe, Mars and Lucina; and Jupiter himself gave birth to Minerva, who sprung from his head. It is plain that if Hesiod intended his readers should suppose, that he meant, that this birth of Minerva was the effect of Metis's being shut up in Jupiter's belly, he had done all that was necessary to frustrate his design; he putting between this effect and cause such an interval, as leads our thoughts to a thing quite foreign to his intention. Let us therefore conclude that he had no such intention; or else, that he surpassed every author in the shameful art of giving a wrong account of an incident, and expressing it obscurely. Observe, that if the nineteen verses found in a work of Galen (28) are really Hesiod's, we could not blame that Poet for having been too obscure. We there see very clearly, that the same Pallas who sprung from the head of Jupiter, was concerned in Metis's womb; but it must be observed that she was not conceived in it, till after Metis had been swallowed up by Jupiter. This is a variation that deserves to be taken notice of. I add, that it is no ways probable that the verses in question were written by Hesiod; was he the author of them, there would be, in his Poem on the Generation of the Gods, a chasm which has escaped the notice of the critics. Galen deserves censure in some little measure, for not quite putting it out of doubt, whether the pronoun αὐτὸς, ipse, before the nineteen verses, refers to Hesiod or Chrysippus. I am of opinion that it refers to the latter; and that this great Philosopher, after citing the verses of Hesiod which relate to Metis, had quoted those of another Poet, wherein the conception of Minerva was described a little differently. If it should be asked, why Chrysippus quoted the verses from Hesiod and the others? I answer, that it was in order to shew, that his opinion with regard to the seat of the rational soul, was not contrary to the tradition concerning Minerva's birth. He supposed the heart to be the seat of the rational soul;

deprave and corrupt mens manners [D]. I ſhall take no notice of the fictions which relate to Jupiter's birth or education (c). Moreri has taken ſome notice of them; and they are found in a great number of books that are read daily in ſchools. I ſhall ſpeak only of the eagle which carried Nectar to him [E], this not being ſo common an incident. Charpentier does not relate faithfully a particular for which he quotes Homer [F].

(c) I ſhall make ſome mention of this in the article METHYDRIUM.

What the heathens have ſaid with regard to the origin of Jupiter, appeared to me for a long time ſo unaccountable, that the more I reflected on it the more monſtrous it appeared to me; and ſuch, in ſhort, that I concluded it was impoſſible the Philoſophers could have maintained it; but I at laſt diſcovered, that they might be led into this error, by I know not what kind of reaſoning [G], the weakneſs whereof it was no eaſy matter ſoul; and yet Minerva, that is reaſon and wiſdom, ſprung from the brain of Jupiter. This is an objection which Chryſippus examined; he took advantage of the circumſtance of Minerva's being conceived by Metis, after Jupiter had ſwallowed her; and aſſerted that this ſignified, that reaſon was formed in the boſom or breaſt; and that the bringing forth of Minerva, ſignified ſpeech, i. e. that reaſon proceeds from the head, in as much as the mouth is the organ by which the thoughts, conceived in the heart, are brought forth outwardly. Galen (29) thinks it very ſtrange that Chryſippus ſhould ſpend his time in ſo carefully explaining poetical traditions (30). He deſerves the higheſt cenſure for trifling away his time in ſuch a manner.

(32) Meziriac, on Ovid, pag. 419, 420.

Meziraic makes this remark on a paſſage of Ovid, where Phædra (33) obſerves, that it was fitting the crime of inceſt ſhould be ſcrupled in the rude times under Saturn; but that a woman in the reign of his ſucceſſor, ought to be allowed to lie with her ſon-in-law. Jupiter's marrying, ſays ſhe, his ſiſter gives an entire ſanction to it.

"Affright; theſe ſcruples under ruſtic Saturn
"Were good, but baniſhed in politer times.
"Jove bids enjoy whatever we approve;
"And all permits, ſince he his ſiſter married.

Ovid commits a very groſs error on this occaſion (34), ſince Saturn was married to his ſiſter, as certainly as Jupiter was with his. One might add to the paſſage of Euripides cited by Meziriac, an hundred others equally ſtrong. Nothing is more common in the antient Poets, than to read of people who, to excuſe their crimes, aſſert, either that they did but imitate the Gods, or that the Gods excited them to commit evil (35). But not to diſſemble the truth, it muſt be obſerved to the glory of the heathens, that they did not live in conformity to their principles. It is true indeed that the heathens were exceedingly depraved and corrupted in their morals; but then many among them did not follow the example of their falſe Gods, and preferred the ideas of virtue to ſo great an authority. A ſtrange circumſtance is, that Chriſtians, whoſe ſyſtem of religion is ſo pure, ſhould yet fall but very ſhort of the heathens in their vices. It is a miſtake to imagine that the morals of a religion correſpond with its tenets.

[E] I ſhall ſpeak only of the eagle which carried Nectar to him.] A woman, Moero by name, author of a poem intitled Memory (36), ſays that Jupiter was fed unknown to all the Gods, in a cave in the iſland of Crete, by doves who carried Ambroſia to him, and an eagle who conveyed to him Nectar. The Ambroſia was brought from the ocean, and the Nectar was drawn from a ſtone. Jupiter, after he had dethroned Saturn, made that eagle immortal, and carried it to heaven.

[F] Charpentier does not relate faithfully a particular for which he quotes Homer.] I mean Mr. Charpentier of the French Academy. He expected to make a ſpeech to the King, at the head of the Academy, after the taking of Mons; but that monarch would not be complimented, in a ſpeech, on that occaſion. That of Charpentier was inſerted in the Mercure Galant for May 1691. The King is there deſcribed as Homer's Jupiter, againſt whom all the other Gods are united; and who, after upbraiding them with the vanity of their deſign, ſhews them experimentally that his ſtrength is immoveable; and whilſt they all exert their ſtrength in pulling againſt him, he lifts them all up with the globe of the earth and ſea. But with his leave, Jupiter in Homer (38) does not actually do this; he only boaſts and threatens to do it.

(38) See the beginning of Book 8. of the Iliad.

The reſt of the Gods did not think his vauntings to be juſt. They only ſaid, that he would be ſtronger than any of them ſingly; but his menace ſeemed ridiculous to Mars, who remembered that, not long before, Neptune, Juno and Minerva, having undertaken to ſeize and bind Jupiter, filled him with dread; and would certainly have bound him, had not Tethys pitied the God in queſtion, and called Briareus with his hundred arms to his relief (39). Had Charpentier known the ſatyrical turn of mind of our libel-writers, he very probably would have forbore making compariſons and ſimilitudes, and Lucian would have occurred to his memory.

[G] They might be led into that error by I know not what kind of reaſoning.] Let us firſt hear what Heſiod relates concerning the genealogy of the Gods (40). He begins with the chaos which is the firſt being he ſuppoſes. He next brings in earth and love; adds that Erebus and night were begot by the chaos, and that the Æther and the day ſprung from the marriage of Erebus and night; and that the earth, without contracting marriage, begot heaven and the ſea; and afterwards being married to heaven, ſhe procreated the Ocean, Rhea, Themys, Tethys, Saturn, &c. However, this extremely prolific marriage gave but little ſatisfaction and comfort to the earth; Heaven, her huſband, matter for them to diſcover. They did not think it poſſible for any thing to have been created, and did not admit of ſubſtances wholly diſtinct from extenſion. Now when theſe two hypotheſes are once eſtabliſhed, it is almoſt as eaſy to ſuppoſe that refined or ſubtilized matter could become God, as to believe the ſoul of man material, as moſt Philoſophers believed. See the remark G. In Arcadia there ſtood a temple ſacred to the band, impriſoning all their children, in proportion as ſhe was delivered of them. Upon this, ſhe excited them to revenge, and was ſo ſucceſsful, that Saturn lopped off with a ſingle ſtroke of a ſcythe his father's pudenda, and threw them into the ſea (41). Theſe produced a froth or foam whence ſprung the Goddeſs Venus. The children of Saturn and Rhea were Veſta, Ceres, Juno, Pluto, Neptune and Jupiter (42). This is what I have extracted from Heſiod's poem. There were ſome other genealogiſts (43) who ſaid that Æther and day, children of Erebus and night, were the father and mother of heaven; and that their brothers and ſiſters were love, fraud, fear, labour, envy, fate, old age, death, gloom, miſery, dreams &c. I related above (44), how Carneades employed this genealogy to refute the theology of the Stoics. I ſhall only ſay here, that according to the tree of conſanguinity, there muſt neceſſarily have been ſome God whoſe father was not God: for if, on one hand, it had been granted Carneades, that heaven, the æther, the day, Erebus and night were Deities; it would have been denied him on the other hand, that the chaos, which was antecedent to all thoſe divine beings, was God; and conſequently, thoſe who argued in this manner were forced to ſay, that the Gods had been formed of a matter which was not God, and without an efficient cauſe which had the nature of God. Such an idea certainly contradicts the moſt ſolid and moſt evident notions of natural reaſon; nevertheleſs ſome great Philoſophers have ſuppoſed the generation of the Gods, and have aſſigned them a cauſe of their being, which was not God. Anaximenes omnes rerum cauſas infinito aeri dedit, nec deos negavit aut tacuit: non tamen ab ipſis aerem factum, ſed IPSOS EX AERE ORTOS credidit (45). i. e. "Anaximenes aſcribed the cauſes of all things to the boundleſs air, "nor did he deny that there were Gods, or was ſilent "with regard to them; yet he did not believe that "the air was created by them, but that THEY SPRUNG "FROM THAT ELEMENT." We underſtand the principles of Anaximenes better by the abovementioned words of St. Auſtin, than by the following ones of Cicero. Anaximenes aera ſtatuit, eumque gigni, eſſeque immenſum & infinitum, & ſemper in motu (46). i. e. "Anaximenes thought that the air was God; that it "was procreated; was immenſe and infinite and ever "in motion." In all probability Cicero did not well relate the ſentiment of this Philoſopher; for ſince Anaximenes aſcribed to the air the nature of the principles of all things, and aſcribed to it immenſity and infinitude; we muſt believe that he ſuppoſed it eternal and unproduced; and that if he called it God under that idea, he did not believe the generation of God in that reſpect. When therefore he ſaid that the boundleſs or infinite air was the cauſe of all beings; and that the Gods themſelves had been produced from it, he did not preſcribe to it the name and nature of God, in the ſame ſenſe that he aſcribed it to the Gods who derived their origin and exiſtence from the air. Perhaps he meant this. He was willing, in order to avoid all diſputes about words, to call God the immenſe and infinite air, which he conſidered as the principle of all things; but he did not pretend, that Saturn, Rhea, Jupiter, Juno, Neptune, Minerva, and the reſt of the Gods whom the heathens worſhipped, were that air, or had produced it: on the contrary, he ſuppoſed that this air was their principle, as well as that of the other beings which compoſe the univerſe. He aſcribed to this principle a perpetual motion, whence we may conclude, that he looked upon it as an immanent cauſe, which produced in itſelf a numberleſs multitude of effects, inceſſantly without end; and he included among theſe effects, not only ſtars and meteors, plants, ſtones and metals, but alſo Gods and men. Such a doctrine was in reality that of Spinoſa; for according to this opinion, the God, or the eternal and neceſſary being of Anaximenes, was the only ſubſtance of which heaven, earth, animals &c. were but modifications. Thales perhaps entertained ſuch an opinion, he who had taught that water was the principle of all things (47). He perhaps had called him God on that account: this was the God he meant, when he ſaid, that God not having been begotten or produced was the moſt antient of all beings. Πρεσβύτατον τῶν ὄντων, θεός. ἀγένητον γάρ, κάλλιστον, κόσμος· ποίημα γὰρ θεοῦ. Antiquiſſimum eorum omnium quæ ſunt, Deus; ingenitus enim. Pulcherrimum, mundus, à Deo enim factus eſt (48). He added, that as the world was the work of God, it was the moſt beautiful of all beings (49). Spinoza would acknowledge as much. He does not deny that God is the cauſe of all things, that is, the immanent cauſe, which modifies itſelf a numberleſs multitude of ways, whence reſults all that we call the world, and the whole univerſe in general. If Thales ſaid alſo that the world is animated and filled with ſpirits (50), this perhaps might ſignify that water, the principle of all things, the unproduced or uncreated God, had modified itſelf in ſuch a manner that it had formed a ſoul diffuſed through all bodies, and particular ſpirits like to the Gods, who were worſhipped under the heathen ſyſtem. This would aſſiſt our underſtanding what we have ſeen elſewhere (51), and which doubtleſs is very ſurprizing, viz. that Thales and the other Naturaliſts who preceded Anaxagoras, have explained the generation of the world, without ſuppoſing it to be directed by a divine intelligence. Thales and Anaximenes could not admit it, if the one ſuppoſed that water, the other that air, were the principle of all things, a principle eternal and uncreated; for though, to avoid a contention about words, they called God that univerſal and uncreated principle, they could not conſider it as an intelligent cauſe, antecedently to the particular beings it formed, ſince it produced them in itſelf and from itſelf, as an immanent cauſe, and not as an external cauſe and diſtinct from its matter. But becauſe Anaxagoras was the firſt (52) who acknowledged a ſpirit diſtinct from the matter of the world; a pure ſpirit unmixed with bodies, he muſt have reaſoned in a different manner from the Naturaliſts his predeceſſors; he might ſay, arguing conſiſtently, that the world had been formed by the direction of a ſpirit which diſintangled and put the parts of matter into order. His hypotheſis admitted an intelligence antecedent to the formation of the world; the other hypotheſis ſuppoſed nothing to have exiſted before the world except the chaos, water or air &c: and thus they were to give a beginning to intelligent beings, as well as to the moſt groveling creatures. All things iſſued from the firſt principle by way of generation or production. Jupiter the greateſt of the Gods, his father Saturn, Cœlus, his grandfather Æther, and whatever can be named ſtill more backward, was a particular being, which owed its origin, its birth, its exiſtence to eternal and uncreated matter, the principle of all things, the chaos according to Heſiod, water according to Thales, and air according to Anaximenes. But, will it be ſaid, did not Thales confeſs, that the Gods know the very thoughts of men? Ἠρώτησέ τις αὐτὸν εἰ λήθοι θεὸς ἄνθρωπον ἀδικῶν· Ἀλλ' οὐδὲ διανοούμενον ἔφη. Interrogatus lateret ne Deos homo male agens: ne cogitans quidem, inquit (53)? I anſwer, what is that to the purpoſe; all we can conclude is, that he aſcribed a vaſt extent of knowledge to ſome of the beings. which water had generated, and which were called Jupiter, Juno, Venus, Neptune &c. It is to be obſerved that Homer, who gives ſo pompous a deſcription of the power of the Gods, ſuppoſes they all ſprung from the ocean.

"Ocean and Tethys——— (54)." POPE.

The prodigious abſurdity of theſe hypotheſes is to ſay, that the Gods, though endowed with great knowledge, were formed from a principle which knows nothing; for neither the chaos, the air, nor the ſea are thinking beings.

the good God. Pauſanias conjectures that this temple was conſecrated to Jupiter; and for this reaſon, becauſe the epithet juſt mentioned ought to ſuit, by way of eminence, the greateſt of the Gods [H]. It is certain that Jupiter's goodneſs was denoted by ſeveral ſurnames under which he was worſhipped; but then he alſo was worſhipped under ſeveral ſurnames, which declared him to be a moſt terrible Deity: nay, his employment of thunderer was denoted by the bare idea of his deſcent upon earth [I]. There were ſome beings. How then was it poſſible for them to be the total cauſe of thoſe divine natures or beings, who, according to the ſyſtem of the Poets and moſt antient Naturaliſts, poſſeſſed ſuch various knowledge? But how falſe and ridiculous ſoever theſe hypotheſes may be, I am no longer ſurprized, as I uſed to be, at their having been admitted by Philoſophers. Moſt of them ſuppoſed that the ſoul of man is material (55). They therefore imagined that it was formed of the moſt ſubtil parts of the blood, or of the ſeed. Now as ſoon as this ſtep is taken, we make great advances in a little time. Set aſide experience, conſult only the ideas of theory, and it will not appear eaſier for matter received in the womb to transform itſelf into a child, who by taking in ſuſtenance, becomes a man of great genius, than for a child to be born of a tree. Thence a heathen thinks it poſſible that men, in the beginning of things, ſprung either from the mud of the earth, or from ſome liquor that fell from heaven (56). The inſtant this ſeems poſſible, people are eaſily prompted to believe what the Poets related concerning the birth of Venus (57). They no longer think it ſtrange that, by the fermentation, which cleared or diſintangled the chaos, or formed various degrees of rarefaction and condenſation in the infinite expanſe, the ſtars ſhould have begun to exiſt in the firmament, and the Gods in heaven, as plants and animals on the globe of the earth. The common difference of the heathens concerning the divine nature, ſuppoſed only a greater or leſs difference between the Gods and men. Now, in conſequence of this nothing prevented their imagining, that the moſt refined and moſt ſubtle parts or particles of matter had compoſed or formed Gods; ſince ſuch parts as were groſs and ſolid, and which, as the lees and ſediment of the whole had formed the earth, were nevertheleſs transformed into men. I am to obſerve the heathens imagined, that ſome ſpirituous particles falling from heaven, were ſufficient to animate theſe groſs terreſtial parts; and hence it is, that Lucretius acknowledges that living bodies have a celeſtial original.

" Grow ſtrong, and propagate their race, and live;
" Thence juſtly all the name of mother give."
CREECH.

To theſe we may add the following lines from Book II, beginning at the 325th verſe of Virgil's Georgicks.

Tum pater omnipotens fœcundis imbribus æther.
Conjugis in gremium lætæ deſcendit & omnes
Magnus alit, magno commixtus corpore, fœtus.

" Into his buxom bride his fruitful ſhow'rs.
" And mixing his large limbs with hers, he feeds
" Her births with kindly juice, and foſters teeming ſeeds."
DRYDEN.

From all this it may be inferred, that nothing can be more dangerous or epidemical, than to lay down a falſe principle. It is a bad leaven, which though ſmall, may ſpoil the whole lump. An abſurdity once laid down, draws a great many after it. Should a perſon err only concerning the human ſoul; ſhould he falſely imagine that it is not a ſubſtance diſtinct from the underſtanding; this falſity may lead him to a perſuaſion, that there were ſome Gods who firſt ſprung from fermentation, and afterwards multiplied by marriage. I cannot conclude without taking notice of a particular which quite aſtoniſhes me. Methinks nothing can be grounded on clearer and more diſtinct ideas than the immateriality of every thinking being, and nevertheleſs ſome Philoſophers among the Chriſtians aſſert that extenſion is capable of thinking (59); and they are Philoſophers of very great parts, and very deep meditation. After this, can we lay any ſtreſs or depend on the clearneſs of ideas? But do not theſe Philoſophers ſee, that on ſuch a foundation the antient heathens might err ſo far as to ſay, that all intelligent ſubſtances had a beginning, and that only matter was from all eternity? This was the opinion of Anaximenes the Philoſopher, as has been ſhewn, and it was likewiſe the doctrine of Anaximander his maſter (60). This inconvenience is not got over by the following ſalvo, viz. that matter is made capable of thinking only by a particular gift of God. It would be true nevertheleſs, that in its nature it is ſuſceptible of thought; and that to make it really think, it is enough to put it in motion, or order its parts in a certain manner: whence it follows, that an eternal, unintelligent, but moveable matter, might have produced or given riſe to Gods and men; as the Poets, and ſome heathen Philoſophers have fooliſhly given out.

Ὦ Ζεῦ φίλιε, καὶ ξένιε, καὶ ἑταιρεῖε, καὶ ἐφέσιε, καὶ ἀστεροπηλᾶ, καὶ ὄρκιε, καὶ νεφεληγερέτα, καὶ ἐρίσθενε. καὶ εἴ τι σε ἄλλο οἱ ἐμβρόντητοι ποιηταὶ καλοῦσι (63). O Jupiter Philie, hoſpitalis, ſodalitie, domeſtice, fulgurator, juramenti præſes, nubicoge, grandiſtrepe, & ſiquod aliud tibi cognomen attoniti poëtæ tribuunt. We here have Jupiter firſt as protector of friendſhip, as an hoſpitable, familiar, and domeſtic Deity; and afterwards as the God of lightning, thunder, &c. The reader will find in Pauſanias, in what place he was worſhipped under the name of mild μειλιχίῳ (64), the diſtributer of bleſſings, ἐπιδώτης (65) &c. and under the name of thunderer κεραυνίῳ (66). This title of καταιβάτης, is leaſt common both in books and medals. It ſignifies merely deſcending, taken grammatically; but cuſtom has determined it to the action of thundering. The reader need but peruſe the diſſertation, which Burman publiſhed at Utrecht in 1700, and he will be convinced that this is the idea under which Jupiter καταιβάτης was honoured. Not that it was thought he never came down upon the earth but only to puniſh and to hurl his thunder; but it at laſt was judged proper to fix the ſignification of it, either becauſe of the maxim à majori, or à nobiliori parte ſumitur denominatio, or for other reaſons. I ſhall take notice elſewhere (d), that in the book intitled, Cymbalum mundi, there are many jokes on the actions of Jupiter; but I know not whether it be poſſible to go farther than Arnobius on ſuch a ſubject. The vivacity of his imagination ruſhes on like a flood; and having been but juſt before a profeſſed Rhetorician, he animated his diction with colours and figures of every kind. I have cited ſome of his thoughts in various parts of this Dictionary; the reader may have ſeen elſewhere (e) the joke he paſt on the great Jupiter, for employing nine nights in getting a child, when he, in one night, got fifty young women with child. Probably his memory failed him, and he confounded matters. He had read that Jupiter employed nine nights in begetting the Muſes [L]; and he applied this to a quite different ſubject, I mean to the adventurers of Alcmena. Authors of a lively fancy are pretty liable to ſuch miſtakes. Jupiter uſed to carry on his amours both in heaven and earth; he took the firſt who fell in his way, whether Goddeſs or woman, it was all the ſame to him. Arnobius did not forget this incident, and obſerved that the bodies of mortals, though quite tranſparent with reſpect to Jupiter's eye, had yet beauties ſufficient to inſpire him with a lewd paſſion [M]. It may be proper to obſerve, that the ridiculous ſtories which the Poets had publiſhed concerning this God, ſerved

[K] It is ſaid that he required men to be ſacrificed in his honour.] Few temples of Jupiter were more renowned than that which was built in his honour on mount Lycæus in Arcadia. The tradition of the country declared (68) that he had been brought up on that mountain by three nymphs, one whereof gave her name to a fountain which had a wonderful property; for whenever a long drought waſted the fruits of the earth, a plentiful rain never failed to deſcend, provided the prieſt of Jupiter Lycæus threw an oaken branch on the ſurfaces of that fountain, after the requiſite prayers and ſacrifices (69). On the ſame mountain was a court conſecrated to the God in queſtion, and famous for ſome very wonderful properties; all the men and beaſts that went into it, caſting no ſhade. All perſons were forbid to ſet their feet in it; and if any one was ſo bold as to enter it, notwithſtanding the prohibition, he neceſſarily died before the year was out. Arcas having purſued thither the boar into which his mother had been transformed, both would have been put to death, had not Jupiter taken them away, and lodged them among the ſtars. In ſilvis cum venaretur (Arcas) inſcius vidit matrem in urſæ ſpeciem converſam, quam interficere cogitans, perſecutus eſt in Jovis Lycæi templum: quo & qui acceſſiſſet, mors pœna erat Arcadum lege. Itaque cum utrunque neceſſe eſſet interfici, Jupiter eorum miſertus, ereptos inter ſidera collocavit (70). The words of St. Auſtin, which I am going to tranſcribe, inform us of thoſe particulars that relate to the ſacrificing of children. Nominatim expreſſit (Varro) quendam Demænetum, quum guſtaſſet de ſacrificio, quod Arcades immolato puero deo ſuo Lycæo facere ſolerent, in lupum fuiſſe mutatum, & anno decimo in figuram propriam reſtitutum, ad pugillatum ſeſe exercuiſſe, & Olympiaco viciſſe certamine (71). i. e. Porphyrius (72) obſerves, that the cuſtom of ſacrificing of men in Arcadia, during the feaſt of the Lupercalia, remained in his time. It may be obſerved by the way, that Saturn was not the only Deity who delighted in human victims (73). His ſon Jupiter was not willing to degenerate in that particular.

A Scholiaſt on Heſiod declares, that Mnemoſyne was the daughter of Jupiter; but the words of this Poet are not to be underſtood in that manner; and we muſt not ſuppoſe, that they relate that the Muſes ſprung from ſo horrid an inceſtuous commerce. The Scholiaſt in queſtion propoſes a doubt to himſelf; how came it to paſs, ſays he, that Hercules got fifty one ſons in a ſingle night, and that Jupiter required nine days to beget the nine Muſes? He anſwers that Jupiter, not being ignorant that the love and pleaſure of the Muſes are ſlow in attaining to their perfection, was determined to make uſe of a perfect number. If this Scholiaſt does not deſerve praiſe for the ſolidity of his reflections, he at leaſt deſerves applauſe for writing with ſo much brevity on a ſubject, which would have ſuggeſted to an Allegoriſt a numberleſs multitude of obſervations and moral precepts.

This objection of Arnobius is not a bad one, and is a thouſand times ſtronger than if a great King was to be cenſured for intriguing and lying with, not only Princeſſes, but alſo with women from among the meaneſt of the populace. [N] Some perſons of a grave character endeavoured to explain the ſtories which the Poets had publiſhed, either by allegories, or by the principles of Natural Philoſophy; but their endeavour was as ridiculous as that of the Poets.] We have ſeen above (79) how Cicero ridiculed Chryſippus the Philoſopher, who had taken great pains to reconcile the fictions of the antient Poets with the theology of the Stoics. The following paſſage will ſerve as a ſpecimen of that attempt. Hic locus à Zenone tractatus, poſt à Cleanthe, & Chryſippo pluribus verbis explicatus eſt. Nam vetus hæc opinio Græciam opplevit, exſectum Cœlum à filio Saturno; vinctum autem Saturnum ipſum à filio Jove. Phyſica ratio non inelegans incluſa eſt in impias fabulas. Cœleſtem enim altiſſimam, æthereamque naturam, id eſt, igneam, quæ per ſeſe omnia gigneret, vacare voluerunt, eâ parte corporis, quæ conjunctione alterius egeret ad procreandum. Saturnum autem eum eſſe voluerunt, qui curſum, & converſionem ſpatiorum, ac temporum contineret . . . . Saturnus autem eſt appellatus, quòd ſaturetur annis: ex ſe enim natos comeſſe fingitur ſolitus, quia conſumit ætas temporum ſpatia, anniſque præteritis inſaturabiliter expletur. Vinctus eſt autem à Jove, ne immoderatos curſus haberet, atque ut eum ſiderum vinculis alligaret (80). i. e. " This ſubject was treated by Zeno, afterwards " by Cleanthes, and amply explained by Chryſippus: " for all Greece was anciently of opinion, that Cœlus " was emaſculated by his ſon Saturn, who was bound " in chains by his ſon Jupiter. The prophane fables " include an elegant phyſical meaning; it being in- " timated thereby, that the celeſtial, the higheſt, and " etherial, that is the fiery nature, which produceth " all things by itſelf, is void of that corporeal part, " which requires the conjunction of another, in order " for procreation. Saturn they affirmed to be that be- " ing, which contains the courſe and change or revo- " lution of ſpaces and times. The name (Saturn) is " given him, becauſe he is filled with years; he alſo " is ſaid to devour the children he begets, becauſe " age or time conſumes its various periods, and is " filled with ſuch years as are paſt without being ſa- " tiated. He is bound in chains by Jupiter, to pre- " vent his going immoderate lengths, and to check " him by the bands of the ſtars." This is ſufficient to ſhew the ridiculouſneſs of theſe explications. We cannot read them without having almoſt a contempt for thoſe Philoſophers who employ their time ſo ill; and if we deplore, on one hand, the ill conſequences of the fictions of the Poets, and the unbounded licentiouſneſs with which they treated a ſubject that merited ſo much veneration; we are diverted, on the other hand, with the beauty of their fictions, whilſt we conſider them as witty conceits. But when we ſee Philoſophers who, though of ſo grave and ſerious a character, do nevertheleſs ſeek for myſteries in theſe follies, we can no longer bear with their extravagance, and apply the following ſentence to them:

" 'Tis ſhameful to employ our time in trifles,

The greateſt miſchief is, that whilſt they endeavoured to avoid one impiety, they have fallen into another; for, by rejecting the Gods of the Poets, animated and living Gods, they have ſubſtituted others, who had neither life nor ſenſation or knowledge. Cicero upbraids them with it as follows. Hic idem (Zeno) alio loco æthera Deum dicit eſſe, ſi intelligi poteſt nihil ſentiens Deus, qui nunquam nobis occurrit neque in precibus, neque in optatis, neque in votis. Aliis autem libris rationem quandam per omnem naturam rerum pertinentem, ut divinam, eſſe affectam putat. Idem aſtris hoc idem tribuit, tum annis, menſibus, annorumque mutationibus. Cùm verò Heſiodi Theogoniam interpretatur, tollit omnino uſitatas perceptaſque cognitiones Deorum, neque enim Jovem, neque Junonem, neque Veſtam, neque quenquam qui ita appelletur, in Deorum habet numero; ſed rebus inanimatis, atque mutis per quandam ſignificationem hæc docet tributa nomina (82). i. e. " The ſame Zeno ſays, " elſewhere, that the æther is God, if we can form " to our imaginations a God wholly inſenſible, who " never occurs to our prayers, our wiſhes, or our " vows. However, in other books, he imagines, " that a certain divine nature is diffuſed over the " whole nature of things. The Philoſopher in queſ- " tion aſcribes the ſame thing to the ſtars, to years, " months, and the changes of years. But when he " would interpret the Theogony of Heſiod, he takes " away all the common and received notions with re- " gard to the Gods; he not permitting Jupiter, nor " Juno, nor Veſta, nor any one ſo called to be ranked " in the number of the Gods; but teaches, that theſe " names are aſcribed, in a certain ſignification, to in- " animate and mute things." They accuſtomed men, by theſe falſe interpretations, to ſuppoſe the azure ſkies over our heads to be Jupiter. Hunc Ennius nuncupat ita dicens,

With regard to Juno, they ſuppoſed her to be the air, as Cicero informs us. *Aër autem, ut Stoici diſputant, interjectus inter mare, & cælum, Junonis nomine conſecratur, quæ eſt ſoror & conjux Jovis, quòd & ſimilitudo eſt ætheris, & cum eo ſumma conjunctio. terminated very frequently in ſerious impieties. Read the remark [N], where I ſhall ſpeak of thoſe who ſaid that Jupiter was the Air, and Juno the Æther.

lius (84). i. e. " But the air, as the Stoics aſſert, ly- " ing between the ſea and ſky or heaven, is conſe- " crated by the name of Juno, who is Jupiter's wife " and ſiſter, becauſe it reſembles the æther, and is in- " timately united to it. But they effeminated it (if I " may employ that expreſſion) and aſcribed it to Juno, " becauſe nothing can be ſofter than the element of " the air." Whatever they might advance in this ſyſtem, there was no poſſibility of avoiding abſurdities and impious tenets, which I prove by aſking theſe Philoſophers ſome queſtions. You therefore think that the Jupiter of the Poets, and he who is adored in the capitol and all other places, is that vaſt ſpace or expanſe wherein we ſee ſo many ſtars; and that this Juno, Jupiter's ſiſter and wife; that ſo jealous, haughty and powerful Deity, to whom the Argives and other nations paid ſo many honours, is the air which ſurrounds the earth, and gets into the lungs of animals, and where clouds, rain, &c. are formed; but is it not evident that this celeſtial expanſe, and this air are a portion of the matter of the world; and that matter, conſidered as ſuch, does not think? do we not know clearly, that the air is as void of life and ſenſation as ſnow and hail? If then Juno is nothing but the air, it is ridiculous to direct prayers and offer up ſacrifices to it: for it does not hear or underſtand any thing; and therefore your doctrine directly overthrows religion; it is material Atheiſm; you diveſt Juno of all her divinity, you only leave her the vain and empty name of Goddeſs; and you are more abſurd than Epicurus, in worſhipping what is no more than an illuſive and imaginary name. Juno is given here but as an example; but Jupiter and Neptune, and all the reſt of the Deities fall after the ſame manner by the ſtrength of the argument in queſtion. If you ſay that you do not conſider the air as a meer body, when you aſſert that Juno is the air; I muſt intreat you to tell me what other idea you entertain of it. Do you pretend to aſſert, that the air is united to the Goddeſs Juno; that ſhe is the ſoul of it, and that he (the air) is as a body to that Goddeſs; but is not this ſuppoſing a ſort of animal of which we have no idea? Does not the notion or idea of animal imply an aſſemblage of parts which form one entire continuum? Does it not exclude what is called diſcrete quantity? And is it not certain that the particles of air are perpetually ſeparating one from the other; and that the ſmalleſt ſtone that is thrown breaks that continuity, which, if the earth were an animal, muſt be a grievous wound? To what inconveniencies do you not make Juno's divinity obnoxious, in caſe you make her the ſoul of the air? Is not ſhe inceſſantly receiving a numberleſs multitude of wounds? Should you anſwer, that this Deity is united to the air, not to be its ſoul, but only to give activity or influence to it, you fall into another abſurdity which is equally ridiculous as to ſay that a pilot is a ſhip, and a rider is a horſe. If you anſwer that there is a wide difference between theſe things, ſince a pilot is not joined or united to the ſhip as Juno is to the air, I muſt deſire you to explain what this union is, and obſerve how Ariſtotle puzzles you, when he ſays that it is irrational to conclude that air and fire are animals; but that in caſe they are indued with a ſoul, it is abſurd to ſay they are not ſo. Weigh well the following words: Διὰ τίνα μὲν γὰρ αἰτίαν ἐν τῷ ἀέρι, ἢ ἐν τῷ πυρὶ ὄντα ἡ ψυχὴ, ἃ ποιεῖ ζῷον· ἐν ᾧ τοῖς μικτοῖς, καὶ ταῦτα βελτίων ἐν τούτοις εἶναι δοκοῦσα; ἐπιζήτησεις γὰρ ἄνλις, καὶ διὰ τίνα αἰτίαν ἡ ἐν τῷ ἀέρι ψυχὴ, τῆς ἐν τοῖς ζῴοις βελτίων ἐστὶ καὶ ἀθανατωτέρα. συμβαίνει ὁ ἀμφοτέρως ἄτοπον καὶ παραλέγειν· καὶ γὰρ τὸ λέγειν ζῷον τὸ πῦρ, ἢ τὸν ἀέρα, τῶν παραλογωτέρων ἐστὶ· καὶ μὴ λέγειν ζῶα ψυχῆς ἐνούσης, ἄτοπον (85), i. e. " For which reaſon, if a ſoul be in air, or fire, " why does it not form an animal as it does in mixt " natures, particularly ſince it ſeems to be more excel- " lent in them? Any one may alſo aſk the reaſon, " wherefore that ſoul, which is in the air, is of a more " noble and durable nature, than that with which " animals are informed. Something abſurd and ir- " rational reſults in either of theſe caſes; for to ad- " vance that fire or air is an animal, is no ways ra- " tional; and again, to affirm that they are not ani- " mals, if they are indued with a ſoul, is certainly " extremely abſurd." You are here between two precipices: if Juno be the ſoul of the air, and ſhe and the air do not form one animal, it is an intolerable abſurdity; and if they form one animal, it is a horrid abſurdity and impiety. Carneades, with that ſtrength of reaſon which was his peculiar characteriſtic, refuted invincibly the pretended exiſtence of this ſort of animal (86).

I will conclude with an obſervation which Pauſanias furniſhes me with. He relates that he diſputed one day with a Sidonian in a temple of Æſculapius. This man aſſerted, that the Phenicians were much more ſkillful than the Greeks in thoſe ſubjects which relate to the Deity, and in others likewiſe. They ſay, added he, that Æſculapius is the ſon of Apollo, and do not relate that a woman brought him into the world; for he is the air, the fountain of health both for men and beaſts. Apollo, who is the ſun, is directly conſidered as Æſculapius's father, ſince by the viciſſitude of the ſeaſons, which his motion occaſions, he makes the air healthy. Pauſanias granted all this; but he aſſerted that they did not belong to the Phenicians more than to the Greeks; and that it is evident even to children, that the health of men is owing to the ſun's motion (87). By this the reader may judge of the orthodoxy of the Heathens. Thoſe who pretend to be beſt acquainted with theological doctrines, made it appear, when they expreſſed themſelves clearly, that they acknowledged no other Gods but the air, the ſtars, &c. This, in the main, was a real Atheiſm; it was converting the neceſſity of nature into God. I have obſerved a paſſage in Euripides, where Jupiter is invoked, without exactly knowing what he is. It is confeſſed that he governs, by occult methods, all things juſtly; but the perſon who delivers theſe words adds, that it is extremely difficult to know him; and that he cannot ſay whether he be the neceſſity of nature, or human underſtanding. What a faith is this! A follower of Spinoza would ſign it with very few alterations.

JUSTINIANI (AUGUSTINO), Biſhop of Nebbio in the iſland of Corſica, was born at Genoa in 1470. He entered among the Dominicans the 25th of April 1487; and applied himſelf ſo aſſiduouſly to his ſtudies, and learnt under ſuch able preceptors, that he became a very great ſcholar. He was well ſkilled in Philoſophy, the Mathematics, Divinity, Greek, Hebrew, Arabic and Chaldee. He taught during eighteen years in the Province of Lombardy, to the great edification of his hearers. He was appointed Biſhop of Nebbio the 15th of November 1514, at the recommendation of Cardinal Bandinello Saoli his couſin; and received his bulls before he was informed of the good offices this Cardinal had done him. He aſſiſted at the Lateran Council, and objected to ſome articles of the Concordate agreed upon between the Courts of France and Rome; notwithſtanding which Francis I prevailed with him to come to Paris, and appointed him his Chaplain. He made uſe of the great knowledge of this Prelate, in order to eſtabliſh eſtabliſh the ſtudy of the Oriental Tongues in the Univerſity of Paris. Juſtiniani being at ſo ſmall a diſtance from England made a voyage thither, and was moſt graciouſly received by Henry VIII. He collected a very fine Library, and left it, by his will, to the Republic of Genoa [A]. He made many reparations in his See; increaſed its revenues; and ſo finely embelliſhed his Cathedral, dedicated to the bleſſed Virgin, that Maracci has ranked him among her faithful ſervants. He alſo tranſlated into the vulgar tongue ſome Latin works, the ſtudy whereof might be of uſe to Eccleſiaſticks (a). He was caſt away in his paſſage from Genoa to the iſland of Corſica in 1536 (b) [B]. This Prelate was not only a learned man, but alſo extremely laborious, as appears from the works he compoſed, and thoſe he cauſed to be printed [C]. I mention theſe in a note. He intended to publiſh a Polyglot Bible, whereof the Pſalter he publiſhed may be conſidered as a part. He was at great expence for the edition in queſtion; but finding that he could not get his money by the ſale, and that crowned heads did not favour his deſign, he complained of the ingratitude of his age [D]. But ſome had come to him without any expence or trouble, I mean thoſe which Andreolo Juſtiniani, his grandfather, had left him. It is remarkable that this Republic did not receive any advantage by our author's will; theſe manuſcripts being found only in the libraries of ſome private perſons, who to hide their thefts, took out from the frontiſpiece the marks, by which our prelate uſed to diſtinguiſh ſuch pieces as belonged to him. Benche al preſente non ſi trovi verun veſtigio di eſſi nel Palazzo publico, mà preſto diverſi particolari, che, per non eſſer ſcoperti, gli han levati nel frontiſpicio i contraſegni di quel buon Vecchio (1).

Voſſius affirms (3), that it is not known whether Juſtiniani was caſt away, or was taken by Pyrates; that it is only certain, that he was never ſeen ſince the year 1530, when he embarked to go from Genoa to his Biſhopric. I do not doubt but that he is miſtaken with reſpect to the year. He in informed Cardinal Bendinello Saoli, by letter, that all the New Teſtament was compleated; and that the Old Teſtament would be ſoon ready; and he intreated him to get the whole work printed. In altera quoque epiſtola ad eundum, novum teſtamentum jam abſolutum eſſe teſtatur, vetus autem brevi futurum paratum, & hortatur ut curet totum opus prælis excudi (13). He gave leave to Pellican, who was at Rome in 1517, to copy the preface of his New Teſtament in eight languages, with the firſt verſes of St. Matthew's Goſpel (14). Geſner affirms (15) that he ſaw it, and the two letters which Juſtiniani wrote to that Cardinal. He has even inſerted part of this preface in his Bibliotheque. This well-meaning Prelate was at a great expence for the impreſſion of the Pſalter; he cauſed two thouſand and fifty copies to be printed of it; and preſented it to all the Princes in the world, both infidel and Chriſtian. He had fifty copies taken off in vellum, Juſtiniani not only flattered himſelf with the hopes of gaining great applauſe, but alſo great profit, which he, beforehand, deſigned to ſet apart for the relief of his relations. He flattered himſelf with the hopes, that the ſucceſs of his ſpecimen would prompt Prelates and Monarchs to contribute towards the impreſſion of the whole Bible; but unfortunately he gained nothing but praiſe. His Pſalter was applauded, but not bought. It was with great difficulty he got the fourth part of his copies ſold; and his circumſtances would not enable him to print the rematnder of his work. Here follows Juſtiniani's complaints. Feci ſtampare in Genoua alle mie ſpeſe con quel travaglio e con quella ſpeſa, ch'ogni letterato può giudicare due mila volumi del Davidico Pſalterio in le predette cinque lingua Hebrea, Chaldea, Greca, Latina, & Arabica, parendomi di queſt' opera dover' acquiſtare grand laude, e non mediocre guadagno, il quale penſavo eſporre in la ſouventione di certi mei parenti, ch'erano biſognoſi, credendomi ſempre che l'opera doveſſi havere grande uſcita, e che i prelati richi, ò Principi ſi doveſſero movere, e mi doveſſero ajuture in la ſpeſa di far imprimere li reſtante della Bibbia in quella varietà di lingue; ma la credulità mia reſtò ingannata, perche l'opera fù da ciaſchedun laudata, ma laſſata ripoſare, e dormire, perche a pena ſi ſono venduti la quarte parte de i libri, come che l'opera ſia per valent' huomini, e per ingegni elevati, che ſono al mondo rari, e pochi, e con ſtento puoti ricavar i danari, ch' haveva poſte in la ſtampa che furono in buona quantità, perche oltra i dua mila volumi ſtampati in papero, ne feci imprimere cinquanta in carta vitelline, e mandai d'eſſi à libri à tutti i Rè del Mondo, così Chriſtiani, come Pagani. Paulus Jovius is ſo hard hearted as not to pity Juſtiniani's ill ſucceſs; but even takes a pleaſure in inſulting him on that account; and will not even allow that he was applauded by the public. He declares that our honeſt Biſhop was at a great expence, and did not reap either profit or glory by it. Gravi quidem ſumptu & tenui cum laude quum impreſſa domi prælta volumina emptores rariſſimos inveni rent, ſic ut temere conceptam ſpem lucri inanes initæ rationes eluſerint (17).

KECKERMAN (BARTHOLOMEW) a native of Dantzick, was Profeſſor of Philoſophy there about the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century. He had been before Profeſſor of the Hebrew Language at Heidelberg. He wrote a great number of books, in which he ſhews more method than genius [A]. He died in 1609, at thirty eight years of age (a). His books are full of plagiariſms, and have been well pillaged by plagiaries [B].

(a) Konig places his birth under the year 1571, his death in 1609. Voſſius, de Scient. Mathemat. pag. 262. tells us, that he lived two and forty years.

[A] He wrote a great number of books, in which he ſhews more method than genius.] He compoſed ſyſtems of almoſt all the ſciences. Here is the judgment, which Voſſius made of him: Parum idoneè judicat de eo (Diogene Laertio) vir cæteroquin eruditus, ſed novellorum ſcriptorum quam antiquitatis ſtudioſior Bartholomæus Keckermannns. Ait ille libro ſuo de Hiſtoriâ, ſcripſiſſe Laertium languidè & frigidè, ſæpè tamen non inutilitèr. Quæ frigida profecto laus eſt operis utiliſſimi & auro contra non cari. Quippe ex quo diſcere ſit cum alia tam multa ad hiſtoriam temporum pertinentia, tum præclara tot veterum apophthegmata, quorum Keckermannus, malo ſane exemplo, Eraſmum laudare mavult autorem, quam Plutarchum, Laertium, & ſimiles (1). i. e. ☞KEILL (JOHN), an eminent Aſtronomer and Mathematician in the eighteenth Century, was born in Scotland about the year 1671, and educated in Baliol College in the Univerſity of Oxford, where he took the degree of Bachelor and Maſter of Arts; and was afterwards invited to Chriſt Church by Dr. Henry Aldrich, Dean of that College. About the year 1709 he went to New England as Treaſurer to the Palatines; and ſoon after his return thence, upon the death of Mr. Caſwel, Savilian Profeſſor of Aſtronomy in Oxford, he was choſen to ſucceed him. He was likewiſe appointed Decipherer to Queen Anne, and continued in that place under King George I. till about the year 1716. He publiſhed ſeveral works [A], and died Auguſt the 31ſt 1721, aged fifty years. He had the degree of

[A] He publiſhed ſeverat works.] I. An Examination of Dr. Burnet's Theory of the Earth: with ſome Remarks on Mr. Whiſton's New Theory of the Earth. Oxford, 1698 in 8vo. A ſecond edition of this book was publiſhed at London 1734 in 8vo. In anſwer to this there was publiſhed, Reflections on the Theory of the Earth; and A Defence of Mr. Whiſton's New Theory. This occaſioned our author to publiſh, II, An Examination of the Reflections on the Theory of the Earth. Together with a Defence of the Remarks on Mr. Whiſton's New Theory. London 1699 in 8vo. In anſwer to this Mr. Whiſton wrote A ſecond Defence of his New Theory from the Exceptions of Mr. Keill and others. III. Introductio ad veram Phyſicam: ſeu Lectiones Phyſicæ habitæ in Scholâ Naturalis Philoſophiæ Academiæ Oxonienſis, Anno Dom. 1700. Quibus accedunt Theorematum Hugenianorum de Vi Centrifugâ & Motu Circulari Demonſtrationes. Authore Johanne Keill. M. D. R. S. S. Oxford 1701 in 8vo. In the preface he obſerves, that tho' Mechanical Philoſophy was then in repute, and had many followers, yet in moſt of their writings ſcarce any thing was to be found beſides the bare name of it; and that inſtead of it, the Philoſophers had introduced the figures, pores and interſtices of corpuſcles, which they never ſaw; and ſpeak of the inteſtine motion of the parts, of the ſtruggles and conflicts between the Alkali and Acid, with a variety of ſuch other miraculous effects of the Materia Subtilis. He then ſhews the abſurdity of the Carteſian hypotheſis about gravitation; and obſerves, that the occaſion of all the errors, which have crept into Philoſophy, has been this, that men wholly ignorant of Geometry have preſumed to turn Philoſophers, and to give an account of the cauſes of natural things. For, ſays he, what can be expected beſides conjectures and amuſements from thoſe men, who have neglected Geometry, the foundation of all Natural Philoſophy, and without knowing the powers of nature, which are only to be eſtimated by Geometry, have yet ventured to explain the operations of it by a method wholly inconſiſtent with the rules of mechaniſm? But though ſo many have embraced the ſhadow inſtead of the ſubſtance of Philoſophy, yet he obſerves, that there are ſome, who beſtowed their labour with great ſucceſs in ſearching out the true laws of nature, and diſcovering the cauſes of things by mechanical principles. Among theſe he reckons Archimedes, Roger Bacon, Cardan, Galileo, Boyle, Wallis, with others, but above all the incomparable Newton. In the firſt lecture he treats of the method of Philoſophizing; and takes notice of ſeveral ſorts of Philoſophers, who have written of Natural Philoſophy; viz. 1. Thoſe, who explained the nature of things by the properties of numbers and Geometrical figures; ſuch as the Pythagoreans and Platoniſts. 2. The Ariſtotelians, who explained natural Philoſophy by matter and forms, by privations, elementary virtues, occult qualities, ſympathies and antipathies, &c. 3. Experimental Philoſophers, who have endeavoured by ſenſible repreſentations to make known to us the properties and actions of all bodies; and to the induſtry of theſe, he ſays, Philoſophy is greatly indebted for many advantages. 4. The laſt ſort of Natural Philoſophers are the Mechanical, who undertake to explain the Phænomena of nature by the laws and rules of mechaniſm, ſuch as matter and motion, the various figure and contexture of the parts, ſubtile particles, and the like. From each of theſe ways of Philoſophizing our author takes what is moſt proper for his purpoſe; and in order to avoid all error in treating of Philoſophy, preſcribes himſelf three rules. As firſt, he tells us, it is neceſſary, according to the method of Geometricians, to lay down ſuch definitions as are requiſite for the underſtanding of things. Secondly, in ſearching after truth in Natural Philoſophy, it will be of uſe to conſider the qualities of things only as they are at firſt laid down, abſtracted from all others whatſoever. Thirdly, it will be neceſſary to begin with the moſt ſimple caſes, and when they are once of Doctor of Phyſic conferred upon him by the Univerſity of Oxford at the public Act in 1713; and he had been many years Fellow of the Royal Society. eſtabliſhed, to proceed to thoſe, which are more compounded. In the ſecond lecture he treats of the ſolidity and extenſion of body, which he defines to be an extended, ſolid, and moveable ſubſtance. In the third lecture he treats of the diviſibility of magnitudes; and in the fourth anſwers ſome objections urged againſt it by Epicurus, and his followers, the Atomiſts. In the fifth he diſcourſes of the ſubtilty of matter, and thoſe minute particles, into which matter may be actually divided. In the ſixth he treats of motion, time, and place; and in the ſeventh gives ſeveral definitions concerning motion. The firſt edition of this book contained only fourteen lectures, but in the ſecond edition printed at Oxford 1705 in 8vo he added a fifteenth or ſixteenth, which treat of the motions ariſing from given forces; for what he had ſaid in the former edition related to motion in general. True and genuine Phyſics conſiſting chiefly in the explication of theſe motions, and in giving an account of the Phænomena, which ariſe from thence, our author begins with the ſimpleſt, viz. that force, which is always directed uniformly, and ſtill with the ſame tenor towards the ſame point, ſuch as the gravitating force is commonly ſuppoſed to be. Theſe lectures have been tranſlated into Engliſh, and printed at London in 8vo. IV. Introductio ad veram Aſtronomiam, ſeu Lectiones Aſtronomicæ habitæ in Scholâ Aſtronomicâ Academiæ Oxonienſis. Authore Joanne Keill, M. D. Aſtronomiæ Profeſſore Saviliano, R. S. S. Oxford 1718 in 8vo. This was tranſlated into Engliſh by Dr. Keill himſelf, and publiſhed with many emendations at London 1721 in 8vo under the following title. An Introduction to the true Aſtronomy: or Aſtronomical Lectures, read in the Aſtronomical Schools of the Univerſity of Oxford. In the preface he diſcourſes of the uſes of Aſtronomy, and gives us the hiſtory of it, and obſerves, that as the art of ſailing does, in a great meaſure, depend on the knowledge of the ſtars, ſo the impetuous and ambitious deſires of Kings and Princes to diſcover unknown and foreign countries, inclined them to cultivate Aſtronomy. The firſt and chief of all the ſailors was Neptune, who, upon the account of his ſkill in this art, was celebrated as God of the ocean. His ſon Belus, being an Aſtronomer, by his knowledge therein, carried the inhabitants of Libya into Aſia, where he inſtituted Colleges of Aſtronomers; for Diodorus Siculus (1) writes thus: "It is reported, that the Egyptian Belus, the ſon of "Neptune and Libya, brought a Colony to Babylon, "and there he inſtituted Prieſts, whom the Babylo-"nians call Chaldeans; who, after the manner of "the Egyptians, were to obſerve the Stars." Before his time, there was Atlas King of Mauritania, a great Aſtronomer, who firſt ſhewed the doctrine of the Sphere. And therefore Virgil introduces Jopas ſinging what Atlas had taught mankind;

So Uranus, King of the country ſituated on the ſhore of the Atlantic ocean, for his ſkill in Aſtrononomy, is ſaid to have been deſcended from the Gods. Zoroaſter, a Perſian Philoſopher, is celebrated by all antiquity as a ſkilful Aſtronomer. And the dignity of this ſcience was eſteemed ſo great, as to be called the Royal Science, becauſe Kings were moſt delighted with it above all others. For the Kings of Africa and Syria firſt invented and improved it, and that long before it was known in Greece. This Plato acknowledges in his Dialogue called Epinomis. The firſt, ſays he, who obſerved theſe things, was a Barbarian, who lived in an antient countrey, where, upon the account of the clearneſs of the ſummer ſeaſon, they could firſt diſcover them, ſuch as Egypt and Syria, where the ſtars are clearly ſeen, there being neither rains nor clouds to hinder their proſpect. And becauſe we are more remote from this ſummer clearneſs of weather than the Barbarians, we came later to the knowledge of theſe ſtars. So Lucian tells us, "that the Ethiopians firſt took notice of "the heavenly motions, and by finding the cauſes of "the lunations, they knew that the moon had no "proper light of its own, but borrowed it from the "ſun." However, it is certain, that Aſtronomy, from the very beginning, was cultivated and improved by the Eaſtern nations. For if we may believe Porphyry, when Alexander took Babylon, Calliſthenes, at the deſire of Ariſtotle, carried from that city the obſervations of 1903 years, which brings the beginning of theſe obſervations to 115 years after the flood, and 15 years after the building of Babel. Pliny in his Natural Hiſtory relates, that Epigenes affirmed, that the Babylonians had obſervations of 720 years all ingraven upon bricks. And Achilles Tatius, in the beginning of his Introduction to Aratus's Phænomena, informs us, "that the Egyptians were the firſt, who meaſured the "heavens and the earth; and their ſcience in this "matter was engraven on columns, and by that means "delivered to poſterity. Yet the Chaldeans take the "honour of the invention to themſelves, and aſcribe "it to Belus." The Greeks had all their Aſtronomical learning from Egypt; for Diogenes Laertius owns, that Thales, Pythagoras, Eudoxus, and many others went to that country to be inſtructed in the Sidereal ſcience. Theſe men were not only the firſt, but the greateſt Philoſophers whom Greece produced. And from the ſame writer we know, that they, who ſtaid longeſt in that country, were moſt famous for their ſkill in Geometry and Aſtronomy, after they returned home. So Pythagoras, who lived in ſociety, with the Egyptian Prieſts ſeven years, and was initiated into their religion, carried home from thence, beſides ſeveral Geometrical inventions, the true ſyſtem of the univerſe, and was the firſt, who taught in Greece, that the earth and planets turned round the ſun, which was immoveable in the center; and that the diurnal motion of the ſun and fixed ſtars was not real, but apparent, ariſing from the motion of the earth round its axis. At that time no body was eſteemed a Philoſopher, but who was well acquainted with the Mathematical Sciences. But theſe Sciences were ſoon neglected by the Philoſophers, who came after them, and in who much degenerating from their Predeceſſors, had ſo little care and concern for the Mathematical Sciences, eſpecially Aſtronomy, that of all the obſervations of eclipſes for the ſpace of near 2000 years, which were ſent from Babylon by Calliſthenes, Ptolemy could recover but a very few, the reſt being loſt by the negligence and want of ſkill of thoſe men, who ſhould have preſerved them. For theſe pretenders to Philoſophy having no concern for the uſeful parts of it, ſpent their time about trifles and diſputes of no value, and endeavouring to find out ſophiſms, whereby they might impoſe upon their own and the common ſenſe of all mankind; ſuch were Zeno's arguments againſt motion, and moſt of the Philoſophers diſputations againſt the diviſibility of matter in infinitum; whereas a little knowledge of Geometry would eaſily have ſolved all the difficulties they could raiſe. But though Aſtronomy was thus baniſhed out of the ſchools of the common Philoſophers, yet it was received and cultivated by ſome, though but a few, eſpecially by the Pythagorean ſect, which flouriſhed in Italy many years; among whom was Philolaus and Ariſtarchus Samius. The Ptolemies, Kings of Egypt, were alſo great patrons of learning; they founded an Academy for Aſtronomy at Alexandria, which furniſhed ſeveral great men, the chief of whom was Hipparchus, who, according to Pliny, undertook a buſineſs, which would have been a great work to a God to perform, that is, to number the ſtars, and leave the heavens for an heritage to all that come after. This man foretold the eclipſes of both ſun and moon for 600 years; and upon his obſervations is founded that valuable work of Ptolemy, which he calls his Μεγάλη Σύνταξις, or his Great Conſtruction; for from them he gathered the preceſſion of the equinoxes, and the theory of the planets. When Egypt was conquered by the Saracens, and Alexandria reduced under their juriſdiction, the conquerors received Aſtronomy, with the reſt of the Liberal Arts, under their protection; and took care, that moſt part of the books concerning the liberal arts and ſciences ſhould be tranſlated from the Greek into their own Arabian language. The Saracens paſſing from Africa into Spain, and having a commerce with the weſtern European nations, imparted to them the ſcience of Aſtronomy, which before was almoſt loſt in Europe. So that about the year 1230, at the command of the Emperor Frederic, Ptolemy's Almageſt, or his Great Syntaxis, was tranſlated from the Arabic into Latin. After that time, Aſtronomy received many improvements from the patronage of the greateſt Princes, and the labours of the moſt celebrated Philoſophers; among whom, in the firſt place is to be named Alphonſus King of Caſtile, who is never to be forgotten on the account of Aſtronomical Tables called after his name. Nicholas Copernicus was not only a diligent obſerver, but alſo a reſtorer of the antient Pythagorean ſyſtem. Prince William, Landgrave of Heſſe, who procured quadrants and ſextants much larger than what were formerly uſed, to obſerve the true places of the ſtars, and whoſe obſervations were publiſhed by Snellius. Sir Henry Savile, ſkillful both in Aſtronomy and Geometry, who founded two Profeſſorſhips for thoſe ſciences at Oxford. Tycho Brahe, ſuperior in ſkill to all that went before, who publiſhed a catalogue of ſeven hundred fixed ſtars, which he had diligently obſerved. John Kepler, who by the help of Tycho's labours found out the true ſyſtem of the world, and the laws obſerved by the celeſtial bodies in their motions. Galileo, who firſt applied a teleſcope to the heavens, and by means of it diſcovered the ſatellites of Jupiter, and their motions; the various phaſes of Saturn; the increaſe and decreaſe of the light of Venus; the mountainous and uneven ſurface of the moon; the ſpots of the ſun; and the revolution of the ſun about its own axis. John Hevelius, who has given us a catalogue of the fixed ſtars much larger than Tycho's, compoſed from his own obſervations. Huygens and Caſſini, who firſt ſaw the ſatellites of Saturn, and diſcovered his ring. Gaſſendi, Horrox, Bullialdus, Ward, Ricciolus, Flamſteed, and many other eminent Aſtronomers. "But "we have one here, adds Dr. Keill, who on account "of his great merits in Aſtronomy, does excel them "all, that is, the moſt learned Dr. Edmund Halley, "Savilian Profeſſor of Geometry in this Univerſity, "my moſt friendly collegue; to whoſe labours Aſtro-"nomy owes many great improvements. In him "there ſhines out together (which I know not, if they "are to be found in any other perſon to ſuch a de-"gree) the greateſt dexterity in practical Aſtronomy, "and a moſt profound and exquiſite ſkill in Geome-"try; which will appear by his Aſtronomical Tables, "which he is ſhortly to publiſh; for they will far ex-"ceed all others, that ever were or perhaps ever will "be publiſhed." ☞KEILL (JAMES), an eminent Phyſician, and brother of the preceding, was born in Scotland about the year 1673, and having travelled abroad, read Lectures of Anatomy with great applauſe in the Univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge, by the latter of which he had the degree of Doctor of Phyſic conferred upon him. In 1700 he ſettled at Northampton, where he had very conſiderable practice as a Phyſician. He publiſhed ſeveral works [A], and died at Northampton of a cancer

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral works.] In 1698 he tranſlated into Engliſh Lemery's Chemiſtry. The ſixth edition of his Anatomy was printed at London 1718. In the Philoſophical Tranſactions, No. 306, he publiſhed An Account of the Death and Diſſection of John Bayles of Northampton, reputed to have been 130 Years old; and in No. 361, De Viribus Cordis Epiſtola. In 1708 he publiſhed at London in 8vo, An Account of Animal Secretion, the Quantity of Blood in the human Body, and Muſcular Motion. He afterwards gave a Latin tranſlation of this Book, to which he ſubjoin'd a Medicina Statica, with tables, never publiſhed by any Writer before. In the preface to this treatiſe he obſerves, that Diſeaſes being purely diſorders of the Animal Oeconomy, whatſoever can add any new light to our knowledge of this, muſt neceſſarily clear the nature of thoſe, eſtabliſh the practice of Phyſick upon a ſurer foundation, and inable Phyſicians to make truer and more certain judgments in moſt Caſes; and that if the animal oeconomy were perfectly underſtood, and the hiſtory of Diſeaſes exactly known, the right method of curing each diſeaſe might evidently and certainly be deduced. Whence it follows, that when the hiſtory of a diſeaſe is exactly known, if the right method of curing it cannot be deduced, it muſt be becauſe the animal oeconomy is not underſtood. He concludes his Preface with remarking, that the Vis attractrix, which he ſuppoſes to take place in animal ſecretion, was aſſerted by the moſt famous antient phyſicians, as Hippocrates and Galen, as well as the gravitation of the heavenly bodies one towards another was known to the beſt antient Philoſophers, as well as to Kepler and Sir Iſaac Newton. Upon the ſubject of Animal Secretion, and in explaining the manner how the fluids of the animal body are ſeparated from the blood, Dr. Keill undertakes to ſhew, 1. How they are formed in the blood, before they come to the place appointed for ſecretion. 2. In what manner they are ſeparated from the blood by the glands. Upon the former Head he ſhews, that the blood conſiſts of a ſimple fluid, in which ſwim corpuſcles of various figures and magnitudes, and endued with different degrees of attractive force. Hence he concludes, that of ſuch Particles as the blood conſiſts of, muſt the fluids be compoſed which are drawn from it; and as in the blood the particles attract one another, and cohere together, ſo likewiſe may the Particles of the fluids, which are ſeparated from it. This he proceeds farther to ſhew to be not only poſſible, but actually ſo, in ſeveral ſecretions, as milk, urine, &c. And if it is not evident in all, he looks upon it to be, becauſe their conſtituent principles are more powerfully attracted by the particles of the fluids in which they ſwim, than by one another, which hinders their ſeparation from that fluid. From this principle, that the blood conſiſts of corpuſcles of various figures and magnitudes, and indued with various degrees of an attractive Power, and that of ſuch particles the fluids ſecerned by the cancer in the mouth in the year 1719, aged forty ſix years. He was never married.

Glands are compoſed, the Doctor proceeds to ſhew how the corpuſcles, which compoſe the ſecretions, are formed in the blood, before they arrive at their ſecerning glands. But before he comes to this, he lays down and demonſtrates ſeveral Propoſitions relating to the laws of attraction, as fundamental to what he is about to advance; and then determines the force of air upon the blood in breathing, in order to ſhew, that by the preſſure of the air the coheſion of the globules of the blood is diſſolved. After this, he ſhews how the union of the attractive Particles is hindered near the hearts; and that the particles, which unite firſt after the blood is thrown out of the great artery, muſt be ſuch as have the ſtrongeſt attractive Force; and that ſuch as have the leaſt, muſt unite laſt, and all the intermediate ones, according to their reſpective attractive powers. He then deduces the reaſon of the ſituation of the kidneys; and obſerves, that though the gall, which is ſecerned by the liver, and the Semen by the Teſticuli, ſeem to be two conſiderable Objections againſt his hypotheſis; yet they are ſo far from proving any thing againſt his doctrine of ſecretion, as to be the greateſt arguments, that could poſſibly be urged for the truth of it. This he demonſtrates at large; and then ſhews how ſome fluids may be ſecerned any where, and why the Lympha is ſecerned in ſeveral places, &c. and concludes what he had offered upon the firſt general propoſition relating to ſecretions, with remarking that the knowledge of ſecretions is neceſſary for the underſtanding of the nature of Diſeaſes, as in the diabetes, the rheumatiſm, the gout and the ſtone; and with explaining the operation of medicines by attraction. Under the ſecond general propoſition he ſhews the manner, in which the ſeveral fluids, after they are formed in the blood, are ſeparated from it by the glands; and as this depends intirely upon the figure and ſtructure of the glands, he determines them to be nothing elſe but convolutions of ſmall arteries; ſince all the veſſels in the body, in which the liquors are continually moving, can have no other than a cylindrical or conical form from the very nature of fluids, whoſe preſſure is always perpendicular to the ſides of the containing veſſel, and equal at equal heights of the fluid. As therefore the ſides of theſe veſſels are ſoft and equally yielding every where, they muſt, by the preſſure of the contained fluid, be equally every where diſtended, and conſequently the ſection of ſuch a veſſel perpendicular to its axis, muſt be a right circle, and therefore the veſſel muſt be either a concave cone or cylinder, or at leaſt ſuch a figure, whoſe tranſverſe ſection is a circle. Hence he concludes, that the circular orifices of the glands can only differ in magnitude, and that all ſorts of particles of leſs diameters than that of the orifice of a gland may enter it. The next ſubject he treats of is the quantity of the blood or circulating fluids of what kind ſoever in the human body; in order to determine which he ſuppoſes the whole body to be nothing but tubes or veſſels full of blood or liquors ſeparated from it; and concludes with obſerving, that in a body weighing 160 pounds there muſt needs be 127 pounds of blood; from which quantity, that he may put the matter out of all manner of diſpute, he deducts the weight both of the fat and bones, (though he thinks, that ſome arguments might be alledged to prove, that even the fat circulates, and he had before ſhewn, that there is a fluid in the bones;) and after allowances made for both, concludes, that the fluids in the human body have the ſame proportion to the ſolids as 100 to 60, or 5 to 3. He finiſhes the whole of what he offers about the blood, with a pretty large diſcourſe about its velocity; and obſerves, that when the whole maſs of blood is to be altered, the courſe of Phyſic ought to be continued for a long time, ſince the blood moves ſlower and ſlower, the farther it moves from the great artery; and conſequently it muſt be a great while before the whole maſs of blood can be mixed with the alterative medicine. And that ſince the circulation of the blood through the glands, which receive arteries immediately from a great veſſel, is very quick, they may carry off a great proportion of the medicine in a very little time; and that therefore it is not the taking of great quantities, but the conſtant taking, which can alter the maſs of blood. In his treatiſe of muſcular motion, he defines a muſcle to be a bundle of thin and parallel plates of fleſhy threads and fibres, incloſed by one common membrane, in which all the fibres of the ſame plate are parallel to one another, and tyed together at extremely little diſtances by ſhort and tranſverſe fibres; the fleſhy fibres being compoſed of other ſmaller fibres, incloſed likewiſe by a common membrane, and each leſſer fibre conſiſting of very ſmall veſſels or bladders, into which the nerves, veins, and arteries are ſuppoſed to open. He proceeds then to explain the reaſon of the contraction of the veſicular muſcular fibres, and to demonſtrate into what figure each veſicle is contracted; which he ſhews with Bernoulli againſt Borelli, to be ſpheroidical; any ſection through the axis of each veſicle, where the axis lies in the plane of the ſection, being a plane incloſed in two curves, which are arches of two circles; and any ſection in any part of the veſicle, to which the axis is perpendicular, being a perfect circle. KELLER (JAMES), one of the beſt writers, who appeared among the Jeſuits in Germany about the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century, was born at Seckingen (a) in the year 1568. He became a Jeſuit in 1588, and after he had taught polite Literature, Philoſophy, Moral and Scholaſtic Divinity, he was appointed Rector of the College of Ratiſbon, and afterwards of the College of Munich. He held the firſt of theſe two offices two years, but he continued in the ſecond for ſixteen years ſucceſſively. He was for a long time Confeſſor to Prince Albert of Bavaria and the Princeſs his wife, and was often conſulted and employed by the Elector Maximilian in affairs of importance. He diſputed publickly with the moſt celebrated Miniſter (b) of the Duke of Newburg; and if we may believe his brethren, gained the advantage over him [A]. He publiſhed

This conference was very like that between Perron and du Pleſſis Mornai; for it turned upon the charge brought againſt the Lutheran Miniſter of having cited ſeveral paſſages of the fathers with a thouſand falſifications, in a German work intitled Papatus Acatholicus. The conference between Keller the accuſer and Hailbrunner the accuſed was held at Newburg in June 1615 (2); and if we believe the Lutherans, the innocence of their Miniſter was proved by the cleareſt evidence imaginable, *Ex inſpectione & examinatione dictorum patriſticorum, innocentia Hailbrunneriana luculenter patuit. He took the same name in a book printed at Ingolstad in 1607, and intitled Philippica in anonymum quendam Prædicantem, qui Societatem Jesu mendaciis oneravit. The writers of the Bibliotheques of the Jesuits make no mention of this book of Keller. Placcius (6) informs us, that it was an answer to a German treatise, in which were collected a great many passages extracted from the seditious writings of some of the Jesuits. The author of the collection confuted the Philippic of Keller in 1608: his answer is intitled Anti Philippica: it is written in High Dutch, and in it the author compleats his collection of the seditious passages in the writings of the Jesuits (7). The author of these two collections was a Counsellor to the Elector Palatine, and his name was Michael Loeffenius (8). I have read in the third volume of the Morale pratique, that our Keller is author of the Cavea Turturis. The reader will be pleased to see here the words of Monsieur Arnaud (9). "Gravina... a learned "Dominican having complained with a great deal of "modesty in his Vox Turturis of what Cardinal Bellarmin had said in too harsh terms of the antient orders in his Gemitus Columbæ, and having represented, "that it was not at all surprizing, that their severity was "relaxed in the space of so many ages since their foundation; your father James Keller answered him with "great sharpness in his book intitled, *Cavea Turturis. [C] He assumed a disguised name before his political writings.] The bloody war which laid Germany waste from the year 1618 till the peace of Munster, was undoubtedy a religious war; for the league, which the Protestants formed, and to which those of the contrary religion opposed a Catholic league, of which the Elector of Bavaria, was head, owed its rise to the suspicions, that the Imperial Court being influenced by the Jesuits would violate the peace of Passau. The Elector of Bavaria a very able Prince, would not suffer with impunity, that the Catholics should be charged with such a design. He procured books to be published, in which the Protestants were accused of having confederated to carry on pernicious designs, and particularly to oppress the Church of Rome. This accusation appeared in 1621 in a work intitled Cancellaria secreta Anhaltina, id est, occulta Concilia, inaudita Proposita, periculosæ adinventiones, & prodigiosæ machinationes Capitum ac Directorum unionis Correspondentium in Germania, occasione Rebellionis Bohemicæ ad ejusdem Coronæ & Imp. Rom. perniciem agirata. Post nuperam illam, omnibus posteris memorabilem Victoriam Pragensem, & Novemb. 1620 in Originalibus Scripturis ac documentis Cancellariæ Anhaltinæ Divinâ Providentiâ deprehensa. The Protestant Princes ordered an answer to be made to this book, which was pretended to be written by William Jocher Counsellor to the Elector of Bavaria, and by Dr. Leickard (11). It was thought these Princes made use of the pen of Volrad Pless, Counsellor to the Elector Palatine (12). Our James Keller thought so; for he wrote an answer to this book, printed in 1624 under this title: Volradi Plessii (13) Heidelbergensis olim Consiliarii Ajax post oppugnatam frustra Cancellariam Anhaltinam in spongiam incumbens, sive Appendix Cancellariæ Anhaltinæ, auctore Fabio Hercyniano, J. C. Alegambe and his continuator knew not, that their brother had taken the name of Fabius Hercynianus before this work. He had taken it the year before, when he answered a book, which Lewis Camerarius had published in 1622, under the title of Cancellaria Hispanica: adjecta sunt Acta publica, hoc est, Scripta & Epistolæ authenticæ, è quibus partim infelicis Belli in Germaniâ, partim Proscriptionis in Electorem Palatinum scopus præcipuus apparet. Adjecti sunt sub finem Flores Scoppiani ex Classico Belli Sacri. This book has another title after the table of contents, viz. Viva Demonstratio causarum præsentis in Germania belli Religionis ergo suscepti. The Jesuit Keller's answer to this book of Camerarius is intitled, Litura, seu Castigatio Cancellariæ Hispanicæ, a Ludovico Camerario Excancellario Bohemico, Exconsiliario Heidelbergensi &c. instructæ. Auctore Fabio Hercyniano J. C. A new edition of this book was printed in 1624 under this title. Cancellariæ Anhaltinæ Pars secunda. In qua non ita pridem à quibusdam edita Cancellaria Hispanica nervose simul ac lepidè refutatur: tum ex quibusdam interceptis ad Gaborem Literis, Hungaricorum qui sequuti sunt & adhuc durant motuum Incentores seu Auctores demonstrantur. Auctore Fabio Hercyniano J. C. Alegambe and his continuator did not know, that James Keller took this fictitious name in the title of his book. But they were not ignorant of it with regard to two tracts, of which I am going to give the titles. Rhabarbarum demendæ Bili quam in Apologiâ suâ proritavit Ludovicus Camerarius propinatum à Fabio Hercyniano J. C. an. 1625. Tubus Gallicanus, hebescentibus Ludovici Camerarii oculis, in Liturâ Hispanicæ Cancellariæ male advertentibus, ad clarius videndum tornatus, à Fabio Hercyniano. Additis in fine testimonii causa, & pro Tubo, & pro Rhabarbaro, ipsius Camerarii Epistolis anno 1625. Nicholas Harstein answering the Ajax or the Appendix Cancellariæ Anhaltinæ, observes, that the Jesuit, who was the author, used very much to disguise himself. Nihil huic homini insolens esse, ut veritatem, ita nomen suum pervertere, & modo sub Aurimontii (à matre suâ Goltbergerâ) modo sub Didaci Tamiæ, modo sub Fabii Hercyniani (à Sylvâ Hercyniâ, sive Nigrâ, prope quam supra Basileam in oppido Seckingen natus est) nomine fallere, & his literis, J. C. quæ non Jurisconsultum, ut alias, sed Jacobum Cellarium denotant, Lectori imponere (14). i. e. "It is not "at all unusual with this man to pervert his own name, "as well as the truth, and to impose upon the reader, "sometimes under the name of Aurimontius (from his "mother Goltberg), sometimes under that of Didacus Tamia, sometimes under that of Fabius Hercynianus (from the Hercynian or Black Forest, near "which, above Basil, in the town of Seckingen he was "born), and to disguise himself under the letters, J. C. "which do not signify Jurisconsultus, as on other occasions, but Jacobus Cellarius." Here are disguises not known to the two Jesuits, who compiled the Bibliotheque of the Writers of their Order. The same Nicholas Harstein informs us, that James Keller was author of Mysteria politica (15), a work, which made a great deal of noise (16), and which was very injurious to the Court of France. But he ascribes (17) to another Jesuit the book intitled Secreta Secretorum Calvino-Turcica, the author of which had disguised himself under the name of Honestus Cogmandolus. The person, who answered him in a book intitled, Secreta Secretorum Turco-Papistica, took the fictitious name of Justinus Justinopolitanus, instead of Lewis Camerarius, which was his true name. The contests of the writers upon the affairs of the time, were then much more grave than they are in the present war (18), and as warm in their kind as those of warriors. At present there are scarce any thing but scurrilous satires published.

(11) Keller. in Appendix Cancellariæ Anhaltinæ, says that this report was false.

(12) Nicholas Harstein denies this in the Preface to his Responsio Apologetica to the Ajax of Fabius Hercynianus.

(13) Alegambe is mistaken in this name, for he says Blessii, and that this man was Chancellor. Father Southwell has not corrected these two errors: he says Blessii, &c. Placcius, de Anonymis, num. 256. pag. 71. has not corrected them, and erroneously ranks this book among the anonymous ones, not knowing that the author took the name of Fabius Hercynianus.

☞ KEN (THOMAS), an eminent Engliſh Biſhop in the ſeventeenth Century, was ſon of Mr. Thomas Ken [A] of Furnival's-Inn London, by Martha his wife, and was born at Barkhamſtead in Hertfordſhire in July 1637 (a), and not in 1635, as Mr. Wood aſſerts (b). From Wincheſter ſchool he was ſent to the Univerſity of Oxford, and entered a Student of Hart-Hall in 1656, and the year following admitted Probationer-Fellow of New-College (c). He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts May the 3d 1661, and that of Maſter January the 21ſt 1664 (d). December the 8th 1666 he was choſen Fellow of Wincheſter College (e), and ſoon after became domeſtic Chaplain to Dr. George Morley Biſhop of Wincheſter, who preferred him to the Rectory of Brixton in the Iſle of Wight (f), and afterwards to the Parſonage of Woodhay in Hampſhire, and to a Prebend in the Cathedral of Wincheſter, in which he was inſtalled April the 12th 1669 (g). In 1675 (h), the year of the Jubilee, he travelled through Italy, and to Rome, and upon his return within the ſame year, he was often heard to ſay, that he had great reaſon to give God thanks for his travels; ſince, if it were poſſible, he returned rather more confirmed of the purity of the Proteſtant Religion, than he was before (i). July the 6th 1678 he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity (k); and June 30th 1679 that of Doctor of Divinity (l). He was afterwards appointed by King Charles II to attend the Lord Dartmouth to the demoliſhing of Tangier; and at his return was made Chaplain to his Majeſty (m), as he was ſome time after to the Princeſs of Orange, then reſiding in Holland [B]. This was not unknown to "the King, nor did he ſhew the leaſt diſlike to "his behaviour." The thing which had given offence to the Prince of Orange was our author's obliging one of the Prince's favourites to marry a young Lady of the Princeſs's train, whom he had betrayed (3).

And accordingly the King himſelf gave order for a Conge d' eſlire to paſs the ſeals for that purpoſe; and this even juſt after our author's opinion, that a woman of ill repute ought not to be endured in the houſe of a Clergyman, eſpecially the King's Chaplain, was publickly known. For at that time the King coming to Wincheſter, and his Harbinger having marked the Doctor's houſe, which he held in right of his Prebend, for the uſe of Mrs. Gwin; he abſolutely refuſed her admittance, and ſhe was forced to ſeek another lodging (4).

(4) A ſhort Account of the Life, &c. pag. 9, 10.

[D] The month following he attended King Charles II at his death.] Mr. Hawkins tells us (5), that the Biſhop gave cloſe attendance by the royal bed, at leaſt for three whole days and nights, watching at proper intervals to ſuggeſt pious and proper thoughts and ejaculations on ſo ſerious an occaſion. In which time the Ducheſs of Portſmouth coming into the room, the Biſhop prevailed with his Majeſty to have her removed, and took that occaſion of repreſenting the injury and injuſtice done to his Queen ſo effectually, that his Majeſty was induced to ſend for the Queen, and aſking pardon, had the ſatisfaction of her forgiveneſs before he died. The Biſhop having urged the neceſſity of a full repentance, ſeveral times propoſed the adminiſtration of the Sacrament. But though it was not abſolutely rejected, it was yet delayed from time to time, till the Biſhop and others preſent were put out from the King's preſence for about the ſpace of half an hour; during which time it has been ſuggeſted, that Father Huddleſton was admitted to give his Majeſty Extreme Unction. And the interval between this and his death was ſo ſhort, that nothing concerning the Biſhop's behaviour happened worthy of notice. Biſhop Burnet obſerves (6), that our Biſhop "applied himſelf much to the awak"ing the King's conſcience, and ſpoke with an elevation "both of thought and expreſſion, like a man inſpi"red. He reſumed the matter often, and pronounced "many ſhort ejaculations and prayers, which affected "all that were preſent, except him, that was moſt "concerned, who ſeemed to take no notice of him, and "made no anſwer. He preſſed the King ſix or ſeven "times to receive the Sacrament. But the King al"ways declined it, ſaying, he was very weak. A "table with the elements upon it ready to be conſe"crated was brought into the room; which occaſi"oned a report to be then ſpread about, that he had "received it. Ken preſſed the King to declare, that he deſired the Sacrament, and that he died in the communion of the Church of England; to which the King anſwered nothing. The Biſhop aſked him, if he deſired abſolution of his ſins; which he pronounced over his Majeſty; "for which he was blamed, ſince "the King expreſſed no ſenſe of ſorrow for his paſt "life, nor any purpoſe of amendment. It was "thought to be a proſtitution of the peace of the "Church, to give it to one, who after a life led as "the King's had been, ſeemed to harden himſelf a"gainſt every thing that could be ſaid to him. Ken "was alſo cenſured for another piece of indecency; "he preſented the Duke of Richmond, Lady Portſ"mouth's ſon, to be bleſſed by the King. Upon "this ſome that were in the room cried out, that "the King was their common father; and upon that "all kneeled down for his bleſſing, which he gave "them."

of June 1688 he, with five other Biſhops and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was committed priſoner to the Tower of London for ſubſcribing a petition to his Majeſty againſt the declaration of indulgence (n). [F] Upon the revolution he refuſed to take the Oaths to King William and Queen Mary; on which account he was deprived of his biſhoprick.] Juſt before his deprivation Dr. Burnet, then Biſhop of Salisbury, wrote to him the following letter;

" My Lord,

" This Gentleman, who is preſented to a Living " in your Lordſhip's Dioceſe, came to me to receive " inſtitution; but I have declined the doing of it, " and ſo have ſent him over to your Lordſhip, that " you being ſatisfied with relation to him, may order " your chancellor to do it. I was willing to lay hold " on this occaſion to let your Lordſhip know, that I " intend to make no other uſe of the commiſſion, that " was ſent me, than to obey any orders, that you may " ſend me in ſuch things as my hand and ſeal may " be neceſſary. I am extremely concerned to ſee your " Lordſhip ſo unhappily poſſeſſed with that, which " is likely to prove ſo fatal to the Church, if we are " deprived of one, that has ſerved in it with ſo much " honour as you have done, eſpecially at ſuch a time, " when there are fair hopes of the reforming of ſeve- " ral abuſes. I am the more amazed to find your Lord- " ſhip ſo poſitive, becauſe ſome have told my ſelf, " that you had adviſed them to take that which you " refuſe your ſelf; and others have told me, that they " read a paſtoral letter, which you had prepared for " your dioceſe, and were reſolved to print it, when " you went to London. Your Lordſhip, it ſeems, chan- " ged your mind there, which gave great advantages " to thoſe, who were ſo ſevere as to ſay, that there was " ſomewhat elſe than conſcience at the bottom. I " take the liberty to write this freely to your Lordſhip " for I do not deny, that I am in ſome pain till I " know whether it is true or not. I pray God to pre- " vent a new breach in a Church, which has ſuffered " ſo ſeverely under the old one.

My Lord,

" Your Lordſhip's moſt faithful ſervant and brother,

Biſhop Ken's anſwer was as follows.

" All glory be to God.

" My Lord,

" I am obliged to your Lordſhip for the continued " concern you expreſs for me, and for the kind free- " dom you are pleaſed to take with me. And though " I have already in public fully declared my mind to " my dioceſe concerning the oath, to prevent my being " miſunderſtood; yet ſince you ſeem to expect it from " me, I will give ſuch an account, which, if it " does not ſatisfy your Lordſhip, will at leaſt ſatisfy " my ſelf. I dare aſſure you, I never adviſed any " one to take the oath; though ſome, who came to " talk inſidiouſly with me, may have raiſed ſuch a " report. So far have I been from it, that I never " would adminiſter it to any one perſon, whom I was " to collate. And therefore, before the act took place, " I gave a particular commiſſion to my Chancellor, " who himſelf did not ſcruple it; ſo that he was au- " thorized, not only to inſtitute, but alſo to collate " in my ſtead. If any came to diſcourſe with me a- " bout taking the oath, I uſually told them, I durſt " not take it my ſelf. I told them my reaſons, if " they urged me to it, and were of my dioceſe; and " then remitted them to their ſtudy and prayers for " farther Directions. It is true, having been ſcanda- " lized at many perſons of our own coat, who for " ſeveral years together preached up paſſive obedience " to a much greater height than ever I did, (it " being a ſubject, with which I rarely meddled,) and " on a ſudden, without the leaſt acknowledgment of " their paſt error, preached and acted the quite con- " trary; I did prepare a paſtoral letter, which, if I " had ſeen reaſon to alter my judgment, I thought to " have publiſhed; at leaſt that part of it, on which " I laid the greateſt ſtreſs, to juſtify my conduct to " my flock. And before I went to London, I told " ſome of my friends, that if that (8) proved true, " which was affirmed to us with all imaginable aſſu- " rance, (and which I think more proper for diſcourſe " than a letter) it would be an inducement to me to " comply. But when I came to town, I found it was " falſe; and without being influenced by any one, or " making any words of it, I burnt my paper, and " adhered to my former opinion. If this is to be cal- " led a change of mind, and a change ſo criminal, that " people, who are very diſcerning, and know my own " heart better than my ſelf, have pronounced ſentence " upon me, that there is ſomething elſe than conſcience " at the bottom; I am much afraid, that ſome of " thoſe, who cenſure me, may be chargeable with " more notorious changes than that; whether more " conſcientious or no, God only is the judge. If your " Lordſhip gives credit to the many miſrepreſentations, " which are made of me, and which I being ſo uſed " to can eaſily diſregard, you may naturally enough " be in pain for me; for to ſee one of your brethren " throwing himſelf headlong into a wilful deprivation, " not only of honour and of income, but of a good " conſcience alſo, are particulars, out of which may " be framed an idea very deplorable. But though I " do daily in many things betray great infirmity, I " thank God, I cannot accuſe my ſelf of any inſince- " rity; ſo that Deprivation will not reach my con- " ſcience, and I am in no pain at all for my ſelf. I " perceive, that after we have been ſufficiently ridi- " culed, the laſt mortal ſtab deſigned to be given us, " is to expoſe us to the world for men of no conſcience. " And if God is pleaſed to permit it, his moſt holy " will be done; though what that particular paſſion " of corrupt nature is, which lies at the bottom, and " which we gratify in loſing all we have, will be " hard to determine. God grant ſuch reproaches as " theſe may not revert on the authors. I heartily " join with your Lordſhip in your deſires for the peace " of this Church; and I ſhall conceive great hopes, " that God will have compaſſion on her, if I ſee, " that ſhe compaſſionates and ſupports her ſiſter of " Scotland. I beſeech God to make you an inſtru- " ment to promote that peace and that charity I my " ſelf can only contribute to, both by my prayers and " by my deprecations againſt ſchiſm and againſt ſacri- " lege.

KENNETT (WHITE), a learned Engliſh Writer and Biſhop of Peterborough in the eighteenth Century, was ſon of Mr. Baſil Kennett, M. A. of the Univerſity of Dublin, Rector of Dimchurch and Vicar of Poſtling near Hythe in Kent, by Mary eldeſt daughter of Mr. Thomas White [A], a wealthy Magiſtrate in Dover, who had been a maſter ſhipwright or builder of ſhips, and after the Reſtoration was employed by the Government in that way (a). Our author was born in the pariſh of St. Mary in Dover Auguſt the 10th 1660; and had the firſt part of his education at Eleham and Wye, two country-ſchools in the neighbourhood; from whence he was removed to Weſtminſter ſchool above the curtain; but falling ſick of the ſmall-pox at the very time of election, his father thought it not adviſeable that he ſhould wait another year. He ſpent a year before he went to the Univerſity in the family of Mr. Tolſon at Beakſborne, and taught his three ſons with great content and ſucceſs (b). He removed to Oxford, and was entered a Batler and Semi-Commoner of St. Edmund Hall in June 1678 (c), and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts May the 2d 1682 (d). He ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his vigorous application to his ſtudies, and by his tranſlations of ſeveral books into Engliſh, and other pieces which he publiſhed [B]. This pamphlet, which was printed in March, and divers copies of it ſent to Oxford about the 15th of the ſame month 168$\frac{2}{1}$ againſt the time that the ſaid Parliament was to ſit, on the 21ſt of that month, "gave "great diſtaſte, ſays Mr. Wood (2), to the factious "party of the Houſe of Commons, who would have "endeavoured to find out the author and have him puniſhed, had not they been ſuddenly diſſolved. the tranſlation of his Convocation Sermon 1710. "He " [that is the Remarker] ſays, the Doctor dedicated " Pliny's Panegyric to the late King James: and what " if he did? Only it appears he had not. This is an " idle tale among the party, who perhaps have told " it till they believe it. When the truth is, there " was no ſuch dedication, and the tranſlation itſelf of " Pliny was not deſigned for any Court-Addreſs. The " young tranſlator's tutor Mr. Allam directed his pupil by way of exerciſe to turn ſome Latin tracts into " Engliſh. The firſt was a little book of Eraſmus " intitled Moriæ Encomium, which the tutor was pleaſed " to give to a Bookſeller in Oxford, who put it in the " preſs, while the tranſlator was but an Under-Graduate. Another ſort of taſk required by his tutor " was this Panegyric of Pliny upon Trajan, which he " likewiſe gave to a Bookſeller in Oxford, before the " tranſlator was Maſter of Arts, deſigning to have it " publiſhed in the reign of King Charles; and a ſmall " cut of that Prince at full length was prepared, and " afterwards put before ſeveral of the books, though " the impreſſion happened to be retarded till the death " of King Charles; and then the ſame tutor, not long " before his own death, adviſed a new preface adapted " to the then received opinion of King James's being a " juſt and good Prince. However there was no dedication to King James, but to a private patron, " a worthy Baronet, who came in heartily to the beginning of the late happy revolution. This is the " whole truth of that ſtory, that hath been ſo often caſt " at the Doctor; not that he thinks himſelf obliged to " defend every thought and expreſſion of his juvenile " ſtudies, when he had poſſibly been trained up to ſome " notions, which he afterwards found reaſon to put " away as childiſh things."

While he lay under great diſorder of body and brain, juſt after he had undergone the ſevere operation of trepanning, for want of ſleep he made a copy of Latin verſes, and dictated them to a friend at his bedſide, who tranſmitted this copy to Sir William Glynne, in whoſe ſtudy it was found, after Mr. Kennett had forgot every thing but the ſad occaſion. It is now, ſays the author of his Life (3), in my poſſeſſion, and thought by good judges to be no reproach to the author.

[D] In 1693 he publiſhed at Oxford in 8vo the Life of Mr. William Somner.] This piece, which was publiſhed in the beginning of that year, was written by way of letter dated from Edmund Hall February the 15th 1692 to the Reverend Mr. James Brome M. A. Rector of Cheriton in Kent, and Chaplain to the Cinque Ports, and prefixed to Mr. Brome's edition of Mr. Somner's Treatiſe of the Roman Ports and Forts in Kent.

[E] The year following Mr. Edmund Gibſon, now Biſhop of London, dedicated to him Mr. Somner's Treatiſe in anſwer to Chifletius concerning the ſituation of Portus Iccius.] This book was printed at Oxford 1694 in 8vo under the following title. Julii Cæſaris Portus Iccius illuſtratus, ſive, 1. Gulielmi Somneri ad Chifletii Librum de Portu-Iccio Reſponſio. 2. Caroli du Freſne Diſſertatio de Portu-Iccio. The dedication is inſcribed Eximio Viro Whito Kennetto; and in it Mr. Gibſon after having taken notice that the ſtudy of antiquity is very much diſcouraged by its being repreſented as dry and barren, and the bane of all delicacy and politeneſs, tells our author, " that by this means, thoſe, " who apply themſelves to it, would be wholly diſ- " couraged, but that they were kept in countenance " by his example and authority. And that there " could not be a more effectual anſwer to the re- " proaches caſt on this ſort of learning, than that vi- " vacity of parts, that ſtrength and delicacy of under- " ſtanding ſo remarkable in him. That from his po- " liteneſs of mind, eaſineſs and affability of manners, " and perfect maſtery in all the parts of gentile learn- " ing, joined with the exacteſt knowledge in antiqui- " ties, the world might ſee that this kind of ſtudy " does by no means cramp the genius, or ſour the " temper; and from his ſoundneſs and ſtrength of " judgment men may learn, that the more unguarded " flights and fallies of imagination are by this means " beſt of all corrected." He then proceeds to tell him, that he eſteems himſelf happy in this reſpect, that the nature of his ſtudies, and his private obligations, both conſpired to engage him to direct that addreſs to him. " For who has a better title to theſe golden remains " of Somner, than one, who by ſo copiouſly and " exactly writing his life, had at the ſame time con- " ferred immortality upon him?"

And Mr. Philip Falle, Rector of Shenly in Hertfordſhire, in a marginal note on his Viſitation-Sermon preached at Hertford June the 12th 1700, having occaſion to cite Biſhop Grindal's Regiſter, obſerves, that he does ſo, " upon the authority " of the Reverend Dr. Kennet, whoſe learned account " of the antiquities of his own Pariſh-Church of Am- " broſden ſhew him excellently accompliſhed to go on " further in the like curious reſearches."

" uſe, when poſterity comes to think, that we have " no Engliſh Dictionary, that gives the true origina- " tion of our language. While Dr. Hickes was thus " pleaſed and amuſed by the Country Vicar, it gave " this latter an opportunity to intreat the Doctor to " look more upon thoſe ſtudies, to review his Saxon " and Iſlandic Grammar, and to embelliſh them with " notes and obſervations, that might revive and im- " prove the knowledge of our antiquities in the riſe " and conveyance of our laws, cuſtoms, tenures, and " other national rights. It was upon this frequent " diſcourſe and importunity of Mr. Kennett, that Dr. " Hickes then and there laid the foundation of that " noble work, which he brought to perfection in about " ſeven years after, and publiſhed under this title, An- " tiquæ Literaturæ Septentrionalis Libri duo, &c. Oxon " 1705, as he himſelf acknowledges in theſe words " in the learned preface. Rev. & doctiſſimus Vir " Whiteus Kennett, S. T. P. &c. i. e. The reverend " and moſt learned White Kennet, &c. more than ſeven " years ago intreated me, that I would undertake this " work of the antient Northern words, which in his opi- " nion deſerving to be more generally underſtood, I imme- " diately ſet about it in his houſe, and having at length " finiſhed it, if it ſhall be found to be of any advan- " tage to the learned world, it is intirely owing to him " as the encourager and promoter of it." The writer above quoted adds (6), that if Dr. Hickes had continued in Mr. Kennett's houſe, where he was well accommodated and well pleaſed, it had probably prevented his writing or acting upon any other ſubject than that of our national antiquities; for in daily talk he had projected ſeveral ſchemes about illuſtrating the dark hiſtory of the Britons, deſcribing the manners of the Germans, tracing them in the Norman cuſtoms, and more eſpecially enquiring into the religion of the Saxons before it was adulterated by Popery. But the Doctor being then under a legal incapacity, (which however was ſoon after taken off without his trouble or charge, by the generoſity of the late Lord Somers) he wore a lay-habit, and affected to be unknown, till a Fellow of a College in Oxford coming over, and calling the Doctor by his name, he thought there was danger in ſtaying, and ſo went off immediately to ſome obſcure retreat, and thence in a little while to London. Our author, at his firſt coming to London, laboured to keep up a friendſhip with the Doctor, and hoped, they might agree in the common ſtudies of our Engliſh and other Northern antiquities. To this purpoſe he ſent him ſome preſents of wine, procured him now and then ſome neceſſary books and papers to carry on his great work, and obtained for him ſeveral ſubſcriptions to it, and did all he could to be a little ſerviceable, and altogether inoffenſive to him. " But he found, ſays the writer of our author's life (7), " that the Doctor was going into notions and meaſures " utterly inconſiſtent with their former freedom, and " ſo by degrees there grew a coldneſs, a diſtance, and " mutual complaints of one another, owing only to " their very different principles in Church and State- " Affairs, both being very much in earneſt with what " they profeſſed. This was ſoon after improved into " an open rupture; and Dr. Hickes for one ſuppoſed " affront, after many obligations, is ſaid to have fal- " len upon Dr. Kennett in the rudeſt manner, and " with ſome of the falſeſt things in the world (*)."

[H] In 1701 he was engaged in the controverſy relating to the conſtitution of the Engliſh Synods.] He wrote upon this ſubject, Eccleſiaſtical Synods and Parliamentary Convocations in the Church of England hiſtorically ſtated and juſtly vindicated from the miſrepreſentations of Mr. Atterbury. By White Kennett, D. D. Part I. London 1701 in 8vo dedicated to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and An Occaſional Letter on the ſubject of Engliſh Convocations. London 1701. He is ſaid likewiſe to be the author of The Hiſtory of the Convocation of the Prelates and Clergy of the Province of Canterbury, ſummoned to meet in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul London, on Febr. 6. 1700. In anſwer to A Narrative of the Proceedings of the Lower Houſe of Convocation. London 1702 in 4to.

[I] Of the proceedings of which ſociety he publiſhed an account in 1706.] It was printed in 4to under this title. An Account of the Society for propagating the Goſpel in Foreign Parts, eſtabliſhed by the Royal Charter of King William III. with their Proceedings and Succeſs, and Hopes of continual Progreſs under the happy Reign of her moſt excellent Majeſty Queen Anne. Within four years after he continued and improved that account by an hiſtorical account of what had been tranſacted by the ſame ſociety; and eſpecially what ſteps and meaſures had been taken by the ſociety De propagandâ Fide at Rome, and what more Chriſtian methods by reformed States and Princes. This was a work of great pains, and brought to ſome tolerable perfection, but never publiſhed, becauſe the printing of it would have been of greater expence to that ſociety than their circumſtances would admit of (8).

[K] He deſigned likewiſe to have written An Hiſtorical Account of the Corporation for the Relief of poor Widows and Children of Clergymen, &c; but was diſcouraged from it.] He had for this purpoſe collected a great many notices of things and perſons, and the ſeveral ſermons before the Sons of the Clergy from the firſt by Mr. George Hall, afterwards Archdeacon of Canterbury, and Biſhop of Cheſter, intitled The Tribe of Levi 1658, downwards; and ſearched the laſt wills of ſeveral donors and benefactors; and would by degrees have connected the materials into ſome order for the preſs, but that he was unkindly uſed, and the ſpirit of ſome new members of that corporation raiſed anger and hatred more than affection and charity to the Church and Clergy (9).

[L] His Sermon at Aldgate on the 30*th of Jan.* 1703 expoſed him to great clamour, and occaſioned many pamphlets to be written againſt it.] This Sermon was printed under the title of A compaſſionate enquiry into the cauſes of the civil war. In a Sermon preach'd in the Church of St. Botolph-Aldgate the 30*th of January* 1703, London 1704. in 4to. The cauſes of this war improved by wicked arts and deſigns he aſſigns to be, " Firſt, " a French intereſt and alliance, and from thence ari- " ſing, Secondly, the apprehenſions and fears of popery, " which led on, Thirdly, the jealouſies of oppreſſion " and illegal power; which tended more and more to, " Fourthly, the growth of prophaneneſs and immorali- " ty; and even this help'd to produce, Fifthly, that " hypocriſy and perfidiouſneſs, which accompliſhed " the ſin and the infinite ſcandal of this day." After the publication of this ſermon, there appeared ſeveral pieces againſt it; but thoſe, who threatened to complain of it in convocation, where the Doctor had by other writings offended the majority of the lower houſe, thought fit to drop their intentions. And ſoon after he received an order to preach before the houſe of commons on the ſame occaſion, January 30th, 1705-6, and the Doctor had the thanks of the houſe for his ſermon, and was deſired to print it, as accordingly it was.

1704 he publiſhed his Caſe of Impropriations [M], and two other tracts upon the ſame ſubject [N]. In 1705 he preached the Conſecration Sermon for Dr. William Wake Biſhop of Lincoln [O]. In 1706 he publiſhed the third volume of the Complete Hiſtory of England [P]. In 1707 his Funeral Sermon upon the Duke of Devonſhire occaſioned great clamours againſt him [Q]. Soon after he was preferred to the Deanery of Peterborough, having been before appointed Chaplain in ordinary to her Majeſty at the recommendation of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and the Earl of Godolphin (m). The ſame year by the advice and under the favour of the Archbiſhop, he reſigned his laborious Cure of Aldgate, and accepted of her Majeſty's gift of the Rectory of St. Mary Aldermary in London; upon which exchange he loſt above one hundred pounds a year for the purchaſe of a little more retirement and opportunity for ſtudy. In 1709 he publiſhed A Vindication of the Church and Clergy of England from ſome late Reproaches rudely and unjuſtly caſt upon them [R]; and A true Anſwer to Dr. Sacheverell's Sermon before the

[M] In 1704 he publiſhed his caſe of impropriations.] It was printed at London in 8vo under this title: The caſe of Impropriations, and of the augmentation of vicarages and other inſufficient cures, ſtated by hiſtory and laws, from the firſt uſurpation of the Popes and Monks, to her Majeſty's Royal Bounty, lately extended to the poorer clergy of the Church of England: with an appendix of records and memorials relating to that ſubject. From the firſt publication of this book the Doctor was, upon all occaſions of inquiry, gathering up ſuch authorities, and ſuch inſtances of fact and due inferences from them, as when connected into a new edition of that work, will greatly improve it.

[N] and two other tracts upon the ſame ſubject.] The firſt tract is intitled, De non temerandis Eccleſiis, &c. written by Sir Henry Spelman Knt. The ſecond tract is intitled, The poor Vicar's plea for tythes, &c. By Thomas Ryves, Doctor of the Civil Law. To theſe Dr. Kennett prefixed a prefatory account of the authors and theſe works. London 1734. In this preface the Doctor begins thus: "Her Majeſty's late pious munificence to the Clergy of the Church of England has "made glad the hearts of her beſt ſubjects, the beſt "Chriſtians, and has made them reflect on the alienation of tythes and offerings, as the great ſcandal "of Popery and the great defect of our Reformation. "To make up a competent maintenance for the parochial miniſters and ſo the better to provide for the "ſervice of God, and the care of ſouls, has been the "continual ſubject of all good men's wiſhes, propoſals "and attempts." The Doctor's long courſe of ſtudies had the better inſtructed and qualified him for theſe purpoſes. He had before delivered many things of that kind in his Parochial Antiquities; and had purſued the ſame Deſign in publiſhing in 1698 another tract of Sir Henry Spelman, intitled, the hiſtory and fate of ſacrilege, diſcovered by examples of ſcriptures of heathens, and of Chriſtians, from the beginning of the World continually to this day. Wrote in the year 1632. A treatiſe omitted in the late edition of his poſthumous Works, and now publiſh'd for the terror of evil doers.

[O] In 1705 he preached the conſecration ſermon for Dr. William Wake Biſhop of Lincoln.] It was publiſhed at London in 1706 under this title. The office and good work of a Biſhop. A Sermon preached in Lambeth Chapel, at the conſecration of the right Reverend Father in God William Lord Biſhop of Lincoln on Sunday Octob. 21. 1705, publiſhed at the deſire of the Archbiſhop and Biſhops. The writer of our author's life (10) ſtiles this a moſt learned and excellent diſcourſe; and tells us, that "it was admired ſo much by the late Lord "Chief Juſtice Holt, that he declared, it had more in "it to the purpoſe of the legal and Chriſtian conſtitution of this Church, than any volume of diſcourſes."

[P] In 1706 he publiſhed the third volume of the complete hiſtory of England.] Some Bookſellers had been adviſed to make a collection of the beſt writers of the lives and reigns of our ſeveral Engliſh Princes from the conqueſt to the beginning of the reign of Queen Anne, and to reprint them fairly in three volumes. When they had laid this ſcheme, they found it neceſſary to have a continuation made by ſome one new hand, of the four laſt reigns of Charles I. Charles II. James II. and William III. and they at laſt prevail'd with Dr. Kennet to draw up the materials for this third volume. He had no manner of hand in any branch of the two former, nor in the preface to them, which was written by Mr. John Hughes, and concluded thus: "For what remains to be ſaid concerning "the third volume, the judicious and accompliſhed "writer of it has thought fit in his own words to addreſs the public as follows." And the words, [All new writ by a learned and impartial hand] were added by the bookſellers. From whence it is plain, that the author reſolved to conceal his name; and we may believe, that the few Undertakers for the preſs, who were let into the ſecret, were obliged by promiſe not to betray it. "But it ſeems, ſays the writer of his life (11), "in a pragmatical age, with a reſtleſs party, the con"cealing and withdrawing himſelf did but raiſe the "fiercer purſuits after him; and the Jacobite outcry "was, that Dr. Kennett was the writer of that hiſto"ry, deſigning to expoſe them and their cauſe. Dr. "Hickes was the firſt, who was extremely angry, that "there was not a due reſpect paid to his book Jovian, "and to the notions of it. And even ſome perſons, "who had gone into the revolution with forwardneſs "enough, and yet had not found their full account in it, "were offended, that too much or too little notice "was taken of the parts they acted about that time. "And above all [an eminent Peer (12), very inſtru"mental in the revolution by taking up arms in the "North, had made ſuch an improvement of his ho"nours and fortunes by it, that he thought himſelf "privileged and protected from any retroſpect upon "his conduct in the court and treaſury of King Charles "II. And therefore finding in that hiſtory a narra"tive of what appeared to be male-adminiſtration, "though taken from the Parliament Journals and print"ed Trials, and other public Papers, he was much "offended, and taking an opportunity, upon the death "of the Duke of Montague, to give ſome account of "his tranſactions with France from his own papers "and letters, complained of the miſrepreſentation of "his ſervices made by the late hiſtorian; who really "did not ſeem to mean any thing of reflection on his "noble perſon and family, but related facts as he "found them before related. However on the occaſion "of his Grace's complaint, he enquired more narrowly into thoſe matters, and ſtated them over again in "a moſt authentic manner; but finding that the more "full diſcovery would only create the greater offence, "he would not ſuffer what he had written, to be publiſhed to the world." The Complete Hiſtory was reprinted at London 1719 in fol. with many corrections and additions.

[Q] In 1707 his Funeral Sermon upon the Duke of Devonſhire occaſioned great clamour againſt him.] It was printed at London 1708 in 8vo, under the following title: A Sermon preached at the Funeral of the right noble William Duke of Devonſhire, in the Church of All-hallows in Derby, on Friday September 5. 1707. With ſome memoirs of the family of Cavendiſh. The paſſage, which gave the principal offence, has been quoted in our article of CAVENDISH (William) the firſt Duke of Devonſhire.

[R] In 1709 he publiſhed a vindication of the Church and Clergy of England &c.] It was printed at London in 8vo. It was occaſioned by a pamphlet publiſhed by one S. Curate of a pariſh near the City, who afterwards joined himſelf to the Non-Jurors, and intitled An appeal of the Clergy of the Church of England to my Lords the Biſhops, humbly beſeeching them to move her moſt ſacred Majeſty to redreſs their grievances, &c. Dr. Kennett's Anſwer was deſigned to vindicate the Clergy from the charge brought againſt them by this writer, on ſeveral heads, "which the Doctor ſtated with juſt reſpect to "the rules of the Church, and to the practice of the "better part of the Clergy."

the Lord Mayor Nov. the 5th 1709 [S]. In 1710 he was greatly reproached for not joining in the London Clergy's Addreſs to the Queen [T]. The ſame year he preached the Latin Sermon at the opening of the Convocation [U]. He was expoſed to great odium as a Low-Church Man on account of his conduct and writings [W]. In 1713 he preſented the Society for propagating the Goſpel with a great number of books, ſuitable to their deſign, and publiſhed his Bibliothecæ Americanæ Primordia [X], and founded an Antiquarian and Hiſtorical Library at Peterborough [Y]. In 1715 he publiſhed a Sermon, intitled, The Witchcraft of the preſent Rebellion [Z], and afterwards ſeveral other pieces.

(S) A true anſwer to Dr. Sacheverell's Sermon &c.] It was printed at London 1709 in 8vo. It begins thus" " You asked me laſt night, what I thought the beſt " way of anſwering Dr. Sacheverell's Sermon on No- " vember 5. I told you, one way was to let it drop " into ſilence and contempt, for that there was not one " argument to anſwer, but a jumble of words and pe- " riods, that made the crackling of thorns, noiſe and " flame; and therefore it was better to pity the man, " and deſpiſe the ſtuff. It could do no harm, but ra- " ther great ſervice to make his own party-friends a- " ſhamed of him, and to convince the world, that " madneſs is as bad as moderation. But ſaid you, there " be ſome anſwers in print, and will be more. Pray " what is the beſt courſe that a new anſwerer can take " with him? Why Sir, ſaid I, to let him anſwer " himſelf; that is, to produce his own words, and to " let him ſtand or fall by them, without calling him " any names, or raking into his life and converſation. " You preſſed me, Sir, to give a ſpecimen of it. Here " it is, cool and calm, under theſe heads; Propriety, " Pertinence, good ſenſe, Veracity, Serioufneſs, Charity, " and Allegiance.

[T] In 1710 he was greatly reproached for not joining in the London Clergy's addreſs to the Queen.] When the great point in Doctor Sacheverell's trial, the change of the miniſtry, was gained, and very ſtrange addreſſes were made upon it, there was like to be a like artful addreſs from the Biſhop and Clergy of London, and they who would not ſubſcribe it, were to be repreſented as enemies to the Queen and her Miniſtry (13). Dr. Kennett fell under this imputation; and advice of it was ſent through the kingdom by Mr. Dyer in his letter of Auguſt 24th 1710, in theſe words: " The addreſs of the Biſhop " and Clergy of London was inſerted in this day's Ga- " zette by order of the Queen, as a diſtinguiſhing fa- " vour to them. The Clergymen, who refuſed to ſign " it, were Dr. Barton, and Mr. Baker; and thoſe, " who did not anſwer to the Biſhop's Summons were " Dr. Kennett, Dr. Bradford, Dr. Hancock, and Mr. " Hoadly. And therefore as they have no ſhare in the " Queen's thanks, ſo I hope they will have as little " in her favours."

[U] He preached the Latin Sermon at the opening of the convocation.] It was printed at London in 4to, under this title: Concio ad Synodum ab Archiepiſcopo, Epiſcopis, & Clero Provinciæ Cantuarienſis &c. It was tranſlated into Engliſh without the author's knowledge for the benefit, as it was ſaid, of the diſſenting teachers. Upon which he took care for a more correct tranſlation, to which he ſubjoined a Poſtſcript, in which he vindicated himſelf from ſome reproaches caſt upon him.

[W] He was expoſed to great odium as a Low-Churchman, on account of his conduct and writings.] He zealouſly oppoſed the doctrine of the invalidity of Lay-Baptiſm. He was ſuppoſed likewiſe to be the author of A letter to the Reverend Thomas Brett, LL. D. Rectorof Betteſhanger in Kent, about a motion in Convocation: London 1712 occaſioned by a complaint in Convocation againſt Dr. Brett's Sermon, intitled, A Sermon of remiſſion of ſins, according to the ſcriptures, and the Doctrine of the Church of England. He reprinted likewiſe in 1714 a Sermon of Dr. John Whitgift, Dean of Lincoln, and afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, preached before Queen Elizabeth at Greenwich, to which he prefixed a preface dated November 28th 1713. He publiſhed the ſame year A memorial for Proteſtants on the 5th of November, containing a more full diſcovery of ſome particulars relating to the happy deliverance of King James I. and the three eſtates of the Realm of England, from the moſt traiterous and bloody intended maſſacre by Gunpowder, anno 1605. In a letter to a Peer of Great Britain: dated October 25. 1712. and A letter to the Lord Biſhop of Carliſle, concerning one of his predeceſſors, Biſhop Merks, on occaſion of a new volume for the Pretender, intitled, The hereditary right of the Crown of England aſſerted. London 1713. About this time it was, that a very uncommon method was taken to expoſe the Dean by Dr. Welton, Rector of the Church of White-chapel. For in the Altar-piece of that Church, which was intended for a repreſentation of Chriſt and his twelve Apoſtles eating the Paſſover and the Laſt Supper, Judas the Traytor was drawn ſitting in an elbow-chair, dreſſed in a black garment, between a gown and a cloak, with a black ſcarf and a white band, a ſhort wig, and a mark in his forehead between a lock and a patch, and with a great deal of the air of Dr. Kennett's face. It was generally ſaid, that the original sketch was for a Biſhop under Dr. Welton's diſpleaſure, which occaſioned the elbow-chair. But the painter being apprehenſive of an action of Scandalum Magnatum, leave was given to drop the Biſhop, and make the Dean. This giving a general offence, upon the complaint of others (for Dr. Kennett never ſaw it, or ſeemed to regard it) the Biſhop of London ordered the picture to be taken down (14).

[Y] Founded an Antiquarian and Hiſtorical Library at Peterborough.] He had been long gathering up the ſcattered remains of our Engliſh writers, or any other authors upon the ſubject of our Engliſh affairs, from the very beginning of Engliſh printing to the latter end of Queen Elizabeth; which, when put in order of time, would make up ſuch a ſeries and connection of the antiquities and hiſtory of this Church and Nation, as would be of great light and ſervice to the world. The collection of theſe books, amounting to about fifteen hundred volumes and ſmall tracts, was placed in a private room at Peterborough, in order to be daily ſupplied and augmented under the care of the Reverend Mr. Joſeph Sparke, a member of that Cathedral. There is a large written catalogue of them thus inſcribed; Index Librorum aliquot vetuſtorum, quos in commune Bonum congeſſit W. K. Decan. Petriburg. MDCCXII. In this collection there are moſt of the printed legends of Saints; the oldeſt rituals and liturgies; the firſt printed ſtatutes and laws; the moſt antient Homilies and Sermons, the firſt editions of the Engliſh ſchoolmen, Poſtillers, expounders, &c. with a great many fragments of our antient language, uſage, cuſtoms, rights, tenures, and ſuch other things, as tend to illuſtrate the antiquities and hiſtory of Great Britain and Ireland, and the ſucceſſive ſtate of civil government, Religion, and learning in them. In a letter of his to a friend, dated at Peterborough July 27th 1717 he writes thus: I have improved the collection I have been long making for an Hiſtorical Antiquarian Library, conſiſting of the oldeſt books relating to Engliſh writers and affairs: I have conſiderably increaſed my catalogue of the lives of eminent men. He likewiſe inriched the common library of the Cathedral of Peterborough with ſome very uſeful books; and added to the ſtock of monuments and records there, an abſtract of the collections made by Dr. John Coſens, one of his Predeceſſors, afterwards Biſhop of Durham.

In 1717 he was engaged in a diſpute with Dr. William Nicholſon, Biſhop of Carliſle, relating to ſome pretended alterations in the Biſhop of Bangor's famous Sermon [BB]; and diſliked the proceedings of the Convocation againſt that Biſhop. This with his zeal for the repeal of the Schiſm Bill rendered him very obnoxious to thoſe of a different party (n). Upon the death of Dr. Cumberland Biſhop of Peterborough he was promoted to that See, to which he was conſecrated November the 9th 1718. In this Biſhopric, having ſate little more than ten years, he died at his houſe in St. James's Street Weſtminſter on Thurſday December the 19th 1728, and was interred at Peterborough. The ſecond letter was occaſioned by a paper ſeized among the papers of Mr. Laurence Howell, ſuperſcribed a letter to Dr. Kennett, which ſeemed deſigned for a dedication or preface to a book, intitled, An anſwer to the brief Hiſtory of the Crown of England, written at the time when the bill of excluſion was attempted againſt the Queen's Father, the Duke of York. The letter prefixed to this complained, that "Dr. Kennett "had given a vile character of Biſhop Merks, and yet "againſt his will had made him ſtrictly faithful to his "rightful Sovereign".

[BB] In 1717 he was engaged in a diſpute with Dr. William Nicholſon, Biſhop of Carliſle, relating to ſome pretended alterations in the Biſhop of Bangor's famous ſermon.] This ſermon having been attacked by Dr. Andrew Snape, the Biſhop publiſhed an Anſwer, in which, upon occaſion of a report ſpread by ſome perſons about the town, that he was put upon preaching that ſermon at Court, to ſerve ſome political ends, he uſes theſe words; God knows, I preached what I found there [in the New Teſtament] without the knowledge of any man living (†). Dr. Snape had been told a ſtory by Dr. Hutchinſon inconſiſtent with the Biſhop's poſitive and ſolemn declaration, namely, that the ſermon was preached with the knowledge and ſubmitted to the correction of a certain perſon, who adviſed the making alterations in it. Upon this in the concluſion of his ſecond letter he thus addreſſes himſelf to the Biſhop: "I muſt needs ſay, your evaſive equivocal way of writing "ſavours very ſtrongly of ſuch communication [that is, "with a Jeſuit] and whether the ſame perſon may not "have helped you to a mental reſervation to juſtify a "ſolemn appeal to God, that what you preached was "without the knowledge of any man living, when a "living man has teſtified, that it was preached with "his knowledge, and ſubmitted to his correction, "your Lordſhip beſt knows." Immediately upon the publication of this the Biſhop of Bangor called upon Dr. Snape for the proof of what he had aſſerted; who preſently declared, that he had received that account from Dr. Hutchinſon, who had heard the Biſhop of Carliſle ſay, that he had ſpoken with the perſon, who adviſed the Biſhop of Bangor, upon reading his ſermon, to inſert ſuch words as abſolutely, properly, &c. And that ſome days after, the ſame Divine again aſſured him, that he had heard the ſame Prelate a ſecond time declare that matter to be true, and that he would juſtify it to all the world. Upon this Dr. Snape drew up that paſſage, waited upon the Biſhop of Carliſle, read it to him, and was allowed by him to publiſh it, with an aſſurance that he would ſtand to it. This was the ſubſtance of Dr. Snape's advertiſement; to which the Biſhop of Carliſle was perſuaded to add, This is true, though he afterwards declared, that it was not ſtrictly ſo. However being now called upon to name the living man, who was to atteſt the truth of what he aſſerted, he fixed on Dr. Kennett, who, he declares, according to the beſt of his remembrance, was the perſon, who told him, that the ſermon was preached with his knowledge, and ſubmitted to his correction; and that the Doctor adviſed, and with difficulty prevailed for the inſerting the words abovementioned. This was denied by Dr. Kennett in the moſt ſolemn manner in all his converſations, public advertiſements, and private letters to his friends. The reader may ſee a particular account of this affair in the Life of Biſhop Kennett p. 165 & ſeqq. and in the Appendix to it.

And the author of his Life tells us (p), that he was a man of extenſive learning, exemplary character, great zeal in the diſcharge of his Paſtoral and Epiſcopal Functions, of a charitable and courteous diſpoſition, and of firm probity, courage and reſolution in the performance of his duty. ☞KENNETT (BASIL), a learned Engliſh writer, and brother of the preceding, was educated in Corpus Chriſti College in the Univerſity of Oxford, where he took the degree of Bachelor and Maſter of Arts, and became Fellow of that College. In 1706 he went over Chaplain to the Engliſh Factory at Leghorn, where he met with great oppoſition from the Papiſts, and was in danger of the inquiſition [A]. He returned to England about the year 1713, and was elected Preſident of Corpus Chriſti College, and became Doctor of Divinity, He died in the year 1714. He publiſhed the Lives of [A] Where he met with great oppoſition from the Papiſts, and was in dangër of the Inquiſition.] The author of the Life of Dr. White Kennett, Biſhop of Peterborough (1) tells us, that the Italians were ſo jealous of the Northern Hereſy, eſpecially the Prieſts and Regulars were ſo watchful againſt it, that the Engliſh nation and Miniſter were forced to begin the exerciſes of religion with the utmoſt privacy and caution, to give as little offence as poſſible. And yet great offence was taken at it, and complaints and informations immediately ſent to Florence and to Rome. The Envoy at Florence, Dr. Newton, did all the matter could bear to inſiſt on the right of the Engliſh merchants, to have a Miniſter among them of their own religion; and offered to undertake, that he ſhould not publicly reflect on the religion of the country, nor attempt to bring over any of the Duke's ſubjects to the Proteſtant perſuaſion. But the Pope and the Court of Inquiſition at Rome were reſolved to expell hereſy and the public teacher of it from the confines of the Holy See; and therefore ſecret orders were given to apprehend Mr. Kennett at Leghorn, and to hurry him away to Piſa, and thence to ſome other priſon, to bury him alive, or otherwiſe diſpoſe of him in the ſevereſt manner. Upon notice of this deſign upon him, the Engliſh Envoy at Florence interpoſed his offices in that court, but could obtain no other anſwer, but that he might ſend for the Engliſh Preacher, and keep him in his own family as his Domeſtic Chaplain; but that otherwiſe if he preſumed to continue at Leghorn, he muſt take the conſequences of it; for in thoſe matters of religion the Court of Inquiſition was ſuperior to all civil powers. The Envoy communicated this anſwer of the Great Duke to the Earl of Sunderland, one of her Majeſty's Principal Secretaries of State, who, in her Majeſty's name returned the following directions.

" To Dr. Henry Newton, her Majeſty's Envoy in the " Court of Florence.

" Sir,

" Yours of the 16th and 24th I received. In anſwer to which, I have laid the whole affair before " her Majeſty, who has commanded me to order you " to tell the Great Duke and his Miniſters, in her " Majeſty's name, that if there be any moleſtation " given to her Chaplain reſiding at Leghorn, ſhe " ſhall look upon it as an affront done to her ſelf " and the nation, a breach of peace, and a violation " of the law of nations; and ſhall by her fleets and " armies, which will be all the year in the Mediterra- " nean Sea, not only demand, but take ſatisfaction for " any ſuch injury offered. And that the Prieſt of the " Great Duke's Miniſter here, and all frequenters of " his Chapel muſt expect the ſame treatment. And " if they talk any more of the Pope or Court of " Rome, you muſt cut the matter ſhort, by telling " them, her Majeſty has nothing to do with that " Court, but ſhall treat with the Great Duke as with " other independent Princes and States. And this you " muſt do in the moſt forcible manner poſſible. I " have no more at preſent to add, but am

" Your humble ſervant

Before this letter could reach Florence, the Engliſh Envoy was extremely embarraſſed with the difficulties of treating for the protection and ſecurity of Mr. Kennett, and could find no expedient more proper for the preſent, than to invite him earneſtly to his houſe at Florence, and there cover him till the affair ſhould be adjuſted, and for that purpoſe to ſend him a qualification as his Domeſtic Chaplain. But the Engliſh Conſul and Factory at Leghorn would not readily conſent to let him go away, as fearing that if this point was once gained, he would never be allowed to return. Nor was Mr. Kennett himſelf willing to conſult his own ſafety by ſeeming to forſake his charge; and therefore continued there, though in the utmoſt danger. He was forced to confine himſelf to his chamber, and to have an armed guard at the ſtair's foot; and when in ſome evenings he went out for the air, he walked between two Engliſh merchants, who with their ſwords drawn reſolved and declared, that no body ſhould dare to ſeize him but at their peril. But as ſoon as the Earl of Sunderland's letter came to the Envoy's hands, and was by him communicated to the Duke and his Miniſters, the contents of it were ſoon by them imparted to the Pope and his Cardinals, who ſo well underſtood the argument of fleets and armies, that Mr. Kennett eſcaped their intended fury, and continued for ſeveral years to officiate as a Miniſter of the Church of England in a large room, ſet apart for a Chapel, in the Conſul's houſe, with public prayers, and a courſe of ſermons ſince publiſhed to the world. When he had ſeen himſelf well eſtabliſhed in this privilege, and had ſo laid the foundation of it, he began to think that the having a ſucceſſor in that place upon the ſame bottom would be the beſt confirmation; and therefore earneſtly importuned his brother, the Dean of Peterborough, to find out a fit perſon to ſucceed him. And he had indeed the greater reaſon to inſiſt upon coming home, becauſe his conſtitution did not agree with that warmer climate in his abſtemious way of living. However, he declared, that he would not ſtir till he ſaw a ſucceſſor upon the ſpot to relieve him. This at laſt, after great delay and obſtructions from the Queen's New Miniſtry, was obtained, and Mr. Kennett was ſucceeded by Mr. Nathaniel Taubman, who had been Chaplain in her Majeſty's fleet in the Mediterranean, and had publiſhed an account of the expedition (2).

KEPLER (JOHN), one of the greateſt Aſtronomers of his age, was born at Wiel in the country of Wirtemberg December the 27th 1571. He began his ſtudies of Philoſophy at Tubingen in 1589, and two years after ſtudied Mathematics in the ſame Univerſity under the famous Michael Mœſtlin. He made ſo great a progreſs in it, that in the year 1595 he wrote an excellent book, which was printed at Tubingen the year following under the title of Prodromus Diſſertationum de proportione Orbium cæleſtium, deque cauſis cælerum numeri, magnitudinis, motuumque periodicorum genuinis & propriis, &c. He had been before invited to Gratz in Styria, to teach Mathematics there (a). Tycho Brahe having ſettled in Bohemia, and obtained from the Emperor all the ſorts of conveniences for the perfecting of Aſtronomy, was paſſionately deſirous of having Kepler with him, and wrote to him ſo many letters upon that ſubject, that he prevailed upon him to leave the Univerſity of Gratz, and remove into Bohemia with his family and library in the year 1600 (b). Kepler in this journey was ſeized by a quartan ague, which continued ſeven or eight months, ſo that he could not do Tycho Brahe all the ſervices which he was capable of. He was even a little diſſatisfied with the reſervedneſs which Tycho ſhewed towards him (c); for the latter did not communicate to him all that he knew; and as he died in 1601, he did not give time to our Kepler to be very uſeful to him, or to receive any conſiderable advantage under him. From that time Kepler enjoyed the title of Mathematician to the Emperor all his life (d), and gained more and more reputation by his works [A]. The Emperor Rodolphus ordered him to finiſh the Tables of Tycho,

"Thomas Lanſius in Mantiſſa Orat. p. 792. tells us, that Kepler being once aſked by him, which of the books publiſhed by him he eſteemed moſt, gave the preference to his Myſterium Coſmographicum, declaring that in this book the ſublime ſecret of the five regular bodies, which had lain hid ſo many ages, was diſcovered; and that he valued that diſcovery ſo much, when it was new, that if the Electorate of Saxony had been offered to him at the ſame time, upon condition of renouncing either the offer or the invention, he would rather have refuſed that extenſive principality ſo well furniſhed with metals, than have quitted an invention, which would bring him immortal honour."

[B] The Treaſurers were ſo ill affected towards him.] Unhappy are thoſe learned men, who depend upon thoſe Gentlemen, and who cannot compleat a work, without the good humour of the Intendants of the Finances; a ſet of men, who in order to ſerve their Prince well, are obliged to weary out by a thouſand difficulties thoſe who have penſions from him. They leave him by this means the reputation of liberality without its coſting him much. I make uſe of Gaſſendi's words to ſhew the diſcontent of Kepler. *Alacriter quidem ille ſe accinxit; verum illæ brevi, ac aliæ deinceps, partim ex operis naturâ, partim ex tergiverſatione Præfectorum ærarii, ſubortæ fuere difficultates, ut priuſquam Tabulæ perfectæ evulgatæque fuerunt, annus ſæculi XXVII adventarit. "He applied himſelf vigorouſly to it; "but ſuch difficulties aroſe in a ſhort time, partly "from the nature of the work, and partly from the "delay of the Treaſurers, that the Tables were not "finiſhed and publiſhed till the year 1627. He com"plained, that from the year 1602 and 1603 he "was looked upon by the Treaſurers with a very "invidious eye; and when in 1609 he had publiſhed "a noble ſpecimen of the work, and the Emperor "Rodolphus had given orders, that beſides the ex"pence of the edition, he ſhould immediately be "paid the arrears of his penſion, which, he ſaid, "amounted to two thouſand crowns, and likewiſe "two thouſand crowns more; yet, he complained, "that it was not till two years after, that the gene"rous orders of Rodolphus in his favour were put in "execution, and that he in vain knocked at the door "of the Sileſian and Imperial Chamber." Kepler met with no leſs diſcouragement from the Financiers under the Emperor Matthias, than under Rodolphus. Licet anno inſequente Matthias Rudolphi ſucceſſor & continuari ſtipendia, & exſolvi reſidua juſſiſſet, querebatur tamen anno XVI. exſpectare ſe adhuc mandatorum exoptatiſſimum effectum (3). He had occaſion to continue his patience under the Emperor Ferdinand; but at laſt he received his arrears. Perſeverarunt adhuc querelæ poſt exactum XIX, quo Ferdinandus Matthiæ ſucceſſit, etiamque poſt XXI, quo edidit partem Doctrinæ Copernicanæ theoricam, juxta quam deductio tabularum foret: quouſque optimus imperator rebus licet nondum penitus compoſitis etiam vetera, quæ Anteceſſores debebant, ſtipendia perſolvit, ac ut neceſſarii ad maturationem editionemque Operis ſumptus ſuppeditarentur mandavit (4). i. e. The punctuality in the payment of his penſion was interrupted; for the reaſon why he went to Ratiſbon in 1630 was, that he had occaſion to ſollicit there the payment of his arrears. Cum anno XXX. ad Comitia Ratiſbonenſia, ut ſtipendiorum reſidua poſtularet, ſe contuliſſet, incidit in ardentem febrim, exque eâ . . . obiiſſe initio Decembris, ut certè ad Deodatum ſcripſit Beneggerus, cum & eximius Eichſtadius ad me ſcripſerit, fuiſſe eum catarrho extinctum, quem apoſtemata quædam cerebri ob nimiam equitationem præceſſerant (5).

[C] Lewis Kepler . . . was apprehenſive leſt the care of the impreſſion of his father's Somnium . . . ſhould occaſion his death.] The laſt work, which John Kepler wrote, was the Deſcription of the Moon: he had not the ſatisfaction of publiſhing it, for he died during the courſe of the impreſſion. James Bartſchius his ſon-in-law, and faithful follower in his aſtronomical opinions, undertook the care of this book, and continued the impreſſion, but was interrupted in this employment by death. Lewis Kepler, the author's ſon, was ſo ſurprized at theſe accidents, that he was with great difficulty prevailed upon to undertake the care of this book. He was fearful of loſing his life as his father and brother-in-law had done; and his mother-in-law, John Kepler's widow, who in very narrow circumſtances had a burthen of children, was obliged to make uſe of many entreaties and arguments to engage him in that work. At laſt ſhe ſucceeded. A learned Profeſſor of Utrecht has made uſe of theſe circumſtances in order to explode Kepler's doctrine concerning the world in the moon. Unum, ſays he, præterire nequeo, quod ſpectat Selenographiæ Keplerianæ natales; unde jure merito malè ominor Levaniæ ejuſque incolis. i. e. John Kepler's notions are ſometimes very ſingular; one would imagine, that he aſcribed to the earth a ſoul endued with ſenſe [D]. It is ſaid, that he furniſhed excellent hints to Des Cartes [E]. We may place him among thoſe authors, who have ſaid, that they eſteemed date the ſpeculations of mathematicians to the explication of natural philoſophy. I do not think that this deſign can ever ſucceed; for the object of mathematics and that of natural philoſophy are things irreconcileable; the one is a quantity which ſubſiſts only ideally, and cannot ſubſiſt in any other manner; the other exiſts out of our mind, and cannot really be in it. However that be, let us ſee the ſevere expreſſions of Schoockius. Ubi Mathematicus, nemo eodem (Johanne Keplero) melior & ſubtilior, ubi verò Phyſicus, nemo eodem pejor atque ineptior, ut ſæpiſſimè doleam, ſi non ingemiſcam, virum tam eximium, divinam illam Matheſin nugamentis ſuis Phyſicis adeò fœdè commaculaſſe. Nec ſic Keplerus ſolum, per Matheſin imprudenter & infeliciter Phyſicæ applicatam, in errorum præcipitium ruit, ſed cum eo multi quoque alii, quorum indicem alio in ſcripto, ſi Deo placuerit vitam prorogare, exhibebo (7). i. e. "Where he writes as a mathematician, "no perſon performs better or more ſubtilly than he; "where he acts the natural philoſopher, no perſon "perhaps writes more abſurdly; ſo that I am often "greatly ſorry, that ſo excellent a man ſhould diſgrace the divine ſcience of mathematics with his "phyſical abſurdities. For what could an old woman "in a fever dream more ridiculous, than that the "earth is a vaſt animal, which breathes out the winds "through the holes of the mountains, as it were "through a mouth and noſtrils? Yet he writes expreſly "thus in the fourth book and ſeventh chapter of his "Harmonica Mundi, where he endeavours likewiſe ſeriouſly to prove, that the earth has a ſympathy with "the heavens, and by a natural inſtinct perceives the poſition of the ſtars. In his book De Motibus Martis "fol. 173, he alſo aſſerts, that the ſun is a great "magnet or magnetical body, carried round upon "its own center in a diurnal motion, and by a certain diffuſed power carries round the reſt of the "planets. Nor has Kepler alone fallen into groſs "errors by the imprudent and unfortunate application "of mathematics to natural philoſophy, but likewiſe "many others have done the ſame, a catalogue of "whom I ſhall exhibit, if God ſhall continue my "life, in another tract."

Kepler, continues he, was not far from that opinion; for he ſays not only, that the diurnal motion of the earth ariſes from the earth, but alſo that it perceives the appearance of Comets, that it ſweats for fear, and that this is the cauſe of rain. "Audiamus eum loquentem Libro de "Cometis anni poſt milleſimum & ſexcenteſimum ſeptimi, atque item duodevigeſimi: Facultas mundi "ſublunaris cometam PERSENTISCIT ET OBSTUPESCIT, unaque facultates cæteræ omnium rerum ſublunarium. Ac poſtea: Facultas Telluris, inſolenti Cometæ apparitione CONSTERNATA, uno terreſtris ſuperficiei loco multum exſudat vaporum, pro qualitate "illius partis ſui corporis: hinc diuturnæ pluviæ & "eluviones" (9). i. e. "Let us hear him ſpeaking "in his book of the comets of the year 1607 and "1618: The faculty of the ſublunary world perceives "and is terrified at the comet, and together with it the "other faculties of all ſublunary things. And afterwards: The Faculty of the earth being terrified at "the unuſual appearance of the comet, in one part "of the ſurface of the earth ſweats out a great quantity of vapour, according to the quality of that part "of its body; hence proceed great rains and floods". Gaſſendi obſerves, that according to Kepler all the ſtars are animated, and that as all animals move by means of their muſcles, the earth and planets have alſo muſcles proportioned to their bulk, which are the inſtruments, by which they move. He gives the ſun a very noble and active ſoul, and aſſerts that the rays of the ſun put in action the ſoul of the planets. Adnoto duntaxat Keplerum ita ſidera feciſſe animata, ac ut inſtrumenta motus in Animalibus ſunt fibræ digeſtæ per muſculos; ſic cenſuiſſe illum, eſſe & in Terrâ & in Planetis cæteris ingentes fibras aliquas pro ratione molis cujuſque, per quas Anima vim ſuam matricem exerceat. Cenſuit vero etiam, præter ſpeciales Animas & vires, quæ inſunt in cæteris, eſſe in ipſo Sole Animam nobiliſſimam, potentiſſimamque, quæ dum ſolem circa proprium Axem (a centro Mundi propterea non diſcedentem) circumagit, immateriatas ſpecies (ſic enim appellat) irradiando circumfundit, quibus Planetæ velut correpti ipſi Soli circumducantur (10). See what I quote from Leibnitz (11), and obſerve, that it would be very difficult to refute Kepler's ſuppoſition, for we are no more capable of knowing whether the earth be animated, than a louſe is of knowing whether we are animated. A louſe is contented with nouriſhing itſelf with what it ſucks from the ſurface of our bodies: it knows not whether we think; it cannot even diſcover the inward ſprings, which move us. Can we make any more diſcoveries with regard to the queſtion, whether the earth thinks, and has ſenſations, which like ours determine certain inward ſprings to move in a certain manner?

[E] It is ſaid, that he furniſhed excellent hints to Des Cartes.] Here is what Baillet acknowledges; Kepler, ſays he (12), had particularly cultivated aſtronomy and optics; and though he left a great many things to be diſcovered and perfected, it muſt be owned, that the reading of his writings was not uſeleſs to Monſieur Des Cartes. In another place (13) he mentions three things, which ſeem to have been common to Des Cartes with Kepler. "The firſt is the knowledge of the celeſtial vortices, "of which Kepler is ſaid to have had at leaſt a confuſed notion, as well as Jordano Bruno. The ſecond "is the explication of gravity, which Kepler firſt of "all gave by the compariſon of ſmall bits of ſtraw, "which by the motion of water turned round in a "veſſel, gather in the centre. The third is the knowledge of optics, in which Des Cartes owned Kepler for his maſter in 1638. Here is the teſtimony, "which he gave of it to father Merſennus. That "perſon ſays he (*), who charges me with having "borrowed of Kepler the Ellipſis and Hyperbola's of "my dioptrics, muſt be very ignorant or malicious. "For with regard to the Ellipſis, I do not remember "that Kepler ſpeaks of it; or, if he ſpeaks of it, it "is certainly to ſay, that it is not the Anaclaſtic, "which he ſeeks. And as for the Hyperbola, I remember very well, that he pretends to demonſtrate ex- "preſly, that it is not that neither, though he ſays it "is not very different from it. Now I leave you to "think, whether I could have learned that a thing "was true from a man, who endeavours to prove it "to be falſe. Notwithſtanding this I own, that "Kepler was my firſt maſter in optics, and that he "underſtood more of it than all who preceded him." Mr. Leibnitz, whoſe words I have quoted concerning the vortices, touches in another place upon what relates to gravity. He pretends that we owe to Kepler the cauſe of this Phænomenon, and charges Des Cartes with having made uſe of this excellent diſcovery, without aſcribing the invention to the perſon, to whom it was due. Ipſi (Keplero) primum indicium debetur veræ cauſæ gravitatis, & hujus naturæ Legis, a qua gravitas pendet, quod corpora rotata conantur à centro recedere per tangentem, & ideo ſi in aquâ feſtucæ vel paleæ innatent, rotato vaſe, aqua in vorticem acta, feſtucis denſior, atque ideo fortius quam ipſæ, excuſſæ a medio, feſtucas verſus centrum compellit; quemadmodum ipſe di-

Sed his deinde egregiè usus est Cartesius, etsi more suo autorem dissimularit (14) i. e. "To Kepler is owing the first "discovery of the true cause of gravity and of that "law of nature, upon which gravity depends, viz. "that bodies whirled round endeavour to recede from "the centre in a tangent; and therefore if straws "swim in water, in a vessel whirled round, the wa-"ter being forced into a vortex, and more dense than "the straws, and therefore driven from the centre "more strongly than they, forces the straws towards "the centre; as he has expresly taught in more than "two places in his Epitome Astronomiæ, though he "was a little doubtful, and knew not his own ability, "and was not sensible what great things would follow "from this in Natural Philosophy, and especially in "Astronomy. But Des Cartes afterwards made an "excellent use of this, though according to his custom, "he takes no notice of the author". See the Bishop of Avranches (15), who quotes some passages from Kepler, reproaching Des Cartes with having stollen a great many things from that German.

[F] Moreri has committed more faults of omission than commission.] The faults of the first kind will easily appear to those, who shall take the pains to compare his article with this. What would it be, if it were compared with an article, which contains what I have not taken notice of? Here follow his faults of commission. I. The Name of the Emperor, who succeeded Rodolphus, was not Matthew, but Matthias. These two names are very different, and no person ought to have known it better than Moreri, who as a priest read his breviary every day. Are not the feasts of St. Matthew and of St. Matthias different? II. He should not have said, that Kepler died about the year 1620; it should be 1630. an error of ten years is not pardonable, when the question is concerning a great man of our own age. III. He should not have said, that John Kepler is different from Lewis Kepler; but that Lewis Kepler was the son of John Kepler. Moreri might very easily have avoided the first error, since Vossius, whom he copies, writes thus: Primum Rodolphi Imperatoris, exinde MATTHIÆ, tandem & Ferdinandi Cæs. Mathematicus fuit (16). i. e. "He was mathematician at first to the Emperor Ro-"dolphus, then to MATTHIAS, and at last to Ferdi-"nand". I shall take this opportunity to observe, that before Kepler had this title, he had been Professor at Grats in Styria. His engagement with Tycho Brahe was very near being broke off, because the states of Styria did not approve of it. Ex inopinato Literas accepit, quibus Keplerus insinuavit non esse sibi integrum pactis conditionibus stare, quod à Styriæ proceribus, quorum in ære erat, undequaque non probarentur (17). Tycho informed Kepler, that he had procured for him a larger stipend at the Emperor's Court, with the title of mathematician to his Imperial Majesty; and that therefore the loss of the pension given him in Styria ought not to stop him (18). Upon this Kepler left the University of Grats. The Emperor Rodolphus made him his mathematician; but he engaged him to serve Tycho as an arithmetician (19). I find that the Emperor Matthias gave Kepler a fixed settlement at Lints, and appointed him a salary from the states of upper Austria, which was paid for sixteen years. Neque enim sibi satis esse, quod Cæsar etiam ante Imperium decrevisset idoneam fixamque sedem Lintii, ac adjecisset exhibenda à Proceribus Austriæ supra-Anisanæ stipendia, quibus, donec res pacatiores evaderent, sustentaretur, uti & fuit illis reipsa per annos sexdecim sustentatus (20). This is the reason why Vossius speaking of the Stereometria printed in 1617, stiles Kepler Cæsaris Matthiæ & illustrium Ordinam Archiducalis Austriæ supra Onasum Mathematicus (21). i. e. "Mathematician to the Em-"peror Matthias and the illustrious states of Arch-"Ducal Austria above the Onasus". I find also that Walstein settled Kepler at Sagan in Silesia, and that it was there that this astronomer published the continuation of his Ephemerides in 1630 (22). Deinceps autem anno xxx post editas Sagani Silesiorum (ubi Dux Meckelburgi Wulstemius (23) sedem illi tribuerat) Ephemeridas (24) ad Comitia Ratisbonensia.... se contulisset.

KESLER (ANDREW), a Lutheran Divine, was born at Cobourg in Franconia in the year 1595. He did not follow the profession of his father, who was a Taylor (a), but applied himself to study, and distinguished himself by his wit, and the progress which he made; which was undoubtedly the reason why Prince John Casimir Duke of Saxony, who had erected a Schola Illustris at Cobourg, gave him a pension (b). He was enabled by this to maintain himself at the University of Jena, and afterwards in that of Wittemberg. He was admitted in the latter into the Faculty of Philosophy, and shewed by several Theses, which he defended, that he was a good master of Logic, and made excellent use of that Science to confute the Socinians [A]. He was sent for from Wittemberg (c) to accept of an employment (d) in the College of Cobourg, and at the end of an year and an half he became Pastor and Superintendant of Eisfield. He discharged

[A] He was a good master of Logic, and made excellent use of that science to confute the Socinians.] He published a treatise de Principiis Logicis quæ in Photinianorum Librorum Lectione occurrunt, which contains thirteen disputes, which he maintained in the University of Wittenberg: he dedicated it to his patron Prince John Casimir of Saxony. The epistle dedicatory is dated at Wittemberg August 1. 1621. He published a second edition of this work in the same City in 1624 in 4to It is intitled: Logicæ Photinianæ Examen, seu Principiorum Logicorum, quæ in Photinianorum scriptis occurrunt, Consideratio: cui præmissus est Tractatus brevissimus de illegitimo Photinianorum disputandi modo, & legitima ratione pie philosophandi. A new edition, in 8vo, was published at Wittemberg in 1642. Michael Wendelerus, Professor of Philosophy (1), added to it a short preface, in which he ranks among the Socinian writers Smiglecius, who is one of the Jesuits, that have confuted them in the strongest manner. Kesler afterwards attacked the Socinian Metaphysics in a book intitled, Metaphysicæ Photinianæ partis generalis examen, seu Principiorum ad generalem Metaphysicæ partem pertinentium, quæ in Photinianorum scriptis occurrunt, Consideratio. I have seen only the third edition, which is that of Wittemberg 1648 in 8vo; but I conjecture, that the first is in 1623, for the epistle dedicatory is dated from that City March the 10th, 1623. The Metaphysicæ Photinianæ partis specialis Examen, seu Principiorum ad specialem Metaphysicæ partem pertinentium quæ in Photinianorum scriptis occurrunt, Consideratio was published, if I am not mistaken, in 1626; for the author's Epistle dedicatory is dated at Eisfeld January 14th that year. I have seen only the third edition, which is that of Wittemberg 1648 in 8vo. He attacks likewise the Physics of the Socinians; the epistle dedicatory of his Physicæ Photinianæ Examen, seu Principiorum Physicorum quæ in Photinianorum scriptis occurrunt, consideratio, is dated at Eisfeld January 1. 1628. I have seen only the Wittemberg edition of 1656 in 8vo, there is a great deal of method and exactness in these treatises.

charged that employment with ſucceſs, and upon that account Prince John Caſimir would not permit him to accept of the Superintendance of the Churches of the whole country of Eiſenac. He took the degree of Doctor of Divinity, and at laſt ſubmitted to a call to Steinfurt. He was offered the Superintendance of the Church; he excuſed himſelf, but readily accepted it after he had the misfortune to loſe his Library, when the Imperial troops plundered the town of Eisfeld in 1632. Beſides the Superintendance of the Church, he had alſo at Steinfurt the direction of the College, when he was recalled to Cobourg to ſucceed the Superintendant of the Churches. He diſcharged this poſt with applauſe. His Sermons were very famous on account of his eloquence and learning. He was ſeized with an Apoplexy in the pulpit (e), and after having languiſhed ſome months, died May the 5th 1643 (f). Dom.* 1686. Pretended to be tranſlated out of the Latin into French by the Divines of Louvain, London 1690 in 4to. In the preface having obſerved, that the people have a right to read the Holy Scriptures, he tells us, that "the Church of Rome does not abſolutely deny the people this liberty, but reſtrains it; for they have their verſions of the Bible in the ſeveral Popiſh countries in the language of them. But for all that, certain it is, that many of that Church do not only diſparage thoſe holy books, but diſcourage the reading of them. And that Church, inſtead of aſſiſting the devout people in their profitable reading the Holy Scriptures, and furniſhing them with all due means to this purpoſe, hath dealt very inſincerely in the whole matter." He obſerves that it has done this, I. By obtruding the Vulgar Latin as that authentic copy of the Bible, from which, in public diſputes and queſtions, there is no appeal to be allowed, which the Trent Council does. "The verſion of the Vulgar Latin, I grant, ſays Dr. Kidder, is venerable for its antiquity, and is of great uſe in the Church, and is not always to be deſpiſed or declaimed againſt, where at firſt ſight it does not ſeem perfectly agreeable to the original text; both becauſe it ſometimes gives the true ſenſe, where it ſeems in the letter to differ, and alſo becauſe (in the New Teſtament eſpecially) where it differs from the preſent reading, it does not differ from ſome antient copies. But yet after all, it cannot always be defended ... And ... the moſt famed and allowed commentators and interpreters of the Roman Church, do think fit very frequently to forſake the Vulgar; which I ſhall at any time make good againſt that Church, whenever I ſhall be required to do it. II. By commending that for the verſion of the Vulgar Latin, which is not ſo. After the abovenamed decree of the Trent-Council, the minds of men were in ſuſpenſe and doubtful, becauſe they knew not what copy of the Vulgar Latin to follow. And the Pope did not, for above twenty years after, declare what certain copy ſhould be taken for the authentic Vulgar Latin. Afterwards indeed Pope Sixtus V gave notice to the Chriſtian world what his mind was in this matter, Anno Domini MDLXXXIX. He puts out a Latin Bible, in the preface to which he acquaints the reader, "that agreeably to the foreſaid decree of the Council of Trent, he having called upon God, and relying upon St. Peter's authority, for the public good of the Church, had not thought much to ſet forth that Bible. He repreſents his labour in chooſing the beſt readings; his deſign, that according to the decree of the chimneys at his houſe in Wells during the great ſtorm November the 26th 1703. The Biſhop in the Diſſertation prefixed to his Commentary on the Five Books of Moſes, printed at London in 1694, having reflected upon Monſieur Le Clerc, the latter wrote a letter of complaint to him in Latin dated at Amſterdam November the 5th 1694. The Biſhop returned a very civil anſwer in the ſame language, dated at Wells November the 9th 1694. Monſieur Le Clerc wrote another letter to him dated at Amſterdam December the 1ſt 1694. All theſe letters are publiſhed by Monſieur Le Clerc in his Bibliotheque Choiſie (i), who tells us (k), that after he had written his laſt letter, he deſired a friend of his to wait on the Biſhop, in order to know his Lordſhip's mind with regard to Monſieur Le Clerc; whoſe friend wrote to him as follows in a letter dated January the 10th 1695. "I alſo waited upon the Biſhop of Bath and Wells, and having reaſon to ſpeak "to him of his book, which he had done me the honour to give me, I led him on that "occaſion inſenſibly into a diſcourſe of you. Whereupon he told me, that he had "writ to you, and made the ſame profeſſions to me that he had done to you; and ad-"ded, that he would be very ready and glad to do you any ſervice; and all this with "ſuch candour and frankneſs, that I am fully ſatisfied, he is in good earneſt very well "inclined towards you, and will be the readier to do you any kindneſs for what he had "ſaid in print. I delivered to him the acknowledgment you deſired me, for his letter "to you. He told me, he thought he ſhould publiſh his Comment in Latin, and then "in his preface to that he would be careful to give you ſatisfaction. But that yet he "could not alter his opinion, wherein he differed from you. Your Paraphraſe he ſpoke "of in high terms of praiſe and admiration, as excelling any thing the world yet had "of that kind." All this, ſays Monſieur Le Clerc (l), was very well; there was nothing

"the Trent-Council, the Vulgar Bible might be printed moſt correct; and his performance, viz. that "he had accurately purged this edition from various "errors, and with the utmoſt diligence reſtored it in pri-"ſtinam veritatem. i. e. to its antient verity. After this "declares his will, viz. he decrees, that the edition ſhould "be taken from that Vulgar Latin, which the Trent-"Council declared authentic. And this he tells us, "he does ex certâ noſtrâ ſcientiâ, deque Apoſtolicæ po-"teſtatis plenitudine, i. e. from his own certain know-"ledge and plenitude of Apoſtolic authority. And that "it ought to be received as ſuch, ſine ullâ dubitatione "aut controverſia, i. e. without any doubt or contro-"verſy." After this Clement VIII puts out his edition of the Vulgar, and requires expreſly that that be received alſo; and this he does in the year 1592. The differences between that of Sixtus V and Clement VIII are too many to be here related; yet are both theſe to be received by the authority of the Pope and Council, though they contradict each other; and we ſhall ſtill be at the pleaſure of a Pope to give us another authentic copy. III. The Church of Rome hath done very inſincerely in allowing verſions, which pretend to be true verſions of the Vulgar, which they are not. Dr. Kidder more eſpecially conſiders thoſe, which were done in the French. There was a French Bible printed at Antwerp by the permiſſion of Charles V in 1530, and reprinted in 1534, which differs from the preſent Vulgar. But this being done before the Bull of Sixtus V. the Dr. does not inſiſt upon it. After this there was another verſion of the Vulgar Latin into French by the care of certain Louvain Divines, deputed to this purpoſe; an edition of which printed at Lyons is frequently referred to by our author in his Reflections. This was a verſion of great fame and authority in the Church of Rome; and the Teſtament of Bourdeaux pretends to be done by theſe Divines. So it was, that tho' this Louvain French Bible was deſigned to keep the people from reading Proteſtant editions; yet it was complained of by ſeveral of the Church of Rome (as Father Simon relates) as coming too near the ſentiments of the Proteſtants. It appears from Dr. Kidder's reflections, that this verſion does not exactly agree with the preſent Vulgar. Since that there have been many Popiſh verſions in the French tongue, which pretend to be verſions of the Latin into French, of the New Teſtament, in which Dr. Kidder is principally concerned in this piece. The firſt is that of Amelote, who was choſen by the French Clergy to that employment in 1655. He hath printed his verſion both with and without notes; the firſt in 1666; that without notes in 1686. This was printed with the atteſtation and approbation of ſeveral Prelates of France, with the permiſſion of the Archbiſhop of Paris, and General of his Order. Father Simon in his Critical Hiſtory of the New Teſtament ſays, that he was the firſt Catholic writer, who applied himſelf with care to turn the New Teſtament into French. I will not deny him, ſays Dr. Kidder, to be a perſon of diligence and good fame; but yet neither is this a ſtrict verſion of the Vulgar. The ſecond is the verſion printed at Mons. This, ſays the Doctor, is common among us, and hath been often printed, and is of great fame, and upon many accounts a very valuable book. But neither is this a ſtrict verſion of the Vulgar. The third is the New Teſtament printed at Bourdeaux, againſt which Dr. Kidder's Reflections are levelled. It bears the title of Le Nouveau Teſtament de nôtre Seigneur Jeſus Chriſt traduit de Latin en François par les Theologiens de Louvain. i. e. "The New Teſtament of our "Lord Jeſus Chriſt tranſlated out of the Latin into "French by the Divines of Louvain." It was printed at Bourdeaux in 1686, and hath the approbation of two Doctors, viz. Lopez and Germain, as very profitable to thoſe, who ſhall be permitted and have capacity to read it. It hath alſo the permiſſion of the Archbiſhop of Bourdeaux, and it is in that permiſſion affirmed to be reviewed and exactly corrected. "I ſhall "make it appear, ſays Dr. Kidder, that this is no "true verſion of the Vulgar Latin; that it is not the "work of the Louvain Divines, as is pretended to be; "that it agrees neither with the Vulgar, nor the ce-"lebrated verſions of it, which are allowed in the "Roman Church; that it hath a conſiderable number "of downright forgeries and falſifications, a great "number of groſs errors and miſtakes; that it adds "to the Vulgar, and takes from it; that it is incon-"ſiſtent with itſelf, and by no means corrected as to "typographical Errata; in a word, it hath not "the authority of antient copies or various readings to "ſupport it. I dare challenge all mankind to defend "it. Thoſe of the Church of Rome have inveighed "againſt the Proteſtant verſions. They have pretended "that we have no Bible. They have ſcoffed and "derided us on this account. They have boaſted, "that they have been the faithful preſervers of theſe "divine oracles, and that what we have of them, "we may thank them for. But lo here a proof of their "inſincerity; here is that, which may convince any "honeſt man even of their own communion, that is "willing to know the truth in this important matter ... "I did intend in the laſt reign to have made, and to "have publiſhed theſe Reflections; but I could by no "means procure this Teſtament either here or beyond "the ſeas." KILIANUS (CORNELIUS), a native of Brabant, diſtinguiſhed himſelf as an excellent Corrector of the Preſs, at the Printing-Houſe of Plantin, for fifty years. He was not content with correcting exactly the proof-ſheets of other men's writings, but wrote likewiſe ſeveral books, which were eſteemed [A]. He had no ill ſucceſs in writing Latin verſe: his Apology for Correctors againſt Authors [B] is a proof of this. He died very old on Eaſter-day 1607. Moſt of the particulars, which I have juſt mentioned, are proved in the remark, where I inſert his epitaph [C].

[B] His apology for correctors againſt authors.] It is an epigram of eighteen verſes, which we find in the Theatrum Vitæ Humanæ of Beyerlinch (3). Mr. Chevillier has inſerted it in his Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris (4), after having mentioned a thing, which deſerves to be related. "We do not however charge the "printers or correctors with all the errrors in printed "books. They have their excuſe upon the authors. "They remain ſometimes in an edition through the "ignorance or negligence of him who wrote the "book, or took upon him the care of publiſhing it. "He gives an incorrect copy, which is printed faithfully, and conſequently with the errors of the manuſcript. But it happens, that learned men, who "judge without flattery, cenſuring what deſerves it, "he, who is innocent, is accuſed, though the whole "fault is the author's. An excellent corrector belonging "to Plantin's printing-houſe, named Cornelius Kilian, "has written an Apology for correctors againſt authors, "who after they have miſtaken through ignorance, "and given incorrect copies, do not ſcruple to lay "the blame on innocent perſons."

We ought not always to impute the faults in books to the Printers.

He was born at Wornall about the year 1559 (b), and educated in Grammar Learning at Weſtminſter School, and became a Student of Chriſt Church in Oxford in 1576 (c), where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts January the 26th 1579 (d)), and February the 15th 1582 that of Maſter (e). He was afterwards appointed Chaplain to Queen Elizabeth (f). Auguſt the 12th 1590 he was inſtalled Archdeacon of Nottingham; at which time he was a Preacher at York (h). He afterwards became Chaplain to the Lord Keeper Egerton (i). December the 17th 1601 he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity (k). In 1605 he was made Dean of Chriſt Church, and was afterwards for ſeveral years Vice-Chancellor of Oxford. In 1611 he was advanced to the Biſhopric of London, to which he was conſecrated September the 8th the ſame year (l). Beſides his Lectures upon Jonah delivered at York, and printed at London 1594, and Oxford 1599 in 4to, he publiſhed ſeveral Sermons [A]. King James I uſed to ſtyle him the King of Preachers; and Lord Chief Juſtice Coke often declared, that he was the beſt Speaker in the Star-Chamber in his time (m). He was ſo conſtant in preaching, after he was a Biſhop, that unleſs he was hindered by want of health, he omitted no Sunday, whereon he did not viſit ſome pulpit in London or near it (n). Dr. William Hull (o) highly extols his eloquence in the pulpit. He died March the 30th (p) 1621, aged ſixty two years, having been before much afflicted with the ſtone in the kidneys and bladder; and was interred in the Cathedral of St. Paul's in London. Soon after his death, the Papiſts reported, that he died a member of their Church; and Gregory Fiſher alias Muſket publiſhed in 1621 a book, intitled, The Biſhop of London his Legacy: Or, certain Motives of Dr. King late Biſhop of London for his change of Religion, and dying in the Catholic and Roman Church; with a concluſion to his brethren the Biſhops of England. But the falſity of this ſtory was ſufficiently expoſed by ☞KING (HENRY), Biſhop of Chicheſter in the ſeventeenth Century, was eldeſt ſon of Dr. John King, Biſhop of London, by Jane, daughter of Mr. Henry Freeman of Staffordſhire, and was born at Wornall in Buckinghamſhire in January 1591 (a), and educated in Grammar-Learning partly in the Free-School at Thame in Oxfordſhire, and partly at Weſtminſter-School, from which he was elected a Student of Chriſt Church in 1608 (b). June the 19th 1611 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c); and July the 7th 1614 that of Maſter (d). He then entered into holy Orders, and became an eminent Preacher, and Chaplain to King James I. He was afterwards made Archdeacon of Colcheſter (e); Reſidentiary of St. Paul's (f), and Canon of Chriſt Church (g). May the 19th 1625 he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity (h). He was afterwards Chaplain to King Charles I. and February the 6th 1638 was inſtalled in the Deanery of Rocheſter (i). In 1641 he was advanced to the See of Chicheſter, to which he was conſecrated December the 19th that year (k). But though he was always eſteemed puritannically affected, and had been promoted to that See, in order to pleaſe that party; yet upon the breaking out of the civil wars, and the diſſolution of Epiſcopacy, he was treated by them with great ſeverity; "nor was he ſuffered to "live quietly at his friend's houſe (for ſome time, at leaſt) when they could diſcover "him (l)." He lived for the moſt part with Sir Richard Hobart, who had married his ſiſter, at Langley in Buckinghamſhire, by whom he was ſupported (m). At the Reſtoration he recovered his Biſhopric. He publiſhed ſeveral works [A]. Wood tells us (n), that "he was eſteemed by many perſons of his neighbourhood and dioceſe, the epitome "of all honours, virtues, and generous nobleneſs, and a perſon never to be forgotten by "his tenants and by the poor." He died October the 1ſt 1669, and was interred on the ſouth-ſide of the Choir belonging to his Cathedral of Chicheſter, where a monument was erected to him, with an inſcription, in which it is ſaid, that he was antiquâ, eâque regiâ Saxonum apud Danmonios in Agro Devonienſi proſapiâ oriundus, and that he was natalium ſplendore illuſtris, pietate, doctrinâ & virtutibus illuſtrior, &c. He married Anne, daughter of Sir William Ruſſel of Strenſham in Worceſterſhire Bart. who, after the Biſhop's deceaſe married Sir Thomas Millington the Phyſician.

The truth is, one Sunday "at Church hearing a pſalm ſung, whoſe wretched "expreſſion quite marred the pen-man's matter and "my devotion, I did, at my return that evening, try "whether from the verſion of our Bible, I could not "eaſily, and with plainneſs ſuiting the loweſt under-"ſtanding, deliver it from that garb, which indeed "made it ridiculous. From one to another I paſſed on "till the whole book was run through. Which done, "I could not reſiſt the advice and importunity of better "judgments than mine own to put it to the preſs, I "was, I confeſs, diſcouraged, knowing that Mr. George "Sandys, and lately one of our pretended reformers, "had failed in two different extremes: the firſt too e-"legant for the vulgar uſe, changing both the Metre "and the tunes, wherewith they had been long ac-"quainted: the other as flat and poor, as lamely "worded, and unhandſomly rhimed, as the old, which "with much confidence he undertook to amend. My "Lord, I now come forth an adventurer in a middle "way, whoſe aim was without affectation of words "to leave them not disfigured in the ſenſe." IV. A deep groan fetched at the funeral of the incomparable and glorious Monarch King Charles I. printed in 1649 in one ſheet, and ſaid in the title to be written by *D. H. When theſe poems were firſt publiſhed, it was reported, that Dr. Philip King, brother to our Biſhop, was author of them. VI. Divers Latin and Greek Poems, publiſhed in ſeveral books. VII. He compoſed ſeveral anthems, one of which for the time of Lent, beginning thus; Hearken O God, &c. was ſet to Muſick by Dr. John Wilſon, Gentleman of his Majeſty's Chapel. VIII. There is a letter of his to Mr. Iſaac Walton concerning the three imperfect books of Hooker's Eccleſiaſtical Polity, dated at Chicheſter November 17th 1664, and prefixed to Walton's Life of Hooker. H.

☞KING (WILLIAM) a facetious Engliſh writer in the beginning of the eighteenth Century, was well deſcended, being allied to the noble families of Clarendon and Rocheſter, and was ſon of Ezekiel King of London, Gentleman, and elected Student of Chriſt Church in Oxford from Weſtminſter-School in Michaelmas-Term 1681, aged eighteen years (a). December the 8th 1685 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and July the 6th 1688 that of Maſter. He afterwards entered upon the Law Line, and took the degree of Doctor of Civil Law. In January 1694 he became Secretary to the Princeſs Anne, afterwards Queen Anne (b). He ſoon acquired a conſiderable reputation as a Civilian, and was in great practice; but the natural gaiety of his temper, and the love of company, led him too much into thoſe pleaſures, which were incompatible with his profeſſion. He attended the Earl of Pembroke, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, into that Kingdom, where he was appointed Judge-Advocate, ſole Commiſſioner of the Prizes, and Keeper of the Records, and Vicar-General to the Lord Primate of Ireland; and was countenanced by perſons of the higheſt rank, and might have made his fortune, if the change of climate could have made any alteration in his diſpoſition. But ſo far was he from heaping up riches, that he returned to England with no other treaſure than a few merry Poems and humorous Eſſays, and retired to his Student's place at Chriſt Church (c). In January 1711 he was appointed Gazetteer; which place he quitted about Midſummer 1712, and retired to a Gentleman's houſe on Lambeth-ſide of the water (d). He died at his lodgings over againſt Somerſet-Houſe in the Strand on Chriſtmas Day 1712, and was interred in the Cloiſters of Weſtminſter Abbey (e). His writings are pretty numerous [A]. He naturally hated buſineſs, eſpecially that of an Advocate; but made an excellent Judge, when appointed one of the Court of Delegates. His chiefeſt pleaſure conſiſted in trifles; and he was never happier, than when he thought he

Printed in 1688 in 8vo. Mr. Edward Hannes, afterwards an eminent Phyſician, had an hand in this book; to which is prefixed the following advertiſement: "It having been publickly deſired, that "thoſe, in whoſe way it ſhould lie to expoſe Mr. Va- "rillas, would put themſelves to the trouble, the au- "thor of theſe papers was willing to contribute his "ſhare in the part concerning Wicliff, having former- "ly laid together ſome obſervations conducing to ſuch "a deſign. Mr. Larroque indeed has gone before him "in the attempt; but that ingenious Gentleman was "not well adviſed to meddle in a ſtrange country, till "time had inſtructed him more fully in the conſtituti- "ons and Language of it. Our preſent reflecter has "made uſe of the Amſterdam edition, not being able to "procure that of Paris. He has given Mr. Varillas "all the law imaginable; he has made no advantage "of miſtakes, which with any reaſon could be charg- "ed upon the printer. He has contradicted nothing "without expreſs Proof on his ſide; and in things high- "ly improbable, which ſeem to have no foundation in "hiſtory, unleſs he can confront him with poſitive and "authentic teſtimonies, he lets the author alone, and "ſuffers the boldneſs of the aſſertion to be its own ſe- "curity. Laſt of all, he intreats the reader's pardon, "if the language and expreſſion are without choice and "ornament, his profeſt buſineſs and neceſſary occaſions "not allowing him any ſuch leiſure." In the beginning of the Reflections it is obſerved, that the enemies of the reformation, as they ſeem reſolved never to leave off writing controverſy, and being confuted by our divines; ſo they are not wanting upon occaſion to turn their ſtyle, and furniſh out matter of triumph to our hiſtorians. Sanders and Cauſſin heretofore, and of late Monſieur Maimburg and Monſieur Varillas have thought themſelves qualified for this kind of employment. Above the reſt, Mr. Varillas has uſed his pen with ſuch a partial extravagance, and with ſo little regard to modeſty and truth, that he has not only provoked the learned of the reformed profeſſion to chaſtiſe his impudence in their publick writings, but has alſo drawn upon him the ſcorn and indignation of ſeveral Gentlemen of his own communion, who in a ſenſe of honour and common ingenuity have taken ſome pains to lay open the ſmooth impoſtor. Mr. Hozier, genealogiſt to the King of France, in his epiſtle, declares himſelf to have diſcovered in him above 4000 errors. Pere Bouhours in a diſcourſe of his makes it his buſineſs to expoſe him. Even his old friend Mr. Dr. (1) ſeems to have forſaken him, and gone over to his Bouhours, from whoſe original he is now tranſlating the life of St. Xavier. To be free, there is almoſt as many faults in every ſingle page of Mr. Varillas, as in a Printer's table of Errata; and if the Archbiſhop of Paris would do his duty, he would find himſelf bound to put a holy cenſure upon his Penſioner; and as he was lately very forward to compel thoſe of the Religion to a recantation of their faith; ſo he ought here to oblige Mr. Varillas to an abjuration of his hiſtory. The Reflections conclude with theſe words: "He [Mr. Va- rillas] "has writ away all his credit; his laſt defence "of himſelf has proved him inexcuſable, and made "men apt to think, that as in England at preſent, ſo "in France too, the ſame perſon that is Hiſtoriogra- "pher, is alſo Laureat. Hence it might be that Mon- "ſieur Varillas in his Revolutions takes all the liberties "of a poet; and Mr. Dr. in his conference between "the Hind and Panther, though in verſe, has aimed "at all the plainneſs and gravity of an hiſtorian. For "hiſtory indeed is a ſerious matter, not to be written "careleſly, like a letter to a friend; nor with paſſion, "like a billet to a Miſtreſs; nor with biaſs, like a "declamation for a party at the bar, or the remon- "ſtrance of a miniſter for his Prince; nor in fine by "a man unacquainted with the world, like ſoliloquies "and meditations. It requires a long experience, "ſound judgment, a cloſe attention, an unqueſtionable "integrity, and a ſtyle without affectation; all which "glorious accompliſhments, as they are wanting in the "author of The revolutions in matters of religion, ſo "there is no hiſtorian that I know of, in whom they "have ſhewed themſelves to ſo high and admirable a "degree, as in a phyſician (2) of our age, who has "obliged the world with a hiſtory of diſeaſes, and "whoſe name is too great to mention in a pamphlet "of this character." II. Animadverſions on a pretended Account of Denmark. London 1694 in 8°. Mr. Molesworth, afterwards Lord Molesworth, was the author of that account. The writing of the animadverſions upon it procured Dr. King the place of ſecretary to Princeſs Anne of Denmak. He was furniſhed with memoirs for writing them by Mr. Brink, then miniſter of the Daniſh Church in London, and Monſieur Scheel, then envoy extraordinary in England from the King of Denmark. He tells us himſelf (3), that theſe Animadverſions had the honour not to be unacceptable to his Royal Highneſs Prince George of Denmark; and when ſent to Denmark, were by the King's order turned into French, and read to him as faſt as they could be tranſlated. They had two editions, one in Holland, and the other in Germany. The Univerſity of Copenhagen wrote him a letter under their ſeal. As to the matters of fact, ſays he, laid down in thoſe papers, I am no farther accountable: but I believe none of them can be contradicted. III. he was hid from the world. Yet he loved company, provided they were ſuch as tallied with his humour, for few people pleaſed him in converſation, and it was a true ſign that he liked them, if he could be tolerably agreeable; though he was a great diſſembler of his natural temper, which was ſullen, moroſe, and peeviſh, where he durſt ſhew it, for he was of a timorous diſpoſition, and the leaſt ſlight or neglect would throw him into a melancholy ſtate of deſpondency. He would ſay a great many ill-natured things, but never do one. He was made up of tenderneſs and pity; and tears would fall from him upon the ſmalleſt occaſion. As his education had been very ſtrict, ſo he was naturally of a religious diſpoſition, and would never enter upon any buſineſs of the day, till he had performed his devotions, and read ſeveral portions of Scripture out of the Pſalms, the Prophets, and the New Teſtament, on which he would often make his remarks, taking a freſh piece of paper every morning in his hand, on which he always begun with σὺν θεῷ, by God's Leave; and this paper he kept at hand all day, to write down whatever occurred to his mind, or pleaſed his fancy. It appears from his looſe papers, which he terms Adverſaria, that he had read over a prodigious number of books before he was eight years ſtanding in the Univerſity (f).

☞ KING (WILLIAM) (a), Archbiſhop of Dublin in Ireland in the eighteenth Century, was deſcended from an antient and good family of the Houſe of Burras in the North of Scotland, whence his father removed in the reign of King Charles I, and ſettled in the county of Antrim in the North of Ireland. Our Author was born at Antrim May the 1ſt 1650. In 1662 he was ſent to the Latin ſchool of Dungannon in the county of Tyrone; and April the 18th 1667 removed to Trinity College near Dublin, and the year following was advanced to a Scholarſhip and Native's Place there. In 1670 he commenced Bachelor of Arts, and in 1673 was ordained Deacon by Dr. Moſſom Biſhop of Derry, and the ſame year took the degree of Maſter of Arts. April 26, 1674 he was admitted into Prieſt's Orders by Dr. Parker, Archbiſhop of Tuam, to whom being appointed Chaplain in 1676, he was collated the ſame year by his Grace to a Prebend, and afterwards to the Provoſtſhip or Precentorſhip of Tuam. In 1679, he was promoted by his Patron, then Archbiſhop of Dublin, to the Chancellorſhip of St. Patrick, and the Pariſh of St. Warburgh's in Dublin, being inſtalled October the 29th the ſame year. In 1687 Peter Manby, Dean of London-Derry, having publiſhed at Dublin in 4to a pamphlet, intitled, The Conſiderations, which obliged Peter Manby, Dean of London-Derry, to embrace the Catholic Religion; humbly dedicated to his Grace the Lord Primate of Ireland, our author immediately wrote, An Anſwer to the Conſiderations, which obliged Peter Manby, late Dean of London-Derry (as he pretends) to embrace what he calls the Catholic Religion. Dublin 1687 in 4to. Mr. Manby, encouraged by the Court, and aſſiſted by the moſt learned champions of the Church of Rome, publiſhed a reply under this title, A Reformed Catechiſm, in two Dialogues concerning the Engliſh Reformation, collected for the moſt part word for word out of Dr. Burnet, John Fox, and other Proteſtant Hiſtorians, for the information of the People, in reply to Mr. William King's Anſwer to D. Manby's Conſiderations, &c. By Peter Manby, Dean of London-Derry. Dublin 1687 in 4to. Our author ſoon rejoined in A Vindication of the Anſwer to the Conſiderations &c. being an Anſwer to the firſt Dialogue already printed of his Reformed Catechiſm. Dublin 1688 in 4to. Mr. Manby dropt the Controverſy, but diſperſed a ſheet of paper artfully writ, with this title, A Letter to a Friend, ſhewing the vanity of this opinion, that every man's ſenſe and reaſon are to guide him in matters of Faith. March the 30th 1688: in 4to. Our author ſoon publiſhed his anſwer, intitled, A Vindication of the Chriſtian Religion and Reformation againſt the Attempts of a late Letter pretending to ſhew, that all Religions have a like plea, and that there can be no ſuch ſins as Hereſy and Schiſm, if every man's ſenſe and reaſon are to guide him in matters of Faith. 1688 in 4to. The ſame year Mr. King was conſtituted Preſident of the Chapter, upon the death of Dr. Worth, the late Dean of St. Patrick's; and January 26, he was elected Dean of that Cathedral by the Chapter. In 1689 he was twice confined in the Tower by the order of King James II; and the ſame year commenced Doctor of Divinity. In 169$\frac{0}{1}$, he was advanced to the Biſhopric of Derry by Letters Patents dated January the 8th 169$\frac{0}{1}$, and conſecrated at Chriſt-Church in Dublin the 25th of the ſame month by Francis Archbiſhop of Dublin, aſſiſted by Anthony Biſhop of Meath, William Biſhop of Kildare, John Biſhop of Killaloe, and Narciſſus Biſhop of Fern and Leighlin. In 1691 he publiſhed at London in 4to, The State of the Proteſtants of Ireland under the late King James's Government: in which their carriage towards him is juſtified, and the abſolute neceſſity of their endeavouring to be freed from his government, and of ſubmitting to their preſent Majeſties, is demonſtrated [A]. Biſhop Burnet (b) ſpeaks of this book in theſe words: "This copious Hiſtory is ſo well "received, and ſo univerſally acknowledged to be as truly as it is finely written, that "I refer my reader to the account of thoſe matters, which is fully and faithfully given "by that learned and zealous Prelate." Our author had by him at the time of his death atteſted vouchers of every particular fact alledged in this book, which are now in the hands

[A] The State of Proteſtants in Ireland &c.] The whole title of the third edition, printed at London 1692 in 8vo is as follows. The State of the Proteſtants of Ireland under the late King James's Government: In which their Carriage towards him is juſtified, and the abſolute Neceſſity of their endeavouring to be freed from his Government, and of ſubmitting to their preſent Majeſties, is demonſtrated. The third Edition with Additions. In the Introduction, the author gives us an explication of the Doctrine of Paſſive Obedience, and ſtates the true notion and latitude of it. He obſerves, that a King, who deſigns to deſtroy a people, abdicates the government of them. That the aſſertors of Paſſive Obedience own this; but alledge, that the caſe is not to be put. That the arguments of Paſſive Obedience from reaſon and Scripture reach only caſes, where the miſchief is particular or tolerable. "If we look back, "ſays he (1), into Hiſtory, we ſhall find the beſt, the "happieſt, moſt proſperous people moſt jealous of their "liberty; and while they continued firm in their reſo- "lution of maintaining it againſt the encroachment "of their Governors, even with the hazard of their "lives, they have continued great and happy. But "no ſooner did they degenerate from their zeal, but "they became contemptible and dwindled into no- "thing. And at this day let us look into the whole "world, and we ſhall find every nation happy and "thriving at home, and eaſy to their neighbours a- "broad, according as they have preſerved themſelves "from ſlavery; whereas all countries under unlimited "monarchies decay in their ſtrength and improve- "ments; and though they may flouriſh for a little "time by the ruin of their leſſer neighbours; yet they "at laſt unpeople their own countries, and ſeem to be "permitted by God to come to that exorbitant power "for their own ruin, and for a plague to mankind. "And indeed the greateſt miſchief of a civil war is "the danger of ſubjecting the ſtate to the abſolute "power of ſome potent General; as it happened in "Rome, Florence, and in England in the late civil "war. For to loſe even half the ſubjects in a war is "more tolerable than the loſs of liberty; ſince if li- "berty and good laws be preſerved, an age or two "will repair the loſs of ſubjects and improvements, "be they ever ſo great. But if liberty be loſt, it is "never to be retrieved, but brings certain and infalli- "ble deſtruction, as it did to Rome, and has brought "in a great meaſure to Florence, and will to England, "if ever the Prerogative do ſwallow up the liberties "and privileges of the ſubjects. So far is it from "truth, that the allowing of reſiſtance in ſome caſes "of extremity, has greater inconveniencies than ab- "ſolute ſubjection." In the firſt chapter he endeavours to ſhew, that it is lawful for one Prince to interpoſe between another Prince and his ſubjects, when he uſes them cruelly. In the ſecond, that King James II deſigned the deſtruction of his ſubjects. In the third chapter he treats of the King's actual progreſs in their deſtruction. In the fourth chapter he aſſerts, that there remained no proſpect of deliverance for the Proteſtants in Ireland but from King William. In the fifth chapter he gives an account of thoſe Proteſtants, who left the Kingdom, and of thoſe who ſtaid and ſubmitted to King James. He concludes (2) with a ſolemn proteſtation, "that no private diſſatisfac- "tion, that no ill-will to King James's perſon, nor "prejudice againſt any body, has moved me, ſays he, "to ſay what I have ſaid; but that I might vindi- "cate ourſelves by ſpeaking truth in a matter that "ſo nearly concerned us both in our temporal and "eternal intereſt. And I muſt likewiſe proteſt before "God, who will judge between us and our enemies "in this point, that I have not aggravated the calami- "ties we have ſuffered, nor miſrepreſented the proceed- "ings againſt us out of favour or affection to a party; "but have rather told things nakedly and in general, "than inſiſted on ſuch particulars, as might ſeem to "ſerve no other purpoſe but to make our adverſaries "odious."

hands of his relations. However it was ſoon after attacked by Mr. Charles Leſley in his Anſwer to a book, intitled, The State of the Proteſtants &c. printed at London 1692 in 4to [B]. In 1691 the Biſhop publiſhed at Dublin in 4to, A Sermon preached at St. Patrick's Dublin, 16 Nov. 1690, being a Thanksgiving Day for the Preſervation of his Majeſty's Perſon &c. on Pſalm cvii. 2, 3. and in 1692 A Thankſgiving Sermon for King William's ſucceſs in reducing Ireland &c. Dublin in 4to. In 1693 he was appointed a Regal Viſitor with two other Commiſſioners, Anthony Biſhop of Meath, and Capel Biſhop of Dromore; and they ſuſpended the Biſhop of Down. In 1694 his Lordſhip being ſettled in his Dioceſe of Derry, and conſidering the great number of Diſſenting Proteſtants in that Dioceſe lately increaſed by a vaſt addition of Colonies from Scotland, in order to perſuade them to conformity to the eſtabliſhed Church, publiſhed A Diſcourſe concerning the Inventions of Men in the worſhip of God. Dublin 1694 in 4to. Mr. Joſeph Boyſe, a Diſſenting Miniſter, wrote an Anſwer, intitled, Remarks on a late Diſcourſe of William, Lord Biſhop of Derry, concerning the Inventions of Men in the worſhip of God. Dublin 1694 in 4to. In this piece Mr. Boyſe owns, that the Biſhop's Diſcourſe "is "written with an air of ſeriouſneſs and gravity becoming the weight of the ſubject, as "well as the dignity of his character." The Biſhop anſwered Mr. Boyſe in An Admonition to the diſſenting inhabitants of the Dioceſe of Derry concerning a book lately publiſhed by Mr. J. B. intituled Remarks &c. from William Lord Biſhop of that Dioceſe. Dublin 1694 in 4to. Mr. Boyſe replied in A Vindication of the Remarks &c. Dublin 1695 in 4to. [B] Attacked by Mr. Leſley in his Anſwer to a Book intituled, The State of the Proteſtants &c.] In the preface Mr. Leſly very elaborately vindicates the character of the French King Lewis XIV, and tells us, with regard to his "baniſhing the Huguenot Miniſters, and dragooning others, to work them in- "to another religion; which does, and juſtly, eclipſe "his glory, with thoſe, who know not the true "grounds and motives, which induced him to me- "thods ſo rigid and ſevere;" that his very enemies, who know the reaſons he had for it, do even in this excuſe him, and turn it into an argument of his wiſe foreſight and prudence. They tell you, that he was under an invincible neceſſity of being rid of theſe men, or hazarding ſuch a revolution as befel King James. He obſerves likewiſe, that "the Jacobites think themſelves "for ever obliged to acknowledge with all gratefulneſs "the noble and generous reception he has given King "James in his diſtreſs; which as no King in Europe "was able to have done but himſelf, ſo none but "he could have done it in ſuch a manner, with that "greatneſs and every punctilio of honour." Mr. (3) Pag. 1. Leſley in the beginning of his Anſwer tells us (3), that Dr. King's book "is calculated for the deſtruction of "mankind, by ſetting up ſuch principles as counte- "nance eternal rebellions, and afford pretences for "war and confuſion to the end of the world; and "makes ſettlement and peace impracticable among "men." He firſt examines the Principles of Dr. King's book, and then the Matters of Fact. With regard to (4) Pag. 73. the latter, "I cannot, ſays he, ſay that I have exa- "mined into every ſingle matter of fact which this "author relates; I could not have the opportunity; "but I am ſure I have the moſt material; and by "theſe you will eaſily judge of his ſincerity in the "reſt, which could not all come to my knowledge. Inſomuch, that though many things "he ſays were true, yet he has hardly ſpoke a true "word, that is, told it truly and nakedly, without a (5) Pag. 105. "warp." He afterwards remarks (5), that he had been told, that Dr. King "owes his life to the King's "mercy. Was he not accuſed for holding correſpondence, and giving intelligence to the rebels (as "they were then called) both in England and the "North of Ireland, And was it not true? Did he "not give frequent intelligence to Schomberg by one "Sherman, and keep conſtant correſpondence with "Mr. Tollet and others in London? He knows this "would have been called treaſon in thoſe days, and a "bloody-minded tyrant would have found another re- "medy for it than a ſhort impriſonment." He ob- (6) Pag. 106. ſerves likewiſe (6), that he had been "told by Proteſtants "in Dublin, that King James had once ſo good an "opinion of this author [Dr. King], that he had him "frequently in private, and truſted him in his affairs, "till at laſt he found him out. And his old friend "Lord Chief Juſtice Herbert was ſo far miſtaken in him, "that he vouched for him at the council-table with ſo "much zeal as to ſay, that he was as loyal a man "as any that ſat at that board; which did retrieve "this author from ſome inconveniences, that then lay "upon him, and continued him ſome time longer in "the King's good opinion." He affirms alſo (7), that (7) Pag. 113. no man was or could be a higher aſſertor of Paſſive Obedience than Dr. King had been all his life, even at the beginning of the Revolution; "and that he told a "perſon of honour, from whoſe mouth I have it, (8) "ſays Mr. Leſley, that if the Prince of Orange came 17. "over for the crown, or ſhould accept of it, he "prayed God might blaſt all his deſigns. That there "was no way to preſerve the honour of our religion, "but by adhering unalterably to our loyalty. That it "would be a glorious ſight to ſee a cart full of Clergy- "men going to the ſtake for Paſſive Obedience, as the "Primitive Chriſtians did. That it would prove the "ſupport and glory of our religion; but that a rebel- "lion would ruin and diſgrace it. He ſaid, if it "were no more than that declaration, which he had "ſubſcribed, of its not being lawful upon any pretence "whatſoever to take arms againſt the King, &c. he "would die a hundred deaths rather than do it." Mr. Leſley then tells us, that at a meeting of the Clergy of Dublin, in the beginning of the Revolution in 1688, to conſider what meaſures they were to take, Dr. King declared, that their taking arms in the North of Ireland at that time, was rank rebellion, if there could be any rebellion; particularly Derry ſhutting their gates againſt the King's forces ſent thither. And when one there preſent affirmed, that the ſubjects might take arms in defence of their laws, &c. the Doctor violently oppoſed it, even in relation to Derry, and urged, that the Biſhop of Derry, Hopkins, who was then there, did proteſt againſt their ſhutting out the King's forces, and refuſed to join with thoſe who did it; for which and other reaſons, which Dr. King then gave, he was againſt any perſon's going to the North, or joining with them, as being joining in a rebellion.

" eſteem the inſenſible particles of the moderns as unſatisfactory as the occult qualities of the antients; ſo in the more important affairs of religion, to propoſe things above reaſon, as objects of faith, is as ridiculous, as to bid me believe what I know nothing of. Far therefore from crying up faith in oppoſition to reaſon, it is my opinion, with Mr. Locke, that reaſon muſt be our laſt judge and guide in every thing. It is this aſſures me of the neceſſity of religion, and the excellency of Chriſtianity. By this I interpret the Bible, and underſtand my duty. Without it I ſhould be a beaſt, not knowing to defend the doctrines of faith, or convict the pretences of irreligion. Moved by theſe conſiderations, and determined by your good judgment, I publiſh this tranſlation, for the ſake of thoſe, that do not underſtand the original. The ſubject is of much moment, not only for the ſatisfaction of the mind, but alſo for the conduct of life. It has been ſtrongly perplext and darkned by dull and deſigning men. A clear notion of it will be very ſerviceable to ſolve many difficulties in divinity." Mr. Edmund Law M. A. Fellow of Chriſt's College in Cambridge, afterwards publiſhed a complete tranſlation of this work with very valuable notes, in 4to, the ſecond edition of which was printed under this title, An eſſay on the origin of evil by Dr. William King, late Lord Archbiſhop of Dublin. Tranſlated from the Latin with notes; and a diſſertation concerning the Principle and Criterion of virtue and the Origin of the Paſſions. The ſecond edition corrected and enlarged from the Author's Manuſcripts. To which are added two Sermons by the ſame Author, the former concerning Divine Præſcience; the latter on the fall of man, never before publiſhed. By Edmund Law, M. A. Fellow of Chriſt's College in Cambridge. London 1732 in two Volumes in 8vo. Mr. Law obſerves (8), that ſince the publication of the former edition of his tranſlation, he had received from our author's relations a large collection of his papers on the ſame ſubject with this book in Latin and Engliſh; which Mr. Law has inſerted by way of notes in his tranſlation. And he tells us, that the great value, which the Archbiſhop ſet upon this work, appears from the pains he has taken to vindicate it from every the leaſt Cavil; in which view all that he has written, would make a much larger volume than his firſt. The general view of his ſcheme is as follows. 1. All creatures are neceſſarily imperfect, and at infinite diſtance from the perfection of the Deity; and if a negative principle were to be admitted, ſuch as the Privation of the Peripateticks, it might be ſaid, that every created being conſiſts of Exiſtence and Non-Exiſtence; for it is nothing in reſpect both of thoſe perfections, which it wants, and of thoſe which others have. And this defect, or, as we may ſay, Mixture of Non-Entity in the conſtitution of created beings, is the neceſſary principle of all natural evils, and of a poſſibility of moral ones; as will appear in the ſequel. 2. An equality of perfection in the creatures is impoſſible, as our adverſaries allow; to which we may add, neither would it be ſo convenient to place all in the ſame ſtate of perfection. 3. It is agreeable to Divine wiſdom and goodneſs to have created, not only the more perfect beings, but alſo the moſt imperfect, ſuch as matter; ſo long as they are better than nothing, and no impediment to the perfect ones. 4. Admitting matter and motion, there neceſſarily follow compoſition and diſſolution of bodies, that is, generation and corruption; which ſome may look upon as defects in the Divine work; and yet it is no objection to his goodneſs or wiſdom, to create ſuch things as are neceſſarily attended with thoſe evils. Allowing therefore God to be infinitely powerful, good, and wiſe, yet it is manifeſt, that ſome evils, viz. generation and corruption, and the neceſſary conſequences of theſe, might have place in his works; and if even one evil could ariſe without the ill principle, why not many? And if we knew the nature and circumſtances of all things as well as we do thoſe of matter and motion, it may be preſumed, that we could account for them, without any imputation of the divine attributes. For there is the ſame reaſon for them all; and one inſtance to the contrary deſtroys an univerſal propoſition. 5. It is not inconſiſtent with the Divine attributes to have created ſome ſpirits or thinking ſubſtances, which are dependent on matter and motion in their operations, and being united to matter may both move their bodies, and be affected with certain paſſions and ſenſations by their motion, and ſtand in need of a certain diſpoſition of Organs for the proper exerciſe of their thinking faculty; ſuppoſing the number of thoſe, that are quite ſeparate from matter to be as complete as the ſyſtem of the whole univerſe would admit, and that the lower order is no inconvenience to the higher. 6. It cannot be conceived but that ſome ſenſations thus excited by matter and motion ſhould be diſagreeable, and tend to diſſolve the union between ſoul and body, as well as others agreeable. For it is impoſſible as well as inconvenient, that the ſoul ſhould feel itſelf to be loſing its faculty of thinking, which alone can make it happy, and not be affected with it. Now diſagreable ſenſatſon is to be reckoned among natural evils, which yet cannot be avoided without removing ſuch kind of animals out of nature. If any one aſk, why ſuch a law of union was eſtabliſhed? let this be his anſwer, becauſe there could be no better. For ſuch a neceſſity as this flows from the very nature of the Union of things, and conſidering the circumſtances and conditions, under which and which only they could have exiſtence, they could neither be placed in a better ſtate, nor governed by more commodious laws. Theſe evils therefore are not inconſiſtent with the divine attributes, provided that the creatures, which are ſubject to them, enjoy ſuch benefits as over-ballance them. It is to be obſerved alſo, that theſe evils do not properly ariſe from the exiſtence which God gave to the creatures, but from hence, that they had not more of Exiſtence given them, which nevertheleſs their ſtate and the place they fill in the great machine of the world could not admit. This mixture therefore of non-exiſtence ſupplies the place of an ill principle in the origin of evil, as was ſaid before. 7. The happineſs and perfection of every thing or agent ariſes from the due exerciſe of thoſe faculties, which God has given it; and the more faculties and perfections any thing has, it is capable of the greater and more perfect happineſs. 8. The leſs dependent on external things, the more ſelf-ſufficient any agent is; and the more it has the principle of its actions in itſelf, it is ſo much the more perfect. Since therefore we may conceive two ſorts of agents, one which does not act, unleſs impelled and determined by external force; the other, which have the principle of their actions within themſelves, and can determine themſelves to action by their natural power; it is plain, that the latter are much more perfect than the former. Nor can it be denied, but that God may create an agent with ſuch a power as this, which exerts itſelf into action, without either the concourſe of God, or the determination of external cauſes, ſo long as God by a general concourſe preſerves the exiſtence, powers, and faculties of that agent. 9. Such an agent may preſcribe to itſelf an end, and proſecute it by proper means, and take delight in the proſecution of it, though that end might be perfectly indifferent to it before it was propoſed, and be no more agreeable than any other of the ſame or a different kind would be, if the agent had once reſolved to proſecute it. For ſince all the pleaſure or happineſs, which we receive, ariſes from the due exerciſe of our faculties, every thing, which is equally commodious for the exerciſe of our faculties, will give us the ſame delight. The reaſon therefore why one thing pleaſes above another, is founded in the act of the agent himſelf, viz the election. This is largely explained in the book itſelf;

itſelf; together with the limits, within which it is confined. 10. It is impoſſible, that all things ſhould agree to all, that is, be good; for ſince the things are limited, diſtinct, and different one from another, and are endowed with finite, diſtinct, and different appetites; it neceſſarily follows, that the relations of convenient and inconvenient muſt ariſe from this diverſity. Since therefore every created being is from the imperfections of its nature neceſſarily limited, and from that limitation there neceſſarily follows diſtinction and diverſity; it follows, that a poſſibility at leaſt of evil is a neceſſary attendant on all creatures, and cannot be ſeparated from them by any power, wiſdom, or goodneſs whatſoever. For when a thing is applied to an appetite or being, to which it is not appropriated, as it is not agreeable to it, it neceſſarily affects it with uneaſineſs; nor was it poſſible that all things ſhould be appropriated to every being, where the things themſelves and the appetites are various and different, as they muſt neceſſarily be, if created, even in the moſt perfect manner. 11. Since ſome agents have a power over their actions, as above, and can pleaſe themſelves in the choice of ſuch things as may exerciſe their faculties; and ſince there are ſome ways of exerciſing them, which may be prejudicial to themſelves or others; it is plain, that from this power there ariſes a poſſibility of chooſing amiſs, and they may exerciſe themſelves to their own prejudice or that of others. And ſince in ſuch a variety of things, thoſe that are beneficial or hurtful, cannot be known by an intelligent being, which is in its own nature limited and imperfect, it was agreeable to the divine wiſdom and goodneſs to preſcribe ſome rules and directions to ſuch agents, in order to inform them of what would benefit or incommode them and their fellow creatures, i. e. what would be good or evil; that they might chooſe the one, and avoid the other. 13. Since therefore, as was ſaid before, an equality of perfections in the creatures is impoſſible, neither would it be convenient for them to be placed in the ſame ſtate of perfection; it follows that there are various orders and degrees even among intelligent creatures; and ſince ſome of the inferior orders and degrees are capable of thoſe benefits, which the ſuperior ones enjoy; and ſince there are as many placed in thoſe ſuperior orders as the ſyſtem of the univerſe allowed; it follows that the inferior ones, as a more convenient place could not be left for them, ought to be content with a lower portion of happineſs, which their nature makes them capable of, and to an higher than which they could not aſpire, without detriment to the ſuperior, which poſſeſſes that ſtation. For he muſt quit his place before another can aſcend to it; and it ſeems hard and very inconſiſtent with the nature of God to degrade a ſuperior, as long as he has done nothing to deſerve it. But if one of a ſuperior order ſhall by his own act, without any violence or compulſion, voluntarily quit his place, or freely chooſe ſuch things as deſerve a degradation; God would ſeem unjuſt to thoſe, who are in an inferior degree, and by a good uſe of their liberty, became fit and qualified for a ſuperior ſtate, if he ſhould refuſe them the free uſe of their choice. It ſeems unjuſt for God to condemn or degrade any one arbitrarily; but he is not to be blamed for ſuffering one to degrade himſelf by his own act and choice, eſpecially when the uſe of that elective power belongs to the nature of an intelligent being, and could not in the preſent ſtate be prohibited without detriment to ſome other. Here the wiſdom and goodneſs of God ſeem to have erected themſelves in a moſt glorious manner; the contrivance appears to be the effect of the higheſt policy and prudence. For by this means God has ſhewn himſelf moſt equitable to his creatures; ſo that no one can complain of, or glory in, his lot. He that is in a leſs convenient ſituation, has no room for complaint, ſince he is endowed with faculties, and has power to uſe them in ſuch a manner as to acquire a more commodious one; and he muſt be forced to own himſelf only in the fault, if he continues deprived of it; and he that is now in a ſuperior ſtate may learn to fear leſt he fall from it by an unlawful uſe of his faculties. The ſuperior therefore has a dread, that may in ſome meaſure diminiſh his happineſs; and the inferior may increaſe it: by which means they are both brought nearer to an equality, and in the mean time have the utmoſt provocation and incitement to chooſe the beſt and make the moſt beneficial uſe of their faculties. This conteſt makes for the good of the univerſe, and much more, than if all things were fixed by fate and neceſſity, and abſolutely confined to their preſent ſtate. Either God muſt have created no free agents, to be governed by the hope of rewards and fear of puniſhments; or this will be the fitteſt means to that end, and worthy of God. For what ground is there to complain of the Deity in this whole affair, except that when an equal ſhare of happineſs could not befal every one, he beſtows the beſt on ſuch as uſe their faculties aright, and takes away what he had given from thoſe that abuſe them? 14. If what is laid down above, be true, from thence it is manifeſt that all kinds of evil, viz. that of imperfection, pain, and ſin may enter into the world made by the moſt wiſe, good, and powerful author; and its origin may be accounted for, without calling in the aſſiſtance of an evil principle. 15. It is plain, that we are tied down to this earth and confined to it, as in a priſon; and that our knowledge does not extend beyond the ideas, which we receive from the ſenſes; and who knows not how ſmall a part we underſtand even of thoſe elements, about which we are converſant? But ſince the whole maſs of elements is a point in regard to the whole univerſe; is it any wonder, if we miſtake when we are forming a judgment, or rather a conjecture, concerning the beauty, order, and goodneſs of the whole, from this contemptible particle? This earth of ours may be the dungeon of the univerſe, an hoſpital of madmen, or a workhouſe of reprobates; and yet ſuch as it is, there is much more both of natural and moral good than evil to be found in it. "Thus "far, concludes he, has the controverſy about the origin "of evil proceeded in the author's book. For all that "has been ſaid above, is either expreſly contained in "it, or may very eaſily be deduced from the principle "there laid down." We ſhall add here a very beautiful paſſage of our author inſerted among the notes of Mr. Law's tranſlation of the Archbiſhop's book (*), in anſwer to an objection concerning the prevalency of moral evil in the world. Our author profeſſes himſelf to be of a quite different opinion. He firmly believes, and thinks he very well comprehends, that there is much more moral good in the world, nay in the earth, than evil. He is ſenſible, there may be more bad men than good, becauſe there are none but do amiſs ſometimes, and one ill act is ſufficient to denominate a man bad. But yet there are ten good acts done by thoſe we call bad men, for one ill one. Even perſons of the very worſt character may have got it by two or three flagrant enormities, which yet bear no proportion to the whole ſeries of their lives. The author doth not know the objector, nor with whom he converſes; but he muſt profeſs, that among ſuch as he is acquainted with, he believes there are hundreds, that would do him good, for one that would do him hurt; and that he has received a thouſand good offices for one ill one. He could never believe the doctrine of Hobbes, that all men are bears, wolves, and tygers to one another; that they are born enemies to all others, and all others to them; that they are naturally falſe and perfidious; or that all the good they do, is out of fear, not virtue. He that deſcribes mankind in this manner may give us cauſe to ſuſpect, that he himſelf is ſuch; but if mankind were taken one by one, perhaps not one could be found in an hundred thouſand, that could truly own the character. Nay the very authors of this calumny, if their own characters were called in queſtion, would take all poſſible pains to remove the ſuſpicion from them, and declare that they were ſpeaking of the vulgar, of the bulk of mankind, and not of themſelves. Nor in reality do they behave in this manner toward their friends and acquaintance; if they did, few would own them. Obſerve ſome of thoſe, that exclaim againſt all mankind for treachery, diſhoneſty, deceit, and cruelty; and you will find them diligently cultivating

15th 1709 he preached a Sermon on Rom. viii. 29, 30. before Thomas Earl of Wharton and the Right Honourable the Houſe of Lords, which was printed at Dublin 1709 in 4°, and reprinted at London, under the title of, Divine Predeſtination and Fore-knowledge conſiſtent with

vating friendſhips, and diſcharging the ſeveral offices due to friends, relations, and their country, with labour, pain, loſs of goods, and hazard of life itſelf, even where there is no fear to drive them to it, nor inconvenience attending the neglect of it. This, you will ſay, proceeds from cuſtom and education. Be it ſo; however the world then has not ſo far degenerated from all goodneſs, but the greater part of mankind exerciſe benevolence; nor is virtue ſo far exiled, as not to be ſupported and approved, praiſed and practiſed by common conſent and public ſuffrage; and vice is ſtill diſgraceful. Indeed we can ſcarce meet with one, unleſs preſſed by neceſſity, or provoked by injuries, who is ſo barbarous and heard-hearted, as not to be moved with compaſſion, and delighted with beneficence to others; who is not inclined to ſhew good-will and kindneſs to his friends, neighbours, children, relations, and diligent in the diſcharge of civil duties to all; who does not profeſs ſome regard for virtue, and think himſelf affronted, when he is charged with immorality. If any take notice of his own or another's actions for a day together, perhaps he will find one or two blameable; the reſt all innocent and inoffenſive. Nay it is doubtful whether a Nero or a Caligula, a Commodus or Caracalla (tho' monſters of mankind, and prone to every act of wickedneſs and fury) have done more ill than innocent actions through their whole lives. It is to be obſerved in the ſecond place, that one great crime, ſuch as murther, theft, or rapine is oftner talked of, more univerſally reported, and much longer remembered, than a thouſand good, peaceable, generous deeds, which make no noiſe in the world, nor ever come to public notice, but are ſilently paſſed by and overlooked. Which very thing ſhews, that the former are more rare than the latter; otherwiſe they would not be received with ſo much ſurprize, horror and aſtoniſhment. Thirdly, it is obſervable, that many things are done very innocently, which perſons unacquainted with the views and circumſtances of the actors, eſteem criminal. It is certain, we cannot judge of the goodneſs or badneſs of an action from bare appearance, but rather from the inward motions and intentions of the mind, and the light, in which the thing appeared to the agent. Nero killed a man, that was innocent; but who knows whether he did it out of premeditated malice? Perhaps ſome intruſted with the care of his perſon, or a flattering courtier, whom he is obliged to depend on, informs of this innocent man as plotting a conſpiracy againſt the Emperor's life, and urges diſpatch, leſt he be firſt ſurpriſed. Perhaps the informer is impoſed upon himſelf, and thinks it real. It is plain ſuch circumſtances very much leſſen the guilt: and it is probable, if the crimes of Princes were weighed impartially, and the whole proceſs laid open, many things might be offered, which would greatly alleviate them. Fourthly, many things are done through ignorance of the law, and becauſe thoſe, who commit them, do not know, that they are vicious; nay they are often eſteemed virtues. Thus St. Paul perſecuted the Church, and himſelf owns, that he did it out of ignorance, and therefore obtained mercy. How many things of this kind are done daily by ſuch as profeſs different religions? It is true, theſe are ſins, but ſins of ignorance, which eaſily obtain forgiveneſs; and as they do not proceed from an evil diſpoſition and depraved will, are ſcarce to be reckoned in the number of moral evils. Whoever falls foul on others out of a love of virtue, hatred of vice, or zeal towards God, does wrong; but ignorance and an honeſt heart make very much for his excuſe. This conſideration alone would take a great deal off from the number of wicked perſons. Neither does this excuſe hold only in matters of religion: party prejudices have alſo a ſhare in it, which induce men to extirpate with fire and ſword, thoſe that they believe to be public enemies and traitors to their country. There is no error more pernicious to mankind, and which has produced more or greater crimes, than this; and yet it ariſes from an honeſt mind. The miſtake lies here, that they forget that their country and commonwealth ought to be defended by juſt and lawful means, and not at the expence of humanity. Fifthly, prejudice and ſurmiſe make many wicked, that really are not ſo. The moſt innocent converſation between man and woman gives the malicious a handle to ſuſpect and ſlander them. From any one ſingle circumſtance, that uſually attends a criminal action, the ſuſpected perſon is found guilty of the fact itſelf. From one bad action a man's whole life is diſparaged and judged to be of the ſame tenor. If one member of a ſociety be caught in a fault, all the reſt are preſumed to be as bad. It is ſcarce credible how many are looked upon as ſcandalouſly wicked through ſuch ſuſpicions, who are very far from it. Confeſſors and Judges in criminal caſes know very well how ſmall a part of common fame is true, how little it is ever to be truſted. Sixthly, we muſt diſtinguiſh, and the law itſelf does, between ſuch things as proceed from malice and premeditated wickedneſs, and thoſe that ariſe from violence of paſſion and diſorder of mind. The guilt is very much extenuated, when the perſon offending is under provocation, and as it were tranſported beyond himſelf by a ſudden fit of paſſion. Theſe things are all known to our moſt equitable Judge, who will paſs a merciful, and not a rigorous ſentence on us; and for theſe reaſons, we believe, he forbad us to judge any thing before the time. We only know the outſides of things; and it is poſſible, that ſuch as ſeem to us the greateſt crimes, would upon ſeeing the whole procedure, and making proper allowances, appear to be the leaſt. Many virtues as well as vices lie in the mind inviſible to human eyes; it is ſpeaking at random therefore to pronounce upon the number of one or other; and he that would from thence infer the neceſſity of an evil principle, ought to be eſteemed a raſh judge, and an uſurper of God's tribunal. Laſtly, it may be obſerved, that the continuance and increaſe of mankind is a ſure proof that there is more good than evil in the world: for one or two acts may have a pernicious influence on many perſons; nay all immoral actions tend to the deſtruction of mankind, at leaſt to the common detriment and diminution of them; whereas a great many even numberleſs good actions muſt neceſſarily concur to the preſervation of each individual. If therefore bad actions exceeded the number of the good, there would be an end of human kind. We have clear evidence of this in thoſe countries, where vices multiply; the number of men continually decreaſes, and the place grows deſolate; but upon the return of virtue and goodneſs it is again ſtocked with inhabitants. This is a ſign, that mankind could not ſubſiſt, if ever vice were prevalent, ſince many good acts are neceſſary to repair the loſs, which attends one bad one. One ſingle action may take away the life of a man, or of ſeveral; but how many acts of benevolence and humanity muſt neceſſarily contribute to the bringing up, educating, and preſerving every one? For a proof, that the good, both natural and moral, in the world, is ſuperior to the evil, the reader may ſee Sherlock on Providence, c. 7. Hutcheſon on the Nature and Conduct of the Paſſions, Sect. 6. p. 183, 184, Edit. Sect. 2. C. 2. Monſieur Bernard gave an abridgment of our author's book in his Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (9). Mr. Bayle in the ſecond volume of his Reponſe aux Queſtions d'un Provincial (10) examined the hypotheſis of our author, as it was repreſented in Monſieur Bernard's abſtract, and in a paſſage cited by the authors of the Acta Eruditorum, but omitted by Monſieur Bernard; who complains (11) of Mr. Bayle for not conſulting Archbiſhop King's book itſelf, and obſerves that Mr. Bayle attacks that Prelate upon ſuch principles, as he would expreſly deny, ſince the Engliſh Divines do not maintain in every reſpect the principles common among others of the Reformed. The firſt of Archbiſhop King's principles, which Mr. Bayle takes notice of, is, That God always acts for an End, which End in the creation of the world was to exerciſe his power, or to communicate his goodneſs; ſo that it is only improperly ſaid, that God created all things for his glory. Mr. Bayle allows this principle, and that is almoſt the only point in which he agrees with the Archbiſhop. But he denies, what the Archbiſhop aſſerts, viz. that there is more natural good than evil in the world; and that the eſtabliſhing of two principles does not remove the difficulty about the origin of evil, becauſe it is as much repugnant to the Divine Goodneſs to have created beings, which he foreſaw would be corrupted by another principle, as to have created thoſe, which were corruptible in themſelves. He denies alſo, in oppoſition to our author, that every thing derived from matter muſt of neceſſity be ſubject to pains, diſeaſes, grief, &c. And to confute that notion, he ſeems, as Monſieur Bernard obſerves (12), to build upon the opinion of occaſional cauſes, as if it were an uncontrovertible doctrine, whereas it had very few followers in England. Mr. Bayle aſks, to what purpoſe ſerve the pains of childbirth? and anſwers, to call for a midwife; and puts this inſtance in the margin, that a woman in a wilderneſs will feel as much pain as in a city. " And no " doubt, ſays Mr. Bernard (13), he would conclude " from thence, that thoſe pains conſequently ſerve for " nothing. If he knew no other uſe of theſe pains, " he might have conſulted ſome Phyſician, who would " have informed him of the matter." Mr. Bayle denies, that miſtake and ignorance are the natural effects of man's imperfection; and cites upon that head the greateſt part of the Divines, who believe that Adam was created ſo learned, that though his knowledge was not infinite, it would be abſurd to ſuppoſe that he was in error or ignorance. " But the authority of Divines, ſays " Monſr. Bernard (*), will ſignify but little, where the " queſtion is about reaſon." Mr. Bayle denies, that it is neceſſary in order to a man's eſteeming himſelf happy in his right choice, to be perſuaded, that the choice was made by the ſtrength of his own free-will. He alledges ſeveral ſorts of men, who do not think their happineſs depends upon their liberty, and quotes a great many authors antient and modern, Poets and others. But he ought, ſays Monſieur Bernard (14), to have proved to Archbiſhop King, that all thoſe people, who have ſuffered themſelves to be conducted by others, &c. did not, by an antecedent act of free-will, chooſe this as the beſt may for them. For to ſuppoſe, that after a man, " having examined a ſhip, which he finds " to be good, and the Pilot, whom he finds to be ſkilful, has reſolved very freely to go on board, and " intruſt himſelf to the conduct of the Pilot; to ſuppoſe, that this man, in order to preſerve the freedom " of his will muſt needs, at every motion, which the " Pilot makes on board the ſhip, and at every order " he gives out, make a free act of his will, by which " he conſents to that motion, and without which he is " not free; this is certainly what the Archbiſhop never " alledged, and except he had maintained that propoſition, moſt part of Mr. Bayle's inſtances fall of themſelves." Mr. Bayle brings ſeveral other reaſons againſt our author's notion of liberty; and afterwards anſwers that queſtion of the Archbiſhop. Why God permitted Sin? He pretends, that the inconveniences, which our author alledges, in caſe God had not created a being endowed with ſuch a liberty, as the Archbiſhop conceives, are abſolutely null. He ſays the ſame of what the Archbiſhop advances to ſhew, that God was not obliged to employ his omnipotent power, to hinder thoſe free agents from abuſing their freedom, or to tranſport them to another habitation, where they would have had no occaſion to prompt them to a bad choice. Monſieur Bernard (15) makes one general remark upon this ſubject, which he tells us may be applied to many other parts of this controverſy; and that is, that Mr. Bayle artfully ſeparates the inconveniences, which Archbiſhop King propoſes, that he may confute them with the greater eaſe, without taking notice, that divers reaſons, which taken ſeparately, would not determine one to act after a certain manner, yet might determine him, if they acted jointly. I have a mind, for inſtance, to go to ſuch a town; I have a very preſſing reaſon, which hinders me, and I have many others, which incline me to undertake the Journey: every one of theſe are leſs than that, which ſhould determine me not to go; but taken all together, they turn the ſcale. You do nothing at all to hinder me from taking the Journey, if you only refute each reaſon apart, which made me determine to go; you muſt make one argument of them all, and convince me, that all of them together are not ſo ſtrong as that one, which ſhould hinder my proceeding on my Journey. One thing, as Monſieur Bernard remarks (16), which ſhews it to have been neceſſary, that Mr. Bayle ſhould have read our author's book, is his way of confuting what the Archbiſhop has ſaid of the torments of the damned, that they are uſeful perhaps to keep good men to their duty, and make them perſevere in a right conduct. Mr. Bayle pretends, that this cannot be underſtood of the Saints in Paradiſe, who have no occaſion for ſuch a curb. " But it may be, ſays Monſieur Bernard, that Archbiſhop King will not grant " him this, but maintain, that the confirmation of " Saints in goodneſs is not the confirmation of an " Enthuſiaſt ſupported by no motives; of which number the Archbiſhop conjectures that the example of " the damned may be one. In the mean time Mr. " Bayle ſuppoſing it not to be ſo, imagines that the " Archbiſhop would inſinuate, that after the reſurrection there will be new inhabitants upon the earth. " This is the effect of confuting a book, which Mr. " Bayle never read." Mr. Bayle afterwards attacks our author upon his aſſertion, that the goodneſs of things depends ſolely on God's having choſen them. He replied to Monſieur Bernard, and made ſeveral new obſervations upon Archbiſhop King's book, in the fifth volume of his Reſponſe aux Queſtions d'un Provincial, publiſhed after his death. The Archbiſhop anſwered his remarks in the papers, which he left behind him, the ſubſtance of which is inſerted by way of Notes by Mr. Law, in the ſecond edition of his tranſlation of the Archbiſhop's book. Mr. Law obſerves (17), that Mr. Bayle frequently introduces among his reaſonings the teſtimonies of other writers, but that moſt of theſe teſtimonies " are rhetorical or poetic flouriſhes, rather than Philoſophic truths; and conſequently not worth a ſerious " examination. To draw any thing like an argument from another's words, we ſhould at leaſt be ſure " of his determinate meaning, of the preciſe number of his Ideas, as well as the juſtneſs of their " connection together, which we muſt never expect " from ſuch kind of random Quotations. It may not " therefore be improper to obſerve here once for all, that " Bayle's uſual Method of reaſoning from authorities " muſt be very weak and unphiloſophical, and calculated rather to blind men's eyes, than to inform " their underſtanding." Mr. Leibnitz wrote Remarks

Mr. Leibnitz in this piece ſtiles the treatiſe de Origine Mali, a Work full of Learning and elegance; and tells us, that the Archbiſhop's firſt four Chapters agree with his own principles; but that the fifth, which treats of human liberty and moral evil, is founded upon principles oppoſite to his.

(D) Attacked by Anthony Collins Eſquire in a Pamphlet, intitled, A vindication of the Divine attributes &c.] In this pamphlet Mr. Collins obſerves the following method, I. To lay down his Grace's notion of the attributes of God. II. Shew what led his Grace to lay down ſuch a notion. III. Offer ſome conſiderations againſt his Grace's ſcheme. IV. Anſwer what may be objected from his Grace's Sermon, I. With regard to his Grace's notion of the attributes of God; he ſays (8), When the Scriptures ſpeak of God, they aſcribe hands, and eyes, and feet to him; not that it is deſigned we ſhould believe, that he has any of theſe members according to the literal ſignification; but the meaning is, that he has a power to execute all thoſe acts, to the effecting of which thoſe parts in us are inſtrumental. And when the Scriptures repreſent God as affected with ſuch Paſſions as we perceive in our ſelves, viz. as angry and pleaſed, as loving and hating, as repenting and changing his reſolutions, as full of Mercy and provoked to Revenge; the meaning is, that he will as certainly puniſh the wicked as if he was inflamed with the paſſion of Anger; that he will reward the good as infallibly, as we will thoſe, for whom we have a particular love; that when men turn from their wickedneſs, he will as ſurely change his diſpenſations towards them, as if he really repented, and had changed his mind. In this point all conſidering men agree with his Grace. But he proceeds, throughout his Sermon, to give the like account of the wiſdom, mercy, juſtice, knowledge, foreknowledge, virtue, and all other attributes of God; and makes them as improperly applied to him, as eyes or ears, love or hatred, or any human parts and paſſions; for he ſays, As the nature and paſſions of men are thus by analogy and compariſon aſcribed to God; ſo in the ſame manner we find the powers and operations of our minds aſcribed to him; and he inſtances in wiſdom, and underſtanding, and mercy, which are, ſays he (19), of ſo different a nature from what they are in us, and ſo ſuperior to all that we can conceive, that in reality there is no more likeneſs between them, than between our hand and God's Power. And that the terms of foreknowledge and predeſtination, nay of underſtanding and will, when aſcribed to God, are not to be taken ſtrictly and properly; nor are we to think they are in him after the ſame manner, or in the ſame ſenſe, that we find them in ourſelves; but on the contrary, we are to interpret them only by way of analogy and compariſon (20). Again, Wiſdom is in us as different from what we call ſo in God, as light is from motion (21). Again, There is as great a difference between theſe foregoing when attributed to God, and as they are in us, as between weighing in a balance and thinking, in truth infinitely greater (22). Nay he ſays, The beſt repreſentations we can make of God are infinitely ſhort of truth (23). And laſtly he concludes, That underſtanding, juſtice, and virtue are not to be underſtood to ſignify the ſame thing, when applied to God and to men (24). II. As to what led his Grace to lay down ſuch a notion of the attributes of God; he thinks (25), that if thoſe attributes are underſtood literally, and in the ſame way as we find them with us, abſurd and intolerable conſequences would follow. And he allows in particular (26), That the foreknowledge and predetermination of God are inconſiſtent with the contingency of events and our freedom of will, if his foreknowledge and predetermination are of the ſame nature with ours. The uſe he makes of this analogous notion of foreknowledge is contained in theſe words (27): Since we have no more proper notion of foreknowledge and predetermination in God than a man born blind has of ſight and colours, we ought no more to pretend to determine what is conſiſtent or not conſiſtent with them, than a blind man ought to determine from what he hears or feels, to what objects the ſenſe of ſeeing reaches. Mr. Collins * offers ſome conſiderations againſt his Grace's notions; and obſerves, 1. That, " according to thoſe notions, it is impoſſible for his Grace " to prove the exiſtence of God againſt atheiſts. For " our conceptions or ideas, that we ſignify by the term " God, muſt be the ſubject of proof, whenever we bring " the term God into a propoſition. But his Grace ſays, " All our beſt conceptions of God are infinitely ſhort of " truth (29), and as different from truth as weighing " in a balance is from thinking (30), or as Light from " motion (31). Therefore his Grace cannot prove the " being of God, or, which is all one, the exiſtence of " any being, that is really conformable to our concep- " tions of God, unleſs his Grace will ſay, that what is " infinitely ſhort of truth and different from truth, can be " proved true. 2. It being evident from the foregoing article, that whoever propoſes to prove the exiſtence of " God, muſt have ſuch an idea of God as is agreeable to " the real nature of the being, whoſe exiſtence is propoſed " to be proved; I would aſk his Grace how he would " define the term God, if he undertook to prove God's " exiſtence againſt an atheiſt. It is evident, he muſt " either contradict his opinion, that all our conceptions " of God are falſe, and aſſign ſome conception of God " that he would ſtand by and own to be agreeable to " truth; or elſe acknowledge the impoſſibility of proving God's exiſtence. And I am inclined to believe " his Grace would chooſe the firſt, becauſe there are " ſeveral paſſages in his diſcourſe, which imply a " conception of God, that his Grace may perhaps ſtand " by and own to be agreeable to the truth of things; " and that, as I take it, is of a Being, that is a general cauſe of the wonderful effects in nature, to which " we cannot give any particular attributes or perfections: " (though in reality, according to his Grace, this " can be no better than an analogous conception of " God, any more than the conception of him as a " holy, good, merciful, and wiſe being.") Mr. Collins (32) then quotes ſome words of the Archbiſhop's ſermon, p. 5. to ſhew, that his Grace can have no other notion of God, than of a being, that is a general cauſe of effects. " Now if that be the idea, ſays Mr. " Collins, his Grace ſignifies by the term God, I will " allow that the term God may be brought into a propoſition, and the being of God in that ſenſe will " become capable of proof. But if that be all that " is meant by that term, I ſee not why atheiſts ſhould " not come into the belief of ſuch a Deity; for they, " equally with theiſts, allow ſome general cauſe of all " effects to have eternally exiſted; but, as I take it, " differ from them in the attributes of that general " cauſe. As for example, the theiſt affirms the world " was made by a wiſe being, and thinks the wonderful harmony of the Univerſe, an admirabie evi- " dence of the exiſtence of ſuch a being. On the " contrary the atheiſt affirms wiſdom is not neceſſary " to ſuch a purpoſe; but that all theſe admirable effects " may be produced by cauſes and powers, of which " we have no idea. And does not his Grace give up " the point to theſe men, in allowing the world does " not proceed from a wiſe or intelligent being, but only from a being conſidered as a general cauſe, of " whoſe particular attributes we have no notion at all?' ' Perhaps his Grace may think there will remain a wide difference between atheiſm and theiſm, becauſe he ſuppoſes his eternal being to be immaterial; and the atheiſt ſuppoſes his eternal being to be the material Univerſe. But that difference is, as I conceive, of no conſequence; for if all the moral and all the other natural attributes are given up as indefenſible; then all the arguments for God's government of the world, for rewarding and puniſhing men in a future ſtate, which are drawn from

In 1719 he publiſhed at London in 4to, A Diſcourſe concerning the Conſecration of Churches; ſhewing what is meant by dedicating them, with the Grounds of that Office. Feb. 24, 1721 he was again ſworn one of the Lords Juſtices of Ireland; as he was likewiſe June the 13th 1723. He died at his palace at St. Sepulchre's in Dublin May the 8th 1729, and was interred in the North-ſide of the Church-yard of Donnybrook. A particular account of his manuſcripts, charities, character, &c. will ſoon be publiſhed by Mr. Harris in his new tranſlation and continuation of Sir James Ware, De Præſulibus & Scriptoribus Hiberniæ. The Archbiſhop's heirs intend to publiſh all his works together, with his life prefixed. There is a Sermon of his Grace upon Gen. ii. 16, 17. printed at the end of the ſecond edition of Mr. Edmund Law's tranſlation of his book, De Origine Mali, at London 1732 in 8vo, two volumes.

from the conſideration of the attributes of God taken in a ſtrict and literal ſenſe, are given up. As for inſtance, Do not we argue for a future ſtate from the juſtice of God, and conclude, that he will deal with every man according to his merit? Do we not, from the ſame attribute, conclude the neceſſity of an incarnate God, ſuffering for the ſins of the world? And do we not conclude from his goodneſs, his deſign to ſave mankind? And do we not infer from his knowledge, that he takes cognizance of our actions; and from his will, do not we infer our duty? But if none of thoſe attributes are in God, nor any others, that we can conceive, we can never argue from them, nor infer any kind of obligation to duty; for all the motives to duty, unleſs it be that of preſent pleaſure (which is an atheiſtical conſideration) are ſolely drawn from the conſideration of the attributes of God taken in a literal ſenſe. How can men know God's will, when he has no will? How can men know, they ſhall be rewarded or puniſhed in a future ſtate, or what reaſon have they to think there ſhall be a future ſtate, but from the conſideration of God's juſtice, which will certainly make good men amends in another ſtate for their ſufferings in this life, and make wicked men ſufferers for the pleaſure their ſins gave them here? But if we loſe the uſe and benefit of the notion of God, that is, have ſuch a notion as has no influence on our practice; what ſignifies contending with the atheiſt about ſo poor a ſpeculation as the queſtion of the exiſtence of an eternal immaterial being? For whether he be material or immaterial, if he can have neither underſtanding, nor will, nor juſtice, it is all alike. Beſides, if once the Deity be ſuppoſed to have no underſtanding, &c. I do not ſee how this Grace will be able to prove the exiſtence of one eternal immaterial being, if the atheiſt ſhould think it worth his while to diſpute that point with his Grace. 3. Mr. Collins obſerves (33), that " his Grace has given up the cauſe to Mr. Bayle. " For Mr. Bayle ſays, there is no anſwering the Manichean objections againſt ſome of the attributes of " God, without captivating the underſtanding to the " obedience of faith, or believing againſt evidence; " that is, believing God to be good, though it be evident, ſays he, he is not ſo, and believing him to " be wiſe, though it be evident he is not ſo. And " what ſays his Grace? Why he owns God is not " good nor wiſe, and thereby yields to the force of Mr. " Bayle's arguments. Only Mr. Bayle continues to believe " God is good and wiſe, againſt the force of all human " reaſoning; and his Grace ſuppoſes God is neither wiſe " nor good; which two do not much, if at all, differ " but in words; for Mr. Bayle's good and wiſe againſt " evidence and argument, is much the ſame with being

" whether it is not dangerous to leave men to themſelves with ſuch erroneous and vicious conceptions " of God; for if they will but give themſelves the " leaſt trouble to reflect on their notion, they muſt find " nothing is ſo eaſy as to ſlide into atheiſm from the " belief of a God, which they take to be ſuch a finite, " limited, corporeal, immoral (as fury and rage im- " port) Being, as his Grace deſcribes. I hope his " Grace is of opinion, that the Being of God, which " is the foundation of all religion and morality, is " capable of the cleareſt proof imaginable; and con- " ſequently that there is no danger of well-mean- " ing men's running into atheiſm, if they ſhould hap- " pen to be convinced, that they have erroneous con- " ceptions of God. But ſuppoſe his Grace is of the opi- " nion of Tully (38) and Simonides, and thinks the " Being of a God a difficult problem, and that it is " dangerous to diſturb men in their wrong notions of " God, for fear they ſhould have no notion of him at " all; I muſt confeſs, I cannot agree with his Grace " in thinking it would be reaſonable, even on that ſup- " poſition, to forbear objecting to a wrong notion. " Evidence ought to be the ſole ground of aſſent, and " examination is the way to arrive at evidence; and " therefore rather than I would have examination, " arguing, and objecting laid aſide, I would chooſe to " ſay, that no opinions whatever can be dangerous to " a man, that impartially examines into the truth of " things. And this I hope his Grace will aſſent to " upon ſecond thoughts, rather than prevent ſo much " good preaching as his Grace muſt needs do, by " arguing thoſe men guilty of officiouſneſs and im- " pertinence, that would reclaim men from ſuch an " error as believing God to be like a man, if once the " Clergy come to be of his Grace's ſentiment." 5. Mr. Collins obſerves (39), that his Grace, by denying God to be a holy, wiſe, juſt Being, plainly contradicts all thoſe paſſages of Scripture, where the example of God is recommended to our imitation. 6. That his Grace has given up the cauſe to the Unitarians, when he declares, [p. 12.] the diſtinction of Three Perſons in one God to be but a Reſemblance, i. e. not truly and really ſuch as we mean by three Perſons, but only analogically ſuch, juſt as Time and a Line are made to reſemble one another (40). 7. That " his Grace has failed of his main " deſign, pretended in his diſcourſe, viz. to manifeſt " the Divine Foreknowledge conſiſtent with the freedom " of man's will (41)." Mr. Collins at laſt conſiders what might be objected to him from his Grace's ſermon (12); and concludes with theſe words: " I hope, " I have ſaid enough to make his Grace employ his " thoughts once more on the ſubject, and give us a " farther Eclairciſſement on the ſubject of this ſermon, " and of his book De Origine Mali; which I wiſh " he may perform to the ſatisfaction of the public, " and thereby prevent my deſign of handling theſe " queſtions; which would not be thought ſo difficult as " ſome imagine them to be, if men would but be wil- " ling to bring every propoſition they uſe to the trial. " Whereas men will for ever eſteem ſome propoſitions " to be ſacred and true, and never ſuſpect them of " falſhood; and that is the true reaſon why they are " ſo confounded, and advance ſuch contradictory " ſchemes about the preſcience, wiſdom, juſtice, and " other attributes of God. But if they would im- " partially examine every thing (how ſacred ſoever it " may be to them before they examined) all things " would then appear harmonious aud conſiſtent in the " Intellectual Syſtem, as they do in the Mechanical Syſtem " of the Univerſe." was born at Exeter in the year 1669, and bred up for ſome years to his father's buſineſs; but in the midſt of that employment, his inclination to learning was ſo ſtrong, that he laid out all the money he could ſpare in books, and devoted every moment of his leiſure hours to ſtudy; ſo that he became an excellent ſcholar, before the world ſuſpected any ſuch thing, and gave the public a noble proof of his ſkill in the Church Hiſtory, in his Enquiry into the Conſtitution, Diſcipline, Unity and Worſhip of the Primitive Church, that flouriſhed within the firſt 300 *years after Chriſt. What I "have written as to this ſubject, I have wholly col-"lected out of the genuine and unqueſtionably au-"thentic writings of thoſe ages, that are now extant, "making uſe of no other writings whatſoever, except "the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Euſebius, which was writ "in the beginning of the fourth age, and relates "only thoſe affairs, that were tranſacted in the three "former, beyond the period of which time this En-"quiry doth not reach; but is wholly limited there-"by, and confined thereunto. That which hath been "thus collected, has been done, I hope, with the "greateſt impartiality and fidelity, without any pre-"poſſeſſion of mind, or any fraudulent deſign what-"ſoever." He afterwards obſerves, that amongſt other reaſons of publiſhing this book, theſe two were the chiefeſt, viz. to inform others, and to inform himſelf; "to inform others, ſays he, what the practices of the "Primitive Apoſtolic Churches were, if any ſhall be "ſo inquiſitive and deſirous to know them; or, if I "am miſtaken (as who is without errors?) to be bet-"ter informed myſelf, which I muſt needs confeſs "was that which I chiefly deſigned in the publication "hereof. Wherefore without oſtentation or challeng-"ing, but unfeignedly and ſincerely to prevent miſ-"takes in my younger years, I humbly deſire (if the "requeſt be not too bold) and ſhall heartily thank "any learned perſon, that will be ſo kind as to in-"form me, if he knows me to have erred in any one "or more particulars; which he may do, either pub-"lickly, or, if he think fit, privately, by letters to "my bookſeller, who will convey it ſafely to my "hands." He concludes his preface with remarking, that when he firſt reſolved on the printing of this Treatiſe, he deſigned to have publiſhed his obſervations on the fourth general head propounded in the title-page to be enquired into, viz. the Worſhip of the Primitive Church, as well as he has done on the three former; "but for ſome reaſons, ſays he, I have reſerved this "for a particular Tract by itſelf, which probably, "though I do not abſolutely promiſe it, may in a "little time more be alſo publiſhed; and that the ra-"ther, becauſe in this part I have made two or three "references thereunto, which I thought good to ac-"quaint the reader with, that ſo, if he cannot find "ſome things that I have referred to in this Trea-"tiſe, he may be aſſured they are to be met with in "the enſuing one." The ſecond Part of this Enquiry was publiſhed in 8vo. He concludes the laſt chapter of it with an earneſt perſuaſion to Peace, Unity, and Mode-ration, in which he writes as follows: "Certain I "am, we need no arguments to induce us hereunto [to "Peace, Moderation, &c.]; both the neceſſity and "facility of love and unity require it at our hands. "Its neceſſity is evident from hence, that whilſt we "ſpend our zeal and heat about theſe inconſiderable "matters, the very foundation of faith and morals "are attacked and ſhaken; atheiſm increaſes, im-"morality prevails, and thoſe damnable hereſies, "which for many ages have been ſilenced and aban-"doned, are now revived by men of corrupt faith, "who take occaſion from the lawleſsneſs and licenti-"ouſneſs of this preſent age, to vent thoſe curſed te-"nets, which eradicate and deſtroy all Religion: it "is to be feared, that unleſs we haſten to compoſe our "differences about the ſkirts and fringes of Religion, "the very vitals and eſſentials thereof will be corroded "and devoured by hereſy and profaneneſs. And as "for theſe and the like reaſons, the neceſſity of an "union or comprehenſion is manifeſt on the one hand; "ſo the facility of ſuch an union is as apparent on "the other hand; for, thanks be to God, our differ-"ences are neither about faith nor manners. We all "believe in one and the ſame God, hope to be ſaved "by one and the ſame Redeemer, deſire to be ſanc-"tified by one and the ſame Sanctifier, receive one "and the ſame Scriptures, aſſert the ſame doctrines, "and acknowledge the neceſſity of the ſame duties. "Our diſputes are only about leſſer matters, about "modes and forms, about geſtures and poſtures, and "ſuch-like inferior matters, about which it ſhould "grieve a wiſe man to quarrel, and which with the "greateſt eaſe in the world might be compoſed and "ſettled, if managed by men of prudence and mo-"deration; and ſuch men, it is hoped, are the Re-"verend Biſhops advanced by their Majeſties, whoſe "promotion to thoſe places of dignity and truſt many "honeſt and peaceable men look upon as a good "omen and prognoſtic of our future union and happy "eſtabliſhment." A ſecond edition of this book has been ſince printed. An Anſwer to it was publiſhed by Mr. Sclater, a Non-juring Clergyman, at London 1717 in 8vo, under this title: An Original Draught of the Primitive Church: in anſwer to a Diſcourſe, intituled, An Enquiry into the Conſtitution, Diſcipline, Unity, &c. By a Preſbyter of the Church of England. Mr. Sclater in his Preface obſerves, that our author in his "Preface ſhews an humble diffidence of his youth-"ful performance, and deſires another ſenſe might be "given of his ſeveral quotations (if need required) "for better information of himſelf and others. I "confeſs, ſays Mr. Sclater, I ſaw need enough of that "at my firſt peruſal of his book, and not a little "wondered, that no friendly hand had done that "kindneſs for him long before. As to my own part, "I had never walked in the unpleaſant paths of con-"troverſy to that day; and beſides the conſciouſneſs "of my unfitneſs for it, had averſion enough ever to "ſet a foot in them; but ſeeing none had anſwered, "or was anſwering (as I could hear of) ſo reaſonable "a deſire, though men of letters in both Kingdoms "of our united Iſland had declared an earneſt ex-"pectation of it, and the holy Church of England in "particular has reproached the ſilence of her chil-"dren in an argument, that ſo plainly ſtruck at her "foundation; filial obedience, (I may ſay) to ſo faith-"ful a parent moved me to uſe the beſt endeavours I "could to vindicate her truly Apoſtolical Conſtitution, "and to plead the cauſe of injured Antiquity, as well "as hers; for that both are truly one in this caſe, the "impartial reader will eaſily obſerve, when he ſees "the palpable miſtakes corrected, and the unfair re-"preſentations of the venerable Fathers of the Church "(ſo obvious in almoſt every page of thoſe plauſible "Collections) reſtored to their genuine ſenſe again. "This is what may be expected here; and I am not "conſcious I have ſtrained any one paſſage in anti-"quity, beyond the true meaning of the venerable "authors themſelves, to form a different conſtruction "of it from that of the ingenious Enquirer. I ſhould "count it the worſt of ſacrilege to do ſo; the goods "of the Church are not ſo ſacred as her ſenſe is.

and who left him half his Library at his death, was of great advantage to him; by his advice, after he had ſtudied ſome time at Leyden in Holland, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Law, in which profeſſion his learning and indefatigable diligence made him ſoon be taken notice of. In the two laſt Parliaments during the reign of King William, and in five Parliaments during the reign of Queen Anne he ſerved as Burgeſs for Beer-Alſton in Devonſhire. In 1702 he publiſhed at London in 8vo, without his name, his Hiſtory of the Apoſtles Creed. With Critical Obſervations on its ſeveral Articles [B]. This Treatiſe is written with great learning and judgment; and

" What each quotation appeared to me from the beſt " authority and cloſeſt attention I could uſe, I have " fairly repreſented here. If defective in apprehending the true ſenſe, or injudicious in the inferences " from it, I heartily ſubmit, in my turn, to the charity of better information. For as I write with a " conſcientious regard to undeceive ſome, ſo I am infinitely more concerned not to be deceived myſelf; " and I wiſh no greater freedom from prejudice or " party in any, who read or cenſure theſe papers, " than I am conſcious of in the compoſing of them." Mr. Sclater then obſerves, that " every one too well knows " of what a large and extenſive nature this unhappy ſubject is, and that the controverſial books about it are " ſadly numerous, and full of different ſchemes and " arguments, according to the genius of ſects, and " times, and perſons; many of which, ſays he, might " have fallen in with ſeveral parts of this diſcourſe, " had I been inclined to diſpute (as I bleſs God I am " not); but I have kept cloſe to the ſingle Treatiſe " before me, and that for two reaſons eſpecially; " 1. Becauſe I heard from many hands, that the leſs " learned and more prejudiced adverſaries of the truly " Primitive Church of England have made their boaſts " of it; and from its not being anſwered, have " proclaimed it an unanſwerable vindication of their " ſeparation from her. 2. Becauſe I think, that all " the ſcattered arguments and pleas for their unwarrantable ſchiſm are reducible to ſome one or other " of the great variety of quotations cited in it." He afterwards remarks, that ſince his papers were nigh wrought off the preſs, an ingenious Treatiſe had come into his hands, intitled, The Invalidity of the Diſſenting Miniſtry, &c. " wherein, ſays he, ſome particular " quotations in the Enquiry relating to the Presbyter's " power of Ordination, are judiciouſly explained, and " with clear reaſoning anſwered to the full." The book mentioned by Mr. Sclater in this paſſage is intitled, The Invalidity of the Diſſenting Miniſtry, or Presbyterian Ordination an irregular and unjuſtifiable practice. In anſwer to Mr. Pierce's Sermons, entituled, Preſbyterian Ordination proved Regular: and to all the pretended inſtances of Presbyterian Ordination, in a book lately publiſhed by Mr. Charles Owen, called, The Validity of the Diſſenting Miniſtry: with Remarks on the Forgery and Diſhoneſty of that Writer. To which is added, an impartial View and Cenſure of the Miſtakes propagated for the ordaining power of Preſbyters, in a celebrated book, entituled, An Enquiry into the Conſtitution, Diſcipline, Unity, and Worſhip of the Primitive Church, that flouriſhed within the firſt three hundred years after Chriſt. By a Presbyter of the Church of England.

[B] He publiſhed The Hiſtory of the Apoſtles Creed: with Critical Obſervations on its ſeveral Articles.] In the preface he obſerves, that " if the Explication given " by himſelf of any article or part of the Creed, " ſhould happen to be diſliked or not approved by " any one, the reader muſt remember, that the author " only acts the part of an Hiſtorian; his deſign being " only to collect and diſcover the ſenſe and meaning " of the firſt makers and compoſers of the Creed, " what it was that the introducers of the ſeveral articles purpoſed and intended thereby; and if in any " place he ſeems to ſpeak his own ſenſe, that is only " for the better carrying on the thread of his diſcourſe, and in the quality and perſon of an Hiſtorian, as having collected the ſenſe or explication in " ſuch place mentioned, to be the intended meaning " of the framers of that part or clauſe of the Creed; " the only intent of the author being to ſhew the ſenſe " of the compoſers of the Creed, and not at all to " enter into an examination of the juſtneſs or truth of " ſuch ſenſe and meaning; the author leaving that " to every man's private judgment, to be tried and " determined by the holy Scriptures, the only perfect " and infallible rule of faith, by which even this " Creed itſelf, and every explication thereof, muſt be " tried and judged, and is no farther to be received or " believed, than as it is conſonant and agreeable thereunto, which is according to the ſixth article of the " Church of England, that whatſoever is not read in " the holy Scripture, nor may be proved thereby, is not " to be required of any man, that it ſhould be believed " as an article of faith, or be thought requiſite or ne- " ceſſary to ſalvation." In the firſt chapter he cites the encomiums given the Creed by the primitive writers, and the ſeveral names by which it hath been called. He ſhews, that it was principally termed a ſymbol, for which appellation two reaſons are commonly alledged; the one taken from the manner of common ſuppers amongſt the antients, which is ſhewn to be weak and uncertain; the other taken from military affairs, where it denotes the watch-words and ſigns, by which ſoldiers knew each other; which is affirmed not to be the full and proper ſignification of the word, but that it is rather to be derived from the marks and tokens uſed by the idolatrous Pagans in their ſacred rites, called by them Symbola, which were two-fold, either mute or vocal. He gives inſtances of both, and proves them to have been ſecret marks or words, revealed only to thoſe who were initiated in their myſteries, by means of which they were known to each other, and had free admiſſion, whereſoever they came, to the ſervices of thoſe Deities, whoſe ſymbols they had received; and that from the ſame reaſons, and in alluſion thereunto, the Creed was called a ſymbol by the primitive authors. He then proceeds to the authors of the Creed; and obſerves, that ſome aſcribe it to the Apoſtles, which by ſeveral reaſons is demonſtrated to be impoſſible; but that nevertheleſs it is apoſtolical and antient. He ſhews, that it is exceedingly difficult to find out the preciſe framers of it. That the authors of it were many, and the compoſure of it a work of time. That one part of it was uſed by the Apoſtles, and left by them to their ſucceſſors. That the Creed was always demanded at baptiſm, both by the Apoſtles, and by thoſe who came after them. That the other part of the Creed was afterwards added by the rulers of the Church, in oppoſition to hereſies, as they appeared and ſprung up. He ſhews in what ſenſe the Apoſtles are ſaid to be the authors of one part, and the ſucceeding governors of the Church authors of the other. That the meaning of the Creed is to be fetched from the writings of the Fathers. That the Creed was firſt conſtantly read in the Eaſtern Church about five hundred years after Chriſt, and in the Weſtern near ſix hundred. That the Creed then read was the Nicene, into whoſe room afterwards came the Apoſtles. The contents of the ſecond Chapter are as follow. The reaſon for which it is ſaid in the ſingular number, I believe; the meaning of the word believe. By believing in God we aſſent to his exiſtence and unity. The Greek and antient Latin Creeds read, I believe in ONE God, which was deſigned againſt ſome blaſphemous deniers of the Divine Unity, who, negatively, were not the Jews, ſince they owned it; nor the heathens principally, ſeeing the greater, or at leaſt the wiſer part of them acknowledged it; but poſitively, they were certain antient heretics; in oppoſition to whom this clauſe of ONE God is to be conſidered, either abſolutely or relatively. Abſolutely it ſignifies, that there is but ONE God. The Valentinians, Cerdonians, Marcionites, and others, introduced ſeveral Gods. The authors of this hereſy lived in the Apoſtles time. Againſt it the Creed declares, that we muſt believe in ONE God; which being underſtood relatively, or as it hath reference to what immediately follows in the Creed, ſignifies that ONE and the ſame God is the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and Earth, in contradiction to ſeveral heretics, who maintained opinions contrary thereunto. The title, FA-and Mr. Peter Coſte, who ſent an abſtract of it in French to Monſieur Bernard, who publiſhed it in his Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres for November and December 1702, tells us (a), that a learned Engliſh Biſhop, who had begun to read it with a diſadvantageous prejudice, imagining, that it would prove only a wretched rhapſody out of

THER, denotes God to be the origin of all beings, in contradiction to the Gnoſtics and others, who being worſe than the heathens diſowned him to be ſuch, and refuſed to give him the appellation of FATHER, (which is here briefly explained), but attributed it to another being different from him. Or it denotes the peculiar relation of the Father unto the Son, in which ſenſe it hath been alſo underſtood in the Creed, which is the primary ſenſe thereof, wherein it hath been in the Creed from the foundation of Chriſtianity. The word ALMIGHTY hath a threefold ſignification in the Creed. Firſt, it denotes God's infinite power, which ſhews the reaſon why it is placed before the making of heaven and earth. In this ſenſe it was intended againſt the Valentinians, Simonians, Menandrians, &c. whoſe hereſies are explained. Secondly, it implies God's providential government of the world, in oppoſition to the denial thereof by the Gnoſtics and Marcionites; the former of whom at leaſt aſcribed this word ALMIGHTY, thus underſtood, to another being, different from the ſupreme and only God. Thirdly, it includes God's immenſity and omnipreſence, in contradiction to the error of the Gnoſtics, which confined God within a certain limited ſpace. What is to be underſtood by MAKER, and what by HEAVEN and EARTH. The blaſphemous tenets of ſeveral Heretics about the creation of the world. Simon Magus and ſeveral others attributed the making thereof to angels. The portentous ſyſtem of the Valentinians concerning the origin of Beings, and the creation of the Univerſe. The Cerdonians and Marcionites maintained two Eternal Principles, God and the Devil; the latter of whom they affirmed to have been the Former and Maker of the world. Againſt all theſe Heretics it was inſerted in the Creed, that the Supreme God, the Father Almighty is Maker of Heaven and Earth. The contents of the third chapter are as follow. The Nicene and more antient Greek Creeds read in ONE Jeſus Chriſt, which was a deſigned oppoſition to the blaſphemous diviſion of Jeſus from Chriſt by the Gnoſtics and others, whoſe ſeveral Hereſies are related. By believing in Jeſus Chriſt we profeſs, that there was ſuch a man as was known by the name of Jeſus of Nazareth, which word Jeſus was an uſual name among the Jews; and that this Jeſus was the Chriſt or the Meſſias, which was conſtantly a part of the Creed from the very beginning of the Goſpel, it being the foundation of all Chriſtianity, and that which was moſt violently aſſaulted by the Jews. The word Chriſt ſignifies Anointed, unction being uſed among the Jews on ſeveral occaſions; in alluſion whereunto Jeſus is called Chriſt from his conſecration to his triple office of Prophet, Prieſt, and King. His unction is to be underſtood in a ſpiritual ſenſe; God the Father was the anointer, and the Holy Ghoſt the oil, which was poured upon his human nature at his conception and baptiſm. His only Son, wherein are two things contained; firſt, that he is the Son of the Father; his Son, which was foretold by the Prophets; whence Meſſias and the Son of God were convertible terms amongſt the Jews, at the time of our Saviour's appearance. Chriſt was the ſon of God in ſeveral reſpects; but in one way peculiarly ſo, which is the ſecond thing in this clauſe, that he is his only Son. The Scriptures affirm, that God had one Son in a peculiar manner, which is expreſſed in the Greek Creeds to be by generation; which was perhaps oppoſed to the Valentinian emiſſion or diviſion from the Father. Caution is to be uſed in the ſearching into this myſtery. Chriſt is ſaid in the Greek Creeds to be the Μονογενὴς, or the only begotten, in contradiction to the Gnoſtics and others. This article was coeval with Chriſtianity, and denotes Chriſt's divine nature. The title Lord denotes the dominion of Chriſt, who is Lord by way of eminency, being ſupreme Lord over all, and particularly the Chriſtian's Lord, our Lord. There are two oppoſite parties in the Univerſe, the one under Chriſt, the other under the Devil, who have each their ſeparate Kingdoms. The Devil's intereſt among ſpirits is unknown to us; but amongſt mankind he very much prevailed, inſomuch that in ſeveral places he was worſhipped as God; but when Chriſt came, he deſtroyed the Devil's Kingdom, which was but an uſurped one, and erected his own Kingdom, the admiſſion whereinto was at baptiſm, when the baptized perſon not only acknowledged Chriſt's Lordſhip, but alſo expreſly renounced the Devil's power. This article was coeval with Chriſtianity, and denotes a ſubmiſſion to Chriſt as our Lord, in oppoſition to the Devil. In the next place, the Creed declares Chriſt's humanity, and the neceſſity of his being man. His incarnation was blaſphemed and denied in ſundry ways and manners by various Heretics; againſt whom was levelled whatſoever is mentioned in the Creed from our Saviour's Conception to his Reſurrection. The Conception and Nativity are in moſt Creeds joined together in one ſentence. Ebion, Cerinthus and others affirmed Chriſt to have been a man, conceived and born in the ordinary way of generation; againſt whom it is declared, that he was conceived by the Holy Ghoſt, and born of ſuch a woman as was a Virgin. Several Heretics, whoſe names are mentioned, denied, that Chriſt aſſumed a material Body from the ſubſtance of his mother; but held, that his Body was framed in heaven, and paſſed through the Virgin Mary as water through a pipe. Their reaſon for this Hereſy is repreſented; which Hereſy is emphatically condemned by this expreſſion ἐκ Μαρίας, or of Mary. The ſtrange notion of the Apelleians concerning the making of our Saviour's Body; againſt whom, with the precedent Heretics, the Creed directs us to believe, by his being born of the Virgin Mary, that he took from her fleſh the real ſubſtance of his Body. The Birth of Chriſt employed alſo in conjunction with his Paſſion, Crucifixion, Death, and Burial, to denote the Reality of his Body. Theſe laſt four were not all found in one and the ſame Creed till St. Auguſtin's days. The monſtrous conſequences of an imaginary and fantaſtical Incarnation, which was maintained by a prodigious variety of Heretics from the Days of St. John, as by the Simonians, Menandrians, &c. againſt whom was inſerted in the Creed the Birth of Chriſt and his Sufferings; which latter point was ſo convincing a proof, that to prevent any cavils, as if it were a doubtful and uncertain thing, the time thereof is declared to have been under Pontius Pilate, who was Procurator of Judea in the reign of the Emperor Tiberius. To condemn alſo the forementioned Hereſies, the Crucifixion of our Saviour follows, that it was not Simon of Cyrene, as the Baſilideans affirmed, but he himſelf who was crucified; and likewiſe his Death, which is mentioned, becauſe the certainty thereof is the foundation of the Goſpel. By Death is meant the ſeparation of ſoul and body; after which, for the ſame intent, follows that diſpoſal of his dead body, viz. that it was buried or laid in the grave. The fourth Chapter contains the following particulars. The Deſcent of our Saviour into Hell was never queſtioned by any differences in the explication thereof. The Moderation of the Church of England herein. This article relates, firſt, ſomething done by Chriſt's Soul, which excludes the Burial of his Body from being deſigned thereby; and, ſecondly, ſomething done by his Soul in its ſeparate ſtate, excluſive of the ſufferings thereof, whilſt he was alive. No exact agreement in the notions of the Primitive Writers about this point. The explication of the word Hell or Hades, as it is in Greek. No one word in the modern Engliſh, French, or Dutch, comprehenſive of the full ſignification thereof. Hell in old Engliſh exactly anſwers to the Greek Hades, which properly ſignifies the habitation or receptacle of all ſeparated human ſouls, whether good or bad. The Pagans, from whom the propriety of any Greek or Latin word is to be fetched, underſtood it in this ſenſe. The modern, or at leaſt the antient Jews placed all ſeparated ſouls in Hell. The Primitive Chriſtians affirmed, that all good ſouls, immediately after their ſeparation from the body, of ſeveral diſcourſes on that ſubject printed in Engliſh, and eſpecially of Biſhop Pearſon's Expoſition of the Creed, who ſeemed to have exhauſted that matter, was ſurprized to find in this Hiſtory ſo many curious things not to be met with in Dr. Pearſon, without finding any body, paſſed into a place of joy and happineſs, which they termed Hell, as is at large proved. In the declenſion of the Greek, and chiefly of the Latin tongue the word Hell began to be ſolitarily applied to the manſion of departed wicked ſouls. Origen, amongſt the Greeks, doubted of the paſſage of faithful ſouls into Hell ſince the Reſurrection of Chriſt. But after him the antient doctrine that all ſouls go to Hell, and remain there till the Reſurrection-Day, generally prevailed in the Eaſt to this very day. Ambroſe, and after him Jerom, and others entertained the ſame notion in the Weſt, as Origen had in the Eaſt. Auguſtin was uncertain and wavering in his apprehenſions hereof. The receſſion from the antient opinion occaſioned by the mutation of Languages and words. The word Hell in the Apoſtolical ſenſe could not, according to the propriety of ſpeech, ſignify any other thing than the ſtate or place of ſeparated human ſouls whether good or bad. The meaning of the word deſcended; it ſometimes only ſignifies a ſimple removal from one place to another. It is uſed in the Creed, becauſe it was a popular kind of ſpeech ariſing from the common opinion, that Hell was in the bowels of the earth, or under the earth; from whence it was called by the Latins Infernum, and by the Greeks Hades, and the like. Some of the Fathers imagined Hell to be in the heart of the earth; others under the earth; and ſome were uncertain of the ſituation thereof, but all apprehended it to be the common lodge of departed ſouls, and in a conformity to the common dialect, uſually termed the paſſage thither a Deſcent into Hell, as in this article of the Creed; by which they meant no other than that our Saviour's Soul being ſeparated from the Body went by a local motion to the unſeen habitation of departed ſouls, where it remained till his Reſurrection-Day: which is farther proved from the ends of his going thither, which were chiefly theſe four. Firſt, to ſanctify unto his followers the ſtate and place of their ſouls, during their ſeparation from their bodies. Secondly, that he might undergo a neceſſary and principal part of his humiliation. Thirdly, that he might perſonally, and as the Head of his Church, conquer Death and Hell, which he did by returning therefrom, and bringing the ſouls of ſeveral of the faithful with him. Fourthly, that he might ſubject himſelf unto the laws of Death, and be in every thing like unto us. From whence it more evidently appears, that the Deſcent of Chriſt into Hell ſignifies no other than the paſſage of his ſpirit unto the receptacle of ſeparated ſouls. The occaſion of inſerting this clauſe in the Creed taken from the Arians, Eunomians, and Apollinarians, who in a more cunning way than the former Heretics aſſaulted the humanity of our Saviour, by denying, that he had a reaſonable ſoul. The difference between the error of the Arians and Apollinarians herein: it is proved, that the Arians, or at leaſt ſome of them, with the Eunomians, held, that Chriſt's Body was void of a rational ſoul. But that, which rendered this hereſy the more conſiderable and dangerous, was the eſpouſing of it by Apollinarius the Younger, the moſt noted perſon of his age for ability and piety; on which account his fall was a very tender and ſenſible loſs to the Church. The time when he vented his hereſy, which was, that Chriſt had no human ſoul, but that his Divinity ſupplied the place hereof; the conſequences of which opinion are inſtanced in ſeveral particulars. In oppoſition whereunto this clauſe was inſerted in the Creed, he deſcended into Hell; which point was pitched upon by the Governors of the Church, becauſe, of all the arguments uſed againſt the Apollinariſts, it was the moſt unanſwerable; on which account it is frequently urged by the Fathers againſt them, and it falls in moſt naturally with the frame of the Creed, without diſturbing the order thereof. The time of the introduction of this article. The firſt Catholic Creed, wherein it is found, is in that of Aquileia, recorded by Ruffinus, though before that in a private Creed of Epiphanius, and even before him in a Creed framed by a party of Arians at the Council of Ariminum, held in the year 359. Several probable deſigns of thoſe Arians herein, as to clear themſelves from the ſuſpicion of the forementioned hereſy, to diſgrace their great antagoniſt Apollinarius, and by that means to create feuds and quarrels amongſt the Orthodox, who finding Apollinarius openly to declare for his hereſy, entirely abandoned him, condemned him in ſeveral Synods, and at length, according to the example of the Arians, inſerted in the Creed this antidote againſt his hereſy, that Chriſt deſcended into hell; which in the Aquileian Creed is expreſſed in a greater latitude by deſcending into the lower parts, wherein the burial might be comprehended and deſigned. But as it is expreſſed in the Roman or our preſent Creed, it can have no other than the forementioned ſignification, which, to prevent miſtakes, is again repeated. The contents of the Fifth Chapter are as follow. The Reſurrection of Chriſt being a neceſſary fundamental of our Religion, was always part of the Creed, by which our belief is declared, that Chriſt roſe from the dead, and returned to life again. The farther conſideration whereof is referred to the article of the reſurrection of the body. The reaſon for which our Lord's reſurrection is ſaid to be in, and not after the third day. The Aſcenſion of our Saviour was introduced againſt an opinion of the Apelleians, viz. that at his aſcenſion, his body was reſolved into its firſt principles, and aſcended not up on high, or into heaven; the nomination of which place might probably have been deſigned in contradiction to a conceit of Hermogenes, that his body went into the body of the Sun. Sitting at the right hand of God the Father explained; by which we muſt not imagine Chriſt confined to that ſingular poſture, but it ſignifies his advancement to the full exerciſe of his regal office; all things being ſubjected unto him by the Father, who was infinitely able to do it, ſeeing he is Almighty; which word in the Greek is different from that uſed in the beginning of the Creed, and in this place denotes the irreſiſtibleneſs and efficacy of God's power. This clauſe is firſt found in the Creed of Tertullian, and was inſerted, either as a continued proof with the Aſcenſion, that our Lord's body was not diſſolved a little after his reſurrection, or, rather was deſigned againſt ſome heretics, who imagined the body of Chriſt to be in a ſtupid and unconcerned poſture in heaven, and not to be ſate down at his Father's right hand, exerciſing all power and authority for the good of his Church. A brief explication of From thence he ſhall come to judge the Quick and the Dead. Three interpretations of the Quick and the Dead. The laſt moſt natural, that by the Quick are meant thoſe, who ſhall be alive at the coming of our Lord; and by the Dead, thoſe who ſhall then be actually void of life. This article was deſigned againſt the Marcionites and Gnoſtics, of whom the one blaſphemed the final Judge, the other the Judgment. Marcion with his maſter Cerdon, held, that the true God, and his Son Chriſt Jeſus were all mercy and love, and would never judge the world; which opinion opened a flood-gate to all impiety; in oppoſition whereunto the Creed declares, that he ſhall come to judge. The word judging explained; it ſuppoſeth a liberty and freedom of action in the perſon judged; both which were denied by the Gnoſtics, as by the Valentinians, Baſilidians, Carpocratians, and others, who all ſprung from Simon Magus, and united in theſe two hereſies, that man was fatally neceſſitated to all his actions, and that he ſhould not be judged according to his works, but according to his ſpiritual ſeed, election, and the like, which tenets were attended with moſt abominable conſequences; and therefore againſt them both it was inſerted in the Creed, that Chriſt ſhall come to judge the Quick and the Dead. Wherein, firſt, the liberty of man was acknowledged; which is farther evident from this, that the word Αυτεξουσιον, or that man hath a power over himſelf, was in ſeveral of the antient Creeds part of this article: the Fathers could not imagine a juſt judgment without ſuppoſing a freedom of the perſon judged. Secondly, it is farther declared by this clauſe, that men ſhall be judged according to their works; for which reaſon, while the hereſy of the Gnoſtics raged, it was expreſſed with a ſuitable periphraſis, to prevent any equivocating evaſions. A any thing it borrowed from that writer's Expoſition. Mr. Coſte obſerves (b), that the whole Treatiſe is written in ſo accurate and maſterly a manner, that whoever ſhould tranſlate it into Latin would do a great ſervice to thoſe learned men, who do not underſtand Engliſh. July the 27th 1708, upon the death of Sir Salathiel Lovel, he was choſen Recorder of the City of London, and September the 12th following was knighted by Queen Anne. In 1710 he was one of the Managers of the Houſe of Commons at the trial of Dr. Sacheverel. October the 26th 1714 he was appointed Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas; and April the 5th following he was made one of the Privy Council. May the 25th 1725 he was created a Peer of England by the title of Lord King, Baron of Ockham in Surrey; and June the 1ſt following was appointed Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain; in which poſt he continued till November the 29th 1733, when he reſigned the Seals, which were given to Charles Talbot Eſq; afterwards Lord Talbot. Some time before his death he was troubled with a paralytic diſorder; and July the 22d 1734, at eight in the evening, he died at Ockham in Surrey, having been taken ſpeechleſs about noon that day; and was interred at Ockham. He married Anne, daughter of Evan Seys of Boverton in Glamorganſhire Eſq; by whom he had iſſue four ſons. John, Peter, William, and Thomas, and two daughters, Elizabeth and Anne. John, his eldeſt ſon, and heir to his titles and eſtate, was, during his father's life, Member of Parliament for Launceſton in Cornwal, and in May 1726 married Elizabeth daughter of Robert Fry of Yeurty in Devonſhire Eſq; which Lady died January the 28th 173$\frac{3}{4}$ in the 23d year of her age, leaving no iſſue. There are ſome Letters between the Lord King and Mr. Edmund Elys written in 1692 upon the ſubject of the Enquiry into the Conſtitution, printed in the Letters on ſeveral Subjects, publiſhed by Mr. Elys at London 1694 in 8vo.

brief repetition of the true intended ſenſe of this article. The contents of the ſixth Chapter are as follow. I believe in the Holy Ghoſt: why the word believe is again repeated. This article was always part of the Creed. Why ſo little is ſaid of the Holy Ghoſt, when ſo much is ſaid of the Father and of the Son. His Divinity intended by the Creed's requiring us to believe in him; whereas we are only required ſimply to believe the enſuing articles as in particular the Holy Catholic Church, which is next of all conſidered. In the Greek, wherein they are followed by the modern French and Dutch, the word believe is again repeated before the article of the Church, which, for different ends, was variouſly placed in the primitive Creeds. Its uſual order after the Holy Ghoſt. This article juſt mentioned by Tertullian. The moſt antient Creeds read only the Holy Church; the term Catholic being added by the Greeks to be an explication or determination thereof. By the Church is to be underſtood the univerſal one, which is affirmed to be one Holy, and Catholic. That the Unity of the Church was here intended, appears from that the Greek Creeds read in one holy Catholic Church. The Church univerſal is to be conſidered as one, either as to faith or charity; in which ſenſe it was, for ſeveral reaſons which are mentioned, inſerted in the Creed in oppoſition to Heretics and Schiſmatics. The Church termed Holy from the purity and holineſs of her Doctrine, which is aſſented to thereby. The affection Catholic, which ſignifies univerſal, not always in the Creed; firſt introduced by the Greeks, to prevent narrow and limited conceptions of the Church. A brief repetition of what is aſſented to, when we repeat this article, the Holy Catholic Church. Whereunto is added as an appendix, the Communion of Saints; which was introduced about St. Auguſtin's time, in oppoſition to the Donatiſts. By Saints are to be underſtood particular Churches and the members thereof. For what reaſon they were called Saints. By Communion is ſignified the mutual ſociety and fellowſhip of particular Churches and their members. Various Methods uſed by the antients to maintain their communion. The Donatiſts refuſed communion with other Churches; and for that Schiſm were juſtly condemned and rejected by them. In oppoſition unto whom, this article may be conſidered, either as a mark to know a true particular Church by, that ſhe is one that is acknowledged ſo to be by other Churches; or rather as the quality, property, and practice of ſuch an one to hold communion with other particular Churches; in which ſenſe it is alſo added as an explanation of the Holy Catholic Church, and was intended to declare, that there ought to be a due communion and fellowſhip between the particular Churches and members of the Catholic and univerſal one. The contents of the ſeventh and laſt chapter are as follow. A brief explication of the forgiveneſs of Sins; not conſtantly repeated in the Creed till the days of Cyprian, though ſometimes expreſſed, and always ſuppoſed from the very beginning of Chriſtianity. Two Interpretations are given hereof, a primary, and a ſecondary one. To have a clear idea of the primary one, which reſpects ſins committed before Baptiſm, it will be neceſſary to reflect on the great wickedneſs of the world before the publication of the Goſpel; by means whereof they were under guilt, which the Heathens knew by the light of nature, but could not tell how to remove it. The Jews had no univerſal aſſurance of the pardon of ſins; wherefore the Apoſtles were ſent forth to reveal an infallible way for the obtaining it, viz. by believing and being baptized. This is proved to be the primary ſenſe of this article, always ſuppoſed, or elſe expreſſed in the creed, from the very firſt preaching of the Goſpel, viz. that all paſt ſins are for the ſake of Chriſt remitted to all penitential believers at baptiſm: wherein theſe two things are contained; firſt, that our ſins are forgiven for the ſake of Chriſt: ſecondly, that the time of their forgiveneſs is at Baptiſm. Remiſſion of ſins aſcribed to baptiſm, which is always to be underſtood with due regard to the qualifications of the perſons baptiſed. Why ſins are ſaid to be forgiven at baptiſm. The ſecondary ſenſe of this article reſpected ſins committed after baptiſm. The rigorous notions of the Baſilidians, Montaniſts, but eſpecially of the Novatians, who denied the pardon of God, or at leaſt of the Church, to ſcandalous ſins perpetrated after baptiſm. The wretched conſequences of this opinion, as an antidote againſt which this clauſe was conſtantly recited in the creed. Both the ſenſes of this article repeated. The reſurrection of the body is in ſome creeds the laſt article, and may be conſidered in conjunction with the reſurrection of our Saviour. The reſurrection from the dead being a neceſſary point of our religion, and withal being early oppoſed both by heathens and heretics, it hath always been a part of the creed from the Apoſtles days. In the Greek and Latin creeds, as alſo in the modern French and Dutch, it is the reſurrection of the fleſh. Several hereticks would equivocatingly aſſent to the reſurrection of the body, who denied that the ſame fleſhly ſubſtance ſhould ariſe again. Againſt them it was emphatically inſerted in the creed, that there ſhould be the reſurrection of the fleſh; that is, that the very ſame fleſhy and material Body ſhould riſe again, though the qualities thereof ſhall be changed and altered. Life everlaſting differently placed in the antient creeds, pertinently put at the end of the Apoſtles, becauſe it is the end of our faith, as the determination of every man to his proper place. The Gnoſtics affirmed, that the greateſt part of Mankind ſhould be annihilated at the day of judgment; againſt whom it is declared by this article, that after that there ſhall be Life everlaſting; wherein are included the eternal miſery of the damned, and the everlaſting happineſs of the bleſſed. KIRCHER (JOHN), a native of Tubingen in the Dutchy of Wirtemberg, ſtudied with great ſucceſs in the Univerſity of his own country, and gave very great hopes; but but having choſen another kind of life, and not ſeeing any probability of a good ſettlement, left the Religion for that of Rome, and went into Hungary (a). This was about the year 1640. He publiſhed according to cuſtom the motives of his change. Several anſwers were made to them [A]. I cannot purſue my account of him any further, and I ſhould be very blameable not to own it, ſince the learned Mr. Baillet has made no ſcruple to acknowledge, that he knew nothing of the adventures of this perſon [B].

[A] He publiſhed .... the motives of his change. Several anſwers were made to them.] The book which he publiſhed, is intitled, Ætiologia, in quâ migrationis ſuæ ex Lutheranâ Synagogâ in Eccleſiam Catholicam veras & ſolidas rationes ſuccinctè exponit & perſpicuè, doctisque omnibus & judicandi dexteritate pollentibus ritè, accuratè & modeſtè conſiderandas proponit. It was printed at Vienna in Auſtria in 1640, and dedicated to Emeric Loſi Archbiſhop of Strigonia. This work turns upon theſe two points; one, that it is our duty to abandon the Lutheran Religion, ſince we cannot find in it an infallible authority to direct us to judge what we ought to believe, the other, that we ought to embrace the Roman Catholic Religion, ſince we find in it ſuch an authority (1). Several anſwers to him appeared. Conſult Mr. Baillet (2), who will inform you, that John Conrade Schragmuller publiſhed in German an Anti-Kircher in 1654, and that Abraham Calovius publiſhed an Examen Anti-Kircherianum at Konigsberg in Pruſſia in 1643. He does not ſpeak there (3) of the work of John George Dorſcheus Profeſſor of Divinity at Strasburg, though one might conſider it as an Anti-Kircher. The title of it is as follows: M. I. Kircherus devius; ſive Hodegeticus Catholicus, quo oſtenditur M. Johannem Kircherum Tubinga Wittembergicum migrationi ſuæ ex ſynagogâ, quam vocat, Lutheranâ in Eccleſiam Catholicam inſtitutione iviſſe, non qua eundum eſt ſed qua itur. It was printed at Strasburg in 1641 in 12mo and contains two parts, intitled at the top of the pages, the 1ſt, Hodeget. Cathol. Antikirch. prælim. the 2d. Hodeget. Cathol. Antikirch. Dorſcheus maintains the perſpicuity of the Scriptures, which is the foundation of the proteſtant faith; and he ſhews on the other hand, that neither the councils nor deciſions of Popes can be a good foundation of certainty. Above half the book conſiſts of quotations, eſpecially in thoſe places where he examines the complaints of Kircher, that the proteſtants impute to the Catholic Religion all the impertinences of particular authors. This book of Dorſcheus was confuted by a German Jeſuit named Henry Wangnereck, who publiſhed an Anti-Dorſcheus in 1653, and who in his turn was confuted by an Anti-Wangnereck, which Balthaſar Bebelius (4) publiſhed in the form of Theological Theſes in 1682.

[B] Mr. Baillet has made no ſcruple to acknowledge that he knew nothing of the adventures of this perſon.] As there is a good deal of wit in his confeſſion, I ſhall report at large what he ſays (5). "You would not have "any ground to reproach me with this, if I could "have diſcovered the regiſter of his baptiſm or burial. "Of the four German Kirchers, whom I know to "have been authors, and of whom two were Jeſuits, "our Kircher, whoſe name was John, is he, of whoſe "life and employments I have the leaſt information. "I believe that if he had died a Lutheran, Henning "Witten would have done him the honour to have "placed him in his memoirs with ſo many others, "who did not deſerve it more than he. Another of "his brethren would have made a funeral oration, or "Hiſtorical Elogium upon him. It might have hap"pened likewiſe, that if Kircher, upon his abando"ning the Lutheran Religion for that of Rome, had "become a Monk in ſome Monaſtery, ſome Bibliothe"que Writer or other curious perſon of his order, "would have taken care to have collected an account of "his life and writings, and placed him among the "illuſtrious men of the order, which he might have "embraced. But I have too good an opinion of your "memory to repeat to you what I have ſaid in the "article of Anti-Cochleus upon this ſubject, when "you were ſolicitous to know why the proteſtant wri"ters are generally better known to us than the Ca"tholic writers, and why among the latter the Monks "of whatever order are commonly better known than "the other Catholics."

(6) That is, of not having ſaid any thing of the life or death of Kircher.

KIRCHMAN (JOHN), who gained a reputation by his works, was born at Lubeck January the 18th 1575. He ſtudied in his native place till he was eighteen years old, when he went to Frankfort on the Oder, where he continued four years, hearing diligently his Profeſſor's Lectures, and being very averſe to all the diverſions and debaucheries, in which moſt of the ſcholars uſe to loſe their time [A]. He ſtudied afterwards in the Univerſity of Jena, and then in that of Straſburg. He had a great mind to travel, but as he was not rich enough to bear the expences of it, he was obliged to reſtrain his deſire. But it was not long before he could gratify his inclination; for a Burgomaſter of Luneburg choſe him to accompany his ſon into France and Italy: he returned into Germany in the year 1602, and ſtopping at Roſtock he gave there ſuch proofs of his learning, that the next year he was appointed Profeſſor of Poetry. The work which he publiſhed in the year 1604 on the burials of the ancient Romans, de Funeribus Romanorum, gained him the reputation of a very learned man, and was perhaps alſo the occaſion of his meeting with a very good match as ſoon as he wiſhed. For he deſired

[A] He was very averſe to all the diverſions and debaucheries, in which moſt of the Scholars uſe to loſe their time.] It is a queſtion, which has been controverted for ſeveral ages, whether it be better to have one's children ſtudy at home, or to ſend them to the Univerſity (1). There are arguments pro and con. But the moſt plauſible argument that can be urged againſt ſending them to the Univerſity, is that they are in imminent danger there of being debauched. Studious Scholars are very ſcarce. But the number of thoſe who either by their bad example, or by their ſollicitations, or even by their railleries bring others to a diſſolute life, is very large. Here follows what is ſaid of Kirchman, and of moſt of his fellow-ſtudents. Ibidem per quadriennium fere ſubſtitit; non cibos & potiones tantum percolando, non Charadrii vitam agendo, non ludicris aliorum exagitationibus aut laſcivis Gynæcei luſtrationibus ſe oblectando, non ſcurrilibus Lurcomum nugis optimum juventutis florem corrumpendo, quibus egregiis, ſcilicet! exercitiis, deplorato & exulcerato hoc ſæculo, maxima (2), proh dolor! Academicorum pars dedita eſt; ſed lectiones & diſputationes publicas diligenter viſitando, cum viris doctis familiariter converſando, & indiu noctuque bonis literis, quibus animam totam applicuerat, ſtrenue incumbendo (3). i. e. "He ſpent almoſt four "years there, not indeed in minding only eating and "drinking, and living like a glutton; not in taking "a delight in the trifling exerciſes which the others "performed, or in frequenting the Ladies of pleaſure; "not in corrupting the flower of his youth; in which fine "exerciſes the greateſt part, alas! of the ſtudents in"dulge themſelves in this deſperate and corrupted "age; but in frequenting the public lectures and diſ"putations, in converſing familiarly with learned men, "in applying himſelf carefully day and night to the "ſtudy of literature, for which he had a ſtrong in"clination."

fired as much to encreaſe the number of the inhabitants of this world [B] as the number of books. It was a particular happineſs for him to meet with a wife the ſame year he ſet up for an author; eſpecially ſince the wife he met with made him compaſs his deſign, for he got a great many children by her, and beſides, they lived together in great union and friendſhip [C]. As he was looked upon as a man who gave youth a very good education, and who would not ſuffer his boarders to be diſſolute at his houſe [D], he had a great many ſcholars ſent to him from the other cities in Germany. Laſtly, when the Magiſtrates of Lubeck found that their college wanted a new Rector or Principal, they deſired him to take that employment upon him. One of the reaſons that made him accept it was, that he feared leſt it had been a ſin in him not to accept of ſo lawful a calling as this was [E]. He was inſtalled in that office in the year 1613, and performed

[B] He deſired to increaſe the number of the inhabitants of this world.] It is neceſſary on this occaſion more than on any other to tranſcribe the very words of my author. They are as follow. Quemadmodum prole animi bonas litteras promovere ſtuduit Kirchmannus, ita etiam prole corporis humanum genus augere apud ſe conſtituit. Quamobrem eodem anno, quo Funera Romanorum publici juris fecit, iiſque nominis ſui Funera plane exterminavit, vitæ ſociam ſibi elegit Virginem caſtiſſimam & pudiciſſimam Emerentiam, Joachimi Schellii, Senatorii Roſtochienſis prudentiſſimi, filiam (4). i. e. "As he endeavoured to improve literature by the "offspring of his mind, ſo he deſigned to encreaſe "mankind by the offspring of his body: wherefore, "the ſame year in which he had publiſhed the Funerals of the antient Romans, by which he prevented "his name from being for ever buried in oblivion, "he choſe for his partner a moſt chaſte and modeſt "virgin, namely Emerentia, the daughter of Joachim "Schellius, a very wiſe Senator of Roſtock." Here was a public-ſpirited man indeed. He did not confine his zeal for the public to the Republic of Letters only, he would alſo promote the advantage of the ſtate by begetting children. He conſecrated both his mind and his body to the happineſs of mankind. The learned Helena Piſcopia Cornara was not of the ſame character with him. For in order to ſhew that ſhe followed the ſteps of Minerva the Goddeſs of Learning, who always kept her maidenhead, ſhe would be aggregated to the Academy degli infecundi, i. e. "of "the unfruitful." But on the other hand the moſt learned Tiraqueau was an example to our Kirchman, for it is ſaid that he uſed to write a book and to beget a child every year. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (5) with regard to Mademoiſelle le Fevre. Here follows a paſſage which proves that our Kirchman was not diſappointed in his hopes. Quoniam vero præcipuus conjugii ſcopus quo Kirchmannus collimavit eſt procreatio librorum . . . etiam hunc ſcopum attigit, & conjugium ex benedictione divina uti jucundum ita & fæcundum habuit. Ex uxore quippe ſuaviſſima, prob dolor! vidua mæſtiſſima, quinque liberos ſuſcepit, filios tres, & filias duas (6). i. e. "As the chief deſign "for which Kirchman married was to have children, "he was not diſappointed; for as by God's bleſſing "his marriage was very agreeable to him, ſo it proved "alſo fruitful. He had by his moſt beloved wife, now, "alas! a moſt afflicted widow; five children, three ſons "and two daughters."

[C] They lived together in great union and friendſhip.] It is aſſerted in his funeral oration, that they never wanted to be reconciled together during the thirty ſeven years their marriage laſted. Quod conjugium felicibus auſpiciis cæptum felici etiam ſucceſſu non caruit. Tanto enim amore hi conjuges ſe mutuo ſunt complexi, tanta concordia ſeptem & triginta annos tranſegerunt, ut nunquam in gratiam redire, aut ad aram bonæ Deæ litare neceſſe ipſis fuerit (7). i. e. "This marriage "auſpiciouſly begun had alſo a very happy ſucceſs: "for this couple loved each other ſo well, and lived "thirty ſix years in ſo great an union, that they never "wanted to be reconciled together, nor to offer any "ſacrifice to Fauna or the Good Goddeſs." Pomponius Atticus had the ſame happineſs with his mother (8), but not with his wife. The author of the funeral oration pretends, that this conjugal concord of our Kirchman with his wife was owing to their being both ſenſible that ſuch an union is acceptable both to God, and to men: and that the inconveniences of wedlock, which in their own nature are conſiderable enough, ought not to be aggravated by troubleſome quarrels, but rather ſoftened and made eaſy, by a ſweet temper and complaiſant behaviour of man and wife towards each other. Nimirum uterque ipſorum probe intellexit, Deo hominibuſque gratum, ſi bene inter maritum & uxorem conveniat, nec conjugii moleſtias, alias ſat graves, odioſis rixis & acerbis concertationibus cumulandas, ſed ſuaviſſima potius oblectatione, & jucundiſſima converſatione leniendas eſſe (9). Whereupon he breaks out with this pathetical wiſh: Oh that all married perſons, ſays he (10), who do not live well together, would ſeriouſly reflect upon that important truth. I do not believe that this author hit the true cauſe. There is hardly a perſon but knows that important truth. Even in thoſe families, where diſcord rages with the greateſt fury, men are convinced of it; but they do not act from that perſuaſion; nay, I imagine that they chooſe to quarrel, becauſe it is leſs troubleſome to them. They would be much more tormented and inwardly racked by a ſad antipathy, if they were not to vent their grief by a thouſand complaints and by a thouſand quarrels. Scolding is like tears (11), it eaſes the grief that oppreſſes us.

Kirchman did not regulate his conduct by ſuch an apprehenſion. Non enim Bacchanalia cum convictoribus ſuis Kirchmannus vivebat, non Scyphos ad ordinem evacuabat; non ad menſuras ſine menſura vivebat, non noctem Baccho ut pervigilem ducerent domeſticis ſuis permittebat, quemadmodum nunc nonnullos in Academicis Profeſſores, & juventutis Cenſores, egregios ſcilicet! facere audimus; ſed ita in omnibus ſe gerebat, ut ſtudiis mores convenienter irent; ipſiuſque domeſtici, adeoque omnes literis humanioribus addicti vivum haberent exemplum, ad quod vitam, mores, & res ſuas omnes examuſſim componerent (12). i. e. But he behaved himſelf ſo in every "thing as to make his morals anſwer the dignity of "his ſtudies. I think that he was too ſcrupulous; his calling was not like Abraham's; he might have refuſed it without fearing to provoke God's wrath.

KIRSTENIUS (PETER) Profeſſor of Phyſic at Upſal, and Phyſician Extraordinary to the Queen of Sweden, was born at Breſlaw, in Sileſia, December the 25th 1577. He learnt the Greek and Latin tongues, a little Hebrew and Syriac, and natural Philoſophy, Anatomy, and Botany in his native place, and went afterwards to viſit the Univerſities of Leipſic, Wittemberg, and Jena; and having made a great progreſs during four years under the Profeſſors of theſe Univerſities, he took a journey into the Low-Countries and into France. He had been told that a man cannot diſtinguiſh himſelf in the practice of Phyſic, unleſs he underſtands Avicenna; he had therefore a ſtrong inclination to learn Arabic, for he knew that the Tranſlation of that Phyſician's works is very indifferent. He applied himſelf then very diligently to the ſtudy of Arabic, but deſigned to read not only Avicenna, but alſo Meſue, Rhaſis, Abenzoar, Abukaſis, and Averroes. He was confirmed in that reſolution by Scaliger and Caſaubon, who judged him proper to make a great progreſs in that language, to the great advantage of the Republick of Letters. Qui cum indolem hominis viderent animum verbis & exemplis addiderunt, ut pertenderet, atque iſtas literas, quæ nondum inter Chriſtianos debitum cultum & nitorem accepiſſent, a barbaris vindicaret, ac liberali manu aſſereret. Iſtud magno fore Republ. literariæ bono, & ſibi ornamento illuſtriori (a). i. e. " Who
" (Scaliger and Caſaubon) obſerving his inclination, encouraged him by their diſcourſes, " and by the inſtances they lay before him, to continue that ſtudy (of Arabic) and to " retrieve from the hands of the Barbarians, that part of polite literature, which had " not yet been cultivated by the Chriſtians as it deſerved: this would be a great ad" vantage to the Republick of Letters, and raiſe his reputation conſiderably." This paſſion did not hinder him from gratifying the inclination he had to travel. He viſited Italy,

Italy, Spain, England [A], and did not return home till after ſeven years. He was admitted Doctor of Phyſic at Baſil at the age of twenty four. Soon after his return into Sileſia, he went to Jena and married there. He was afterwards choſen by the Magiſtrates of Breſlaw to have the direction of their College and of their Schools. A fit of ſickneſs having obliged him to reſign that difficult employment, with which he was alſo very much diſguſted, he applied himſelf entirely to the practice of Phyſic, and to the ſtudy of Arabic; he did even ſtudy chiefly that language [B], and ſhewed that he was born to ſucceed in it. He joined a great piety with the practice of Phyſic [C]. We are not told why he removed into Pruſſia with his whole family; but he had reaſons to be well ſatisfied with this removal, ſince it gave him an opportunity to enter into the family of Chancellor Oxenſtiern, whom he accompanied into Sweden, where they did him the honour to appoint him Profeſſor of Phyſic in the Univerſity of Upſal in the year 1636, and Phyſician to the Queen. He would have acquitted himſelf much better ſtill of the functions of his Profeſſorſhip, had the conſtitution of his body been as ſtrong as his mind was vigorous; but he was very much broken, and he lived only till the 8th of April 1640 (b). He publiſhed ſeveral works [D]. It

(b) See his Funeral Oration delivered by John Loccenius his Collegue, and Law-Profeſſor. Witte has inſerted it in his Memoriæ Medicorum.

[A] He viſited Italy, Spain, England.] This is all that is mentioned of his travels in his funeral oration. There is not a word there of Kirſtenius's journey into Greece and Aſia. His epitaph only acquaints us with this. Neve huic ſatis fuit tot vidiſſe populos Europæ celeberrimos, ni matrem olim artium permearet Græciam, & Alcurani ſedem permigraret Aſiam, vinoſamque per Hungariam reverteret (1). i. e. "It was "not enough for him to have ſeen the moſt celebrated "countries in Europe, he would alſo viſit Greece formerly the mother of all arts and ſciences; and travel over Aſia the ſeat of the Alcoran, and return "through Hungary a country fruitful in wine." Such a journey was proper for his deſign.

(1) Apud Witten, Memoriæ Medicor. pag. 112.

[B] He did even ſtudy chiefly that language.] For he did not only dedicate to that ſtudy all the time he could ſpare from the practice of Phyſic, but he even applied all the money he could ſave from his income to the printing of Arabic books. Quicquid ſucciſivi temporis laborioſæ praxi Medicæ ſuffurari potuit, hoc excolendæ Arabicæ linguæ totum deſtinavit: adeo ut cum linguæ iſthæc, velut cæteræ, ſuperiorum facultatum, ut vocant, & imprimis Medicinæ miniſtra debuiſſet, contra praxis Medica iſti linguæ ſæpe ſerviret: dum quicquid herus inde lucri redundantis abradere potuit, illud Arabicæ typographiæ adornandæ, & monumentis in illa edendis impendit (2). It is obſerved here, that whereas the Arabic as well as all the other languages ought to be ſubſervient to the other higher faculties, as they are called, and eſpecially to Phyſic, Kirſtenius made Phyſic ſerve to improve him in the knowledge of the Arabic tongue. Kirſtenius's Panegyriſt is alſo in the right to obſerve that there are but few inſtances of men who make ſuch an uſe of the money they get. They that have a profitable profeſſion are infinitely more diſpoſed either to buy eſtates, or to put their money out to intereſt, or to treat themſelves delicately, than to lay it out in the printing of books. Raro ſane & laudando exemplo. Quales ſunt hujus ævi mores, pleriquè ſi rem faciant, aut fœnori eam locant, aut fundis emendis, aut gulæ deputant. In publicandis ingenii monumentis ſumptus facere, rem ſterilem eſſe credunt, & quæ nihil heredem juvet (3). To ſpend money in the printing of books is thought an unprofitable action, which is of no advantage to a man's heirs. To the ſhame of literature be it ſaid, moſt of them that pretend to do it, labour to grow rich in land and money.

[C] He joined a great piety with the practice of Phyſick.] This would not be leſs remarkable than his generoſity, if we were to credit the common reports concerning the religion of the Phyſicians: it is aſſerted that Kirſtenius never depended on the efficacy of the remedies, without God's aſſiſtance; and that he made the whole ſucceſs of Phyſic depend on a bleſſing from heaven. Auſpicium ſuorum laborum a pietate Chriſtiana fecit, quam Æſculapius ignorabat. Noſter autem ſenex ſciebat, virtutem herbarum & uſum medendi inutilem eſſe ſine virtute divina; itaque à DEO, cui ſoli eſt poteſtas ſumma in omnia à ſe creata, in ipſam vitam & mortem hominum, Medicinæ felicitatem & ſucceſſum petendum eſſe (6). i. e. "He began all his labours with actions of a Chriſtian piety, with which Æſculapius "was unacquainted. So that the good ſucceſs of Phyſic muſt always be aſked of God, in "whoſe hands alone all things are which he has created, even the life and death of men." It ſeems even to be hinted that he ſeldom undertook to cure a patient, till after he was reconciled to God. Ita ægroti non minus DEO reconciliati curationem aggrediebatur. Ab ægrotis tamen in valetudine adhuc recenti quam ingraveſcente advocari malebat, præſertim in gravibus & acutis morbis (7). i. e. i. e. He was very exact in going to Church, he began and ended the day with reading the Bible, and he had read that holy book ſixteen times over from the beginning to the end. *A Bibliorum Lectione diem ordiens & claudens multoties illa pervolutavit. CONTROVERSIES between the Jeſuits and the other Roman Catholics, about Epiſcopal juriſdiction.

You muſt know then, that Richard Smith Biſhop of Chalcedon being inveſted with the authority of an Ordinary over the Roman Catholics in England in the year 1626, came ſoon after into this iſland. He pretended to extend his juriſdiction over the Jeſuits, and the other Friars. But he met with ſo many difficulties, that he was obliged to deſiſt and to return into France. The Jeſuits had perceived that the preſents which this Prelate received, that he might ſupport the dignity of his character, were not beſtowed upon him by their means: his receiving them from other hands exaſperated them; ſo that they formed a party againſt him with ſo much artifice, that they forced this Biſhop to retire. This was ſoon followed by a terrible paper-war. The firſt that entered the liſt was Dr. Kelliſon Profeſſor at Doway. He wrote a vindication of the Biſhop's authority. Knot, Provincial of the Jeſuits, anſwered him under the name of Nicholas Smith (2). There was ſoon after another work publiſhed upon that ſubject (3), the author of which took the name of Daniel a Jeſu, though his true name was John Floyd. He was a Jeſuit and Profeſſor at St. Omer. The Archbiſhop of Paris cenſured the books of theſe two Jeſuits. The Sorbonne and the General Aſſembly of the French Clergy did the ſame (4). Which was ſo far from ſilencing the Jeſuits, that it engaged them to reprint their books with great commendations annexed to them. They alſo publiſhed a Remonſtrance againſt the Biſhop of Chalcedon, in the name of the Engliſh Roman Catholics. The Secular Clergy publiſhed the ſame year 1631 in England (5) three pamphlets "againſt the Jeſuits, who were ſo far from quitting "the field, ſeeing the great number of their adverſa- "ries, that on the contrary they began again to at- "tack the Doctors of the Sorbonne, and the Clergy "of France, under the fictitious name of Hermannus "Loemelius, the chief author amongſt them being "the Jeſuit Floyd, whom we have mentioned above... "There was alſo another book publiſhed againſt the "Faculty of Paris.. to which were annexed a great ma- "ny approbations of Biſhops, Univerſities, and private "Doctors: but it was only a vindication of Knot or "Nicholas Smith, and a defence of the propoſitions "of Ireland, which had alſo been condemned at Paris. "There came out ſoon after a book under the name "of Edmondus Urſulanus, whoſe true name was "Macmahone, Prior of the Convent of the Franciſ- "cans at Louvain. About the ſame time the "Jeſuits publiſhed their Critique of the Apoſtles's "Creed (6) in imitation of the cenſures that had been "made on their opinions at Paris... In which they "charged the Biſhops, who were their adverſaries, "with reviving old Hereſies, and broaching new ones. "The Jeſuits having thus done great matters, exulted "very unjuſtly every where, as though they had en- "tirely routed their enemies, and forced them to quit "the field, when two Doctors of the Sorbonne, Halfier "and le Maiſtre, engaged in a controverſy with a "certain Doctor, who appeared only under the name "of Petrus Aurelius, and to whom the Clergy of "France fillily adjudged the victory, with as much "commendation and applauſe, as the mighty deeds of "the Maid of Orleans ever received. And to ſhew "how much they eſteemed his work, they printed it "at their own expence, and prefixed to it a beautiful "elogy of their author. Even the Secular Clergy of "England wrote a congratulatory letter to him, "ſigned by John Colleton Dean of the Chapter, and "by Edmund Dutton, Secretary; in that letter they "lamented ſadly the diſorders, that had till then pre- "vailed amongſt them, and the Hereſies which this "gave theſe adverſaries an opportunity to revive. "The chief point in this controverſy related to the "dignity, neceſſity, and juriſdiction of the Epiſcopal "Order, as it appears from the cenſures of the Biſhops "of France, and from Aurelius's aſſertion (*), who "obſerves, that though the Biſhop of Chalcedon had occaſioned this controverſy with the Clergy of England, yet it had been carried further; namely, whether the Epiſcopal Order be neceſſary to make a Church what it is? Whether it be of Divine Right or not? Whether Confirmation might be adminiſtred without Biſhops? Whether the Epiſcopal Order be more perfect than the Monaſtical? Whether Regular perſons were under the juriſdiction of the Biſhops?"

One may easily imagine that some political reasons have prevented the publishing this last book.

KNOX (JOHN) a Minister of Scotland, was one of the chief instruments and promoters of the Reformation in his own country in the sixteenth Century. He had been a disciple of John Major, one of the most acute schoolmen of those times; he followed his master's steps so well when he taught the School-divinity, that in some things he subtilized upon it even better than his master himself. But having examined St. Jerom and St. Augustin's works, it altered his taste entirely, and he applied himself to a plain and solid Theology: he discovered a vast number of errors, and published a Confession of Faith, which made him pass for an heretic. He was imprisoned [A], and would have lost his life at the place of execution, had he not been so happy as to make his escape. He retired into England, where he was so much esteemed by King Edward, that he might have been promoted to a Bishopric, if he had had a mind to it; but he fell into a great passion when it was offered him; and refused it as savouring too much of Anti-Christianism [B]. After that Prince's death he retired from England, that he might

[A] He was imprisoned.] Melchior Adam gives us here a lame account and in some particulars inconsistent with Beza's. Let us correct it, and observe, that John Knox not being satisfied with exploding the School-Divinity, but having also very freely condemned several other things, was obliged to retire from Edinburg to Hamelton then the only sanctuary of the faithful (1). He published there (2) a Confession of Faith, the consequence of which was that David Beton Archbishop of St. Andrews had him condemned as an Heretic for non-appearance, and degraded him from the Priesthood (3). He would have been murthered by some Assassins, had not a Gentleman of Scotland secured him against their snares. There happened great revolutions; for that Archbishop, who was also a Cardinal, was murthered, the French took the Castle of St. Andrews: Knox fell into their hands; and being set at Liberty he went to Berwick a city of England on the borders of Scotland. He disputed there, according to Beza, with the Bishop of the place (4), illius civitatis pseud-Episcopo: i. e. "the False-Bishop of that "city:" their controversy was referred to the Parliament of England, who adjudged the victory to Knox. Utroque ad supremum Angliæ Senatum rejecto (tum autem Edwardus regnare cœperat) tantum effecit ut victoria penes veritatem stante, damnaretur quidem falsæ religionis pseud-episcopus, ipsum vero tum pietas, tum diligentia magnopere commendaret (5). i. e. "They "being both referred to the Parliament of England "(King Edward was then lately come to the throne) "he argued so well, that victory being on the side of "truth, the false Bishop of a false Church was con-"demned, and Knox's piety and industry gained him "a great reputation." I do not know whether this disputation may not be the same in which John Knox was engaged in the Diocese of Durham. He was forced to declare his opinion concerning the Mass, and in a sermon he shewed so evidently the blasphemies and idolatry, with which that sacrifice is attended, that neither Bishop Tonstal, nor any of his Doctors had any thing to answer to the purpose. I imagine that of one event they have made two. However it be, here follows the proof of what I have just now observed concerning that sermon. Specimen ejus illustre deposuit tum alias tum anno 1550 in terra Dunelmensi: quando coactus coram Episcopo Tonstallo & ejus Doctoribus super Missa Pontificia opinionem suam exponere. Pro concione illius idololatrias & horrendas blasphemias tam solidis argumentis demonstravit, ut adversarii, quod vere opponerent, non haberent (6). This particular will perhaps be cleared up by consulting the life of our John Knox (7), which I have not by me. We shall now see what the King did for him.

[B] He might have been promoted to a Bishopric, but he.... refused it as savouring too much of Anti-Christianism.] His zeal against the Hierarchy appeared most evidently on this occasion. For here follows what we meet with in Melchior Adam, in page 137 of the lives of foreign Divines. Cum Episcopatus de Regis voluntate Cnoxo esset oblatus, indignabundus Cnoxus non solum honorem recusavit, sed etiam oratione gravi titulos illos improbavit, quasi regni Antichristiani quiddam redolentes. i. e. "When Knox was offered a "Bishoprick by the King's command, he not only re-"fused that dignity with indignation, but also con-"demned in a serious discourse, those titles as savour-"ing something of Antichrist's Kingdom." Beza commends him very much for refusing such a preferment; and whatever some modern Ministers may say, Beza and his Collegues were fully persuaded that the equality of the Pastors is of divine right, and consequently that the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy is a fundamental abuse. Beza inveighs terribly against Episcopacy in the following words. Inde Novocastrum ac deinceps Londinum ad Regem accito (Knoxo) quum Episcopatus quidam offerretur, tantum abest ut illum receperit, ut etiam in totam illam vere satanicam potestatem graviter sit invectus, ut quæ divino jure nullo nitatur, ac ne ex veteribus quidem canonibus administretur: qua in re etsi non obtinuit (quod si in Anglia & alibi factum esset, id est, si causa illa Tyrannidis omnis Ecclesiastica præcipua & primaria esset sublata, longe alia facies Ecclesiarum esset) conscientiam tamen suam singulari cum Christianæ modestiæ exemplo liberavit (8). i. e. "Hence being sent "for to Newcastle, and afterward to London by the "King, he (Knox) was so far from accepting the "Bishopric which was offered him, that on the con-"trary he exclaimed strongly against that power, "which is really diabolical, and not in the least "grounded on any divine right, and is not even ad-"ministred according to the antient Canons. And "though Knox did not succeed in this (which if he "had done in England and in other places, that is to "say, if that chief and first cause of all Ecclesiastical "tyranny had been removed, the Churches would be "quite in another condition) yet he followed the "dictates of his conscience, leaving a remarkable "instance of Christian modesty."

might not fall into the hands of the perſecutors, and went to Frankfort, and thence to Geneva, where he preached to the Refugees of his own country, and engaged in a great friendſhip with John Calvin. He returned into Scotland in the year 1559, and laboured with an extraordinary zeal to eſtabliſh there the doctrine of the Proteſtants both by his preaching and by his writings. His enemies having obliged him to leave Edinburgh, he retired to St. Andrew's, where the Devil raiſed a great many adverſaries againſt him, chiefly when he had declared againſt ſome perſons who conſpired againſt the Royal Majeſty. Quo ut primum venit multos illi Satanas excitavit hoſtes, præſertim cum ſe illis, qui contra Regiam Majeſtatem conſpirarant oppoſuiſſet (a). The news of the ſlaughter of the Proteſtants committed in France on St. Bartholomew's day, overwhelmed him with grief; but he found himſelf ſoon eaſed by the good turn which things began to take in Scotland. They that had been baniſhed were called back to Edinburgh; he was one of them (b), and began again to perform his paſtoral function. The Collegue he deſired to have was granted him, and he inſtalled him November the 9th 1572, which was the laſt Sermon he preached. He fell ſick ſoon after, and from that time till the 24th of November, on which day he died, he did nothing but talk of religion and piety with his wife, with his ſervant, and with thoſe that came to ſee him (c). He lived fifty ſeven years (d). It is impoſſible to load a man more with injuries and opprobrious language than Moreri has done our John Knox, from Spondanus. Thoſe paſſages have been caſtrated in the editions printed in Holland. The misfortune is that the Engliſh Epiſcopalians agree with the Popiſh writers, in repreſenting him as an Apoſtle who eſtabliſhed his Reformation with fire and ſword [C], and who taught the [C] The Engliſh Epiſcopalians agree with the writers in repreſenting him as an Apoſtle who eſtabliſhed his reformation with fire and ſword.] Spondanus having ſaid that Knox a Prieſt and an apoſtate Monk, a debaucher of ſeveral women, and of his own Step-Mother, and a Magician, returned into Scotland in the year 1559, being well provided with inſtructions from Calvin, adds the following words. Adeo prædicationibus ſuis & invectivis rem auxit, ut non ſolum paſſim templa & monaſteria deſtructa fuerint, ſacra conculcata, Imagines confractæ, ornamenta et bona expilata, exturbati Monachi, Sacerdotes pulſi, Epiſcopi ejecti, verum etiam omnis obedientia Regenti renunciata, omniſque auctoritas abrogata & in quorundam, quos tanquam conſiliarios eligebant, (manus) tranſlata (2). i. e. " By his Sermons and in-" vectives he carried things ſo far, that now not on" ly the Churches and Monaſteries were every where " pulled down, the ſacred things trod under foot, the " Images broken, the ornaments and goods plundered,

" the Monks expelled, the Prieſts driven away, the " Biſhops ejected; but even all obedience was denied
" the Queen Regent, ſhe was deprived of all her autho" rity, which was conferred on ſome perſons, whom " they choſe and appointed as a council." He aſſerts in another place (10) where he gives us an account of the different opinions of thoſe, who conſulting about Queen Mary Stuart's fate, that ſome, by Knox's advice, gave their votes for putting her to death immediately. Laſtly he obſerves, that King James recommended to his ſon not to read Buchanan's Libels, nor Knox's Chronicle; but rather to puniſh ſeverely thoſe who ſhould keep ſuch wicked books, and to ſuppoſe according to Pythagoras's opinion, that the ſouls of thoſe ſeditious authors paſſed into the bodies of them that read their works, or maintained their opinions, and that therefore they deſerved the ſame puniſhment, which thoſe authors would juſtly be condemned to if they ſhould riſe from the dead. Haud tamen famoſos Libros Buchanani, aut Knoxii Chronica evoleret; ſed ſi quod ejuſmodi ſcriptum inveniret, cum ejus depoſitariis ex legis ſeveritate ageret. In eo Pythagoræ diſcipulum ſe profiteretur, ut exiſtimaret ipſos manes iſtorum ſeditionum ſlabellorum metempſychoſi quadam in eorum corpora tranſiiſſe, qui eorum vel libros retinerent, vel dogmata defenderent: eoſque non minori ſupplicio plectendos, quam ſi ipſi auctores jam a mortuis eſſent reſuſcitati (11). He quotes the ſecond book of the Doron Baſilicon. I have conſulted it, but I met only with the following obſervation in it concerning the matter before us. " I do not " mean thoſe hiſtories, which abound with malice " and invectives; thoſe ſlanderous libels, which your " ſubjects are neither to read nor to keep, upon very " ſevere penalties. For I would have you believe, as " a true Diſciple of Pythagoras, that the ſouls of thoſe
" firebrands of ſedition paſs into the bodies of them
" that read their works, or maintain their opinions;
" who muſt therefore be puniſhed as the authors them-
" ſelves." Theſe are King James's words according to the French tranſlation of the Doron Baſilicon made by the Sieur Villiers Hotman, and printed at Paris in the year 1604. Conſult the ſecond part, folio 57. Spondanus acts againſt the rules of hiſtory, when he pretends that King James named theſe two authors expreſly: he ſhould have offered, only by way of conjecture, that he imagined the King meant both theſe writers. Let us ſee now what the Epiſcopalians ſay, as they are quoted by Brerleius: for as I could not meet with their books, I have been obliged to truſt to him; all I can do is to tranſcribe fairly what he relates both in the body of the page and in the margin (12) Et primo quidem de Joanne Knoxio. . . . . notum atque ipſorum Proteſtantium teſtimonio confirmatum eſt, eum poſtquam Geneva in Scotiam rediiſſet, Religionem vi et armis ad phantaſiam ſuam, ibi reformare aggreſſum eſſe. " Cumque Caſtrum Sancti

" he did not appear, and was declared a rebel. But " yet he continued in his audaciouſneſs and wicked " attempts; and went immediately to raiſe commoti- " ons at Perth. He encouraged the magiſtrates of that " City and of Dundee (the people having already rai- " ſed a tumult) to pull down every where the Images, " and the Altars in all the Churches. He himſelf, af- " ter a ſeditious Sermon, in which he had endeavoured " to perſuade the people to ſuch attempts, demoliſhed " the houſes of the Carthuſians, Franciſcans, and Car- " melites, and pulled down the Images and Altars in " the ſhires of Fiſe, Angus, Merns, and in other pla- " ces (α). Thus he went on to reform the religion " of thoſe Churches, but after a ſtrange manner. " After this, ſays Bancroft, (who quotes for his vou- " cher the very hiſtory of Knox, ſetting down the " pages where every particular is mentioned) another " concourſe was made of theſe reformers at St. Andrews, " where by Knox's perſuaſions in his Sermon they " made the like havock, and did caſt down, ſpoil and " deſtroy both the houſes of the fryars, and the Abbeys " in that town. So dealt they alſo within a very ſhort " time with the Abbey of Scone, the Friars at Stri- " velling, at Lithquo, and at Edinburgh, the Queen " being fled from thence for fear. They kept the field " two months, and took away to themſelves the coining " tools, ... and juſtified the ſame. &c. They gave " the Queen the lie divers times, and loaded her with " moſt deſpightful ſpeeches, they renounced their o- " bedience unto her, and even depoſed her from her " government, by a formal act, penned by Knox " himſelf for that purpoſe."

(α) This is an accurate tranſlation of Brerleius: But Holinſhed's own words are as follow. " The Queen " Regent cauſed ſummons to be given to John Knox, " John Wullocke .... to appear at Striveling the tenth " day of May: and for non-appearance they were de- " nounced rebels, and put to the horne. Whereupon " the ſaid John Knox being in Perth, perſuaded the " Maſter of Lindſeie ..... and divers others being " there aſſembled, with the Burgeſſes of the towns of St. " John's-town and Dundee, to pull down the images and " altars in all Churches, and to ſuppreſs the houſes of " Friars, and other religious places. Who after a Ser- " mon made by him to that effect, the ſame tenth of " May they began in St. John's town, and caſt down " the Abbies of the Charterhouſe, the Blacke and Car- " melite Friars, ... and reformed all other Churches " thereabout, breaking down the images and altars in " Fife, Angus, &c."

" The ſubſtance of his opinions, as they are collected " from his own writings, with a particular reference " to the pages whence they are extracted may be re- " duced to theſe propoſitions, as they are related by " Bancroft. Noblemen ought to reform religion, if " the King will not. Reformation of religion belong- " eth to the commonalty. God has appointed the No- " bility to bridle the inordinate appetites of Princes. " Princes for juſt cauſes may be depoſed. If Princes " be tyrants againſt God and his truth, their ſubjects " are freed from their oaths of obedience." Compare this with Petra Sancta's words in the following remark.

[E] When I conſider what is anſwered in his behalf.] I muſt obſerve firſt of all, that they who ſpeak ill of our John Knox's actions and opinions, do maliciouſly take it for granted, that he went hand in hand with Calvin, and had learned at Geneva the opinions which he taught in Scotland (13). With this view they quote with affectation the elogies which Calvin and Beza have beſtowed upon him. Cardinal de Richelieu, when he was but Biſhop of Luçon, publiſhed a book of controverſies, in which he made great uſe of John Brerleius's collections, par- ticularly with regard to John Knox's ſeditious opinions. (14) He quotes Beza's own words.

I cannot but think that he really had ſuch ſentiments concerning the Regal authority, as the more paſſages upon this ſubject; and ſome amongſt others, by which it appears that your party has taught, that by the laws of God and Man, it is lawful to kill impious Kings; that according to the word of God a private man may, by a particular inſtinct kill a tyrant; this is an abominable doctrine in every reſpect, which will never be liked by the Catholic Church. Here follows the anſwer to this objection. " As the queſtion was to " enquire after truth, there was no occaſion for ſuch " flouriſhes of Rhetoric, which are nothing but fictions " and falſities. For how is it poſſible that he ſhould " have had it in his power to quote ſo many authors " to prove us guilty of that abominable doctrine, and " yet ſhould not quote one ſingle writer that ſays a " word on it? And even in order to find that weak ar- " gument which he urges, he has been obliged to tra- " vel over the whole earth, and to go into the other " world, amongſt ſavages, to call Buchanan from the " grave, who was born amongſt them, and who never " yet ſet up for a Divine. Who can believe that the " Biſhop of Luçon would forbear to quote a great " number of authors, becauſe it would not be advan- " tageous but prejudicial to us, ſince he undertook to " write againſt us. It would be betraying one's own " cauſe, thus to omit what is againſt one's antagoniſt " and adverſary, and to quote what is advantageous " to him. Such unfair dealings do but ill become a " Biſhop, whoſe duty it is always to be ſincere: he " ought not to have ſpared us, ſince he deſigned to " make us acknowledge our faults in a matter of ſo " great conſequence. He ſhould not have referred " us to the Apologia Proteſtantium, which book I have " not ſeen, not having been able to meet with it. " But I know very well, that if the author of that " book be of our party, he does not ſpeak as the Biſhop " makes him ſpeak; and if he be of their party, he " aſſerts it from his own head, ſuppoſing he does aſſert " it, and has not one good argument to ſupport his " aſſertion (15)." It is plain that this anſwer does not in the leaſt clear Knox. There was another Mi- niſter (16), of much greater learning than the Mi- niſter of Fontenai-le-Comte, who anſwered the Biſhop of Luçon. He had read (17) John Brerleius's work, and he anſwered very well the objections, that had been grounded on ſome paſſages of Calvin. But he does in- tirely give up John Knox, and aſſerts that the elogies which Calvin and Beza beſtowed on him, do not in the leaſt relate to the opinions concerning the King's authority, nor to the particular actions, which might in ſome meaſure favour of rebellion. Here follow that Miniſter's words (18). " As for Knox, Good- " man, and Buchanan, the circumſtances of the times " in which they wrote, do in ſome reſpects leſſen the " odiouſneſs of the doctrines, which they inconſide- " rately ſpread through Scotland againſt the truth, " which they could not well perceive on account " of the paſſionate temper, which is natural to " that nation, and of the troubles and commoti- " ons of the ſtate, by which they were hurried " away; for it is natural to men to chooſe rather to " vindicate, even bitterly or obſtinately, an evil " action, which they have committed in a paſſion " without any wicked deſign, rather than to confeſs " that what has been done, was ill done either by " themſelves, or by their friends. Yet notwithſtanding " their wrong notions, they were great men and " have well ſerved their country; Buchanan particu- " larly in the education of the King of Great Britain, " and the others in their paſtoral functions, to which " they ought to have applied themſelves entirely and " abſolutely. I ſuppoſe then that Calvin (*) in the " letters he wrote to them, ſtiled the two firſt his bre- " thren, and excellent men, and that Beza gave the firſt " of them . . . the title of reſtorer of the Goſpel amongſt " the Scots; does it follow from thence, that Calvin " and Beza approved their opinions concerning the " ſovereign power of Kings, or that they were ac- " quainted with their opinions, or that they even " knew what happened in Scotland as a conſequence of " the Reformation, or that our adverſaries are well " grounded, when they falſely aſſert, that the Books of " Knox and Goodman were printed at Geneva, with " Calvin and Beza's approbation? If theſe Gentle- " men are pleaſed to prove all that they aſſert on their " bare word, and to ſhew by unqueſtionable evidence " that the Miniſters of Geneva correſponded with " Knox, Goodman or Buchanan about other affairs " than ſuch as related to the Church, or that they were " acquainted with their private opinions concerning the " Prerogative of Kings, or that they knew exactly " and approved what the others taught in matters of " Civil Government, then they ſhall have leave to " complain. But on the contrary, it appears from " the very letters, quoted in the Biſhop of Luçon's " book, that the Miniſters of Geneva correſponded " with foreigners, only about matters purely Eccleſiaſti- " cal; and it appears particularly, from Beza's letters " to Knox, that they had no certain account at Geneva of " what paſſed amongſt the Scots . . . If therefore Calvin, " if Beza, if Whitaker, if ſome others of our people " called Knox and Goodman brethren, they did not " however admit their opinions, but conſidered them " only in their paſtoral functions, to which they were " called. If they commended them, it was only ac- " cording to the beſt of their knowledge, and not that " they thought them incapable of ſin. For it is very " poſſible that amongſt thoſe who preach Chriſt, there be " ſome, as St. Paul ſays to the Philippians, who preach " Chriſt even of envy and ſtrife, whoſe fervent zeal is " a little tainted by their natural defects, by whom " the Lord often performs his own work, creating light " out of our darkneſs, and order out of our confu- " ſion; that the glory of what is well done may be " aſcribed only to his providence, and what is ill done " to the natural imperfections of the inſtruments he " makes uſe of." Is not this granting, that Brerleius and the authors he quotes have not calumniated John Knox, with regard to the opinions they aſcribe to him?

As the Biſhop of Luçon had made uſe of Brerleius's collections, ſo the Jeſuit Petra Sancta made uſe ſoon after of that Biſhop's work, and objected againſt du Moulin, what ſeveral Proteſtants have aſſerted con- cerning the obedience of ſubjects. Here follows what he ſaid of Knox (19). Si Principes, inquit (†), ad- verſus Deum & veritatem ejus tyrannicè ſe gerant, ſub- diti eorum a juramento fidelitatis abſolventur. Idem præter alia multa, Illud, inquit, audaciter affirmaverim, debuiſſe Nobiles, Rectores, Judices, Populumque Anglica- num non ſolum reſiſtere & repugnare Mariæ illi Jezabel, quam vocant Reginam ſuam, verum etiam de eâ & Sa- cerdotibus ejus, & aliis omnibus, quotquot ei auxilium tu- lerunt, mortis ſupplicium ſumere, ut primum cœperunt Evangelium Chriſti ſupprimere. i. e. " If Princes, " ſays Knox, behave themſelves as tyrants againſt God " and his truth, the ſubjects are free from their oath " of allegiance. And beſides ſeveral other things he " adds this; I can boldly affirm, ſays he, that the " Nobility, Governors, Judges and people of Eng- " land ought not only to have oppoſed and reſiſted Mary, " that Jezebel whom they call their Queen; but even " to have put her to death, with all her Prieſts, and " all other perſons who aſſiſted and ſupported her, " the moment they began to ſuppreſs Chriſt's Goſpel." What did Du Moulin reply to this? He did not in the leaſt mention John Knox; he obſerved only that Buchanan, whom the Jeſuit had alſo quoted, treated only of the rights of the Scots; and that if other au- thors had carried things to an exceſs, their particular temper, and not the ſpirit of their religion muſt be charged with it (20). Buchanan ſcripſit de Jure Regni apud Scotos; ſed hoc nihil ad Galliam, Angliam, Germa- niam, Hiſpaniam. Nec ſi quis aliquid ſcripſit quod modum ex- cedat, debet continuo adſcribi ejus Religioni, potius quam ejus genio. Nam ejuſmodi Libri, quos citat Jeſuita, ſive veri, ſive falſi, nullam præferunt ſecum approbationem Doctorum. Rivetus in his anſwer to the ſame Jeſuit referred him to the two works againſt the Biſhop of Luçon, which I have already quoted; and declared poſitively, that the Reformed condemned the opinions of John Knox and others like him, who acted accord- ing to the ſpirit of their nation, rather than accord- ing to the ſpirit of their religion. On which occa- ſion he obſerves (21), that of 105 Kings, who had reigned in Scotland before Mary Stewart, three had been deprived, five baniſhed, and thirty two killed. Ne- mini noſtrum probantur, quæ vel ex Goodmanno, vel

It is certainly vindicating John Knox's Memory to ſome purpoſe, to ſhew the extravagant impertinencies of thoſe who have aſperſed his reputation. I ſhall therefore tranſcribe a paſſage from Thevet, in which the reader will ſee ſuch groſs and exceſſive ſlanders [G], that this alone is ſufficient to prepoſſeſs us againſt all that the Roman Catholic Writers have publiſhed concerning this Reformer of Scotland. [G] Here follows a paſſage from Thevet, in which the reader will ſee... groſs and exceſſive ſlanders.] This man might paſs for a Monk that had forſaken his order, though he continued to profeſs the Roman Catholic Religion. He was ſo little accurate, that pretending to write of the affairs of Scotland, he did not ſo much as give himſelf the trouble to obſerve, how the names of the perſons he mentioned were ſpelt. You will ſee in the following paſſage that he did not know the name of our John Knox. "During that time, "ſays he (25), the Scots never left England in peace; "it was when Henry VIII plaid his pranks with the "chalices, relics, and other ornaments of the Engliſh "Churches; which Tragedies and Plays have been "acted in our time in the Kingdom of Scotland by "the exhortations of Noptz (*) the firſt Scots Mi-"niſter of the bloody Goſpel. This firebrand of ſe-"dition, who delighted in nothing but broils and "tumults, could not be content with barely following "the ſteps of Luther, Zuingle, Farel, and leſs ſtill "thoſe of his maſter Calvin, who had not long be-"fore delivered him from the gallies of the Prior of "Capua, where he had been three years for his crimes, "unlawful amours, and abominable fornications; for "he uſed to lead a diſſolute life in ſeveral ſhameful "and odious places; being alſo found guilty of the "parricide and murther committed on the body of "James Beton, Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, outra-"geouſly perpetrated by the connivance and artifice "of the Earl of Ropphol, of James Leſcle, John "Leſcle their uncle, and William du Coy. This "Simoniſt, who had been a Prieſt of our Church being "fattened by the benefices he had enjoyed, ſold them "for ready money; and finding that he could not "make his cauſe be good, he gave himſelf up to "the moſt terrible blaſphemies. Firſt, he denied the "power of God; he preached publicly that virginity "is not more valuable than marriage; this he had "ſtolen from Luther's hereſy ſet down in his new Epi-"thalamium. He perſuaded alſo ſeveral devout wives, "and religious virgins to abandon themſelves to "wicked adulterers; by which deviliſh exhortations "he cauſed them to be raviſhed in a moſt ſacrilegious "manner. He alſo taught that we muſt explode, "deſpiſe and ſcorn the holy Lent, pull down the "Images, dig up and burn the bodies of the Saints, "and ſeize upon the treaſures of the Church. This "is not all; for he never ceaſed during two whole "years to rouſe the people, encouraging them to take "up arms againſt the Queen, and to drive her out of "the Kingdom, which he ſaid was elective, as it "had been formerly in the time of Heatheniſm. Could "the moſt barbarous men in the world ſay any thing "worſe, more cruel, and more mortal? ... The Lu-"therans have Churches and Oratories; their Mi-"niſters ſing the Pſalms, and ſay Maſs; and though "it be different from ours, yet they add to it the Kyrie "eleiſon, Credo, Sanctus Agnus (Lord have mercy upon "us, the Creed, Holy Lamb) and other prayers as we "do. And when their Miniſters officiate, they wear "the cope, the chaſuble and the ſurplice, as ours do, "being concerned for their ſalvation, and careful of "what relates to the public worſhip. Whereas the "Scots have lived theſe twelve years paſt, without "laws, without religion, without ceremonies, con-"ſtantly refuſing to own a King or a Queen, as ſo "many brutes, ſuffering themſelves to be impoſed up-"on by the ſtories told them by this arch-hypocrite "Noptz, a traitor to God and to his country, rather "than to follow the pure Goſpel, the councils, and "the doctrine of ſo many holy Doctors, both Greek "and Latin, of the Catholic Church, This gentle "Preacher, after the death of his firſt wife, did by "the eloquence of his venomous tongue, animate all "on a ſudden the Nobility of Scotland againſt the "Clergy more than he had done before: and the rude "country people aſſaulted, plundered, burnt and "deſtroyed the caſtles and houſes of the Gentlemen, "Merchants, and others, who would not join with "them in their leud actions and maſſacres... It is "certain that this inconſtant traitor, filled with ambi-"tion and carnal luſt, gained ſo great credit and re-"putation with the ignorant people of that country "that he married to his ſecond wife a Gentlewoman "of an ancient and noble family, allied to the Princes "of the Royal Blood of Scotland." ſerves that this queſtion was very much controverted in the ſixteenth Century, when Mary ſucceeded to Edward King of England, and when Elizabeth ſucceeded her ſiſter Mary. Theſe two Queens acted from quite contrary principles in matters of Religion. The former baniſhed the Proteſtants; the latter reſtored them, and eſtabliſhed the Reformation. They who had been perſecuted by Queen Mary maintained that it was againſt the law of nature, againſt all human and divine laws, that a woman ſhould govern a whole Nation; but they ſpoke quite in another ſtrain under Queen Elizabeth. See how Schluſſelburgius has abuſed our Knox and ſome other authors upon that account. Qui Calvini placita ſequerentur, his nil erat magis exoſum fœmineo Mariæ regimine; iiſdem viciſſim, ubi ad Clavum Reip. feliciter evectam conſpexiſſent Eliſabetham, nihil magis venerabile, quàm Regina talis. Atque ut hoc de ſuo Schluſſelburgius (*), magnæ conſtantiæ doctrinæque Theologus, largiatur mihi, ex eadem Calvini religione Gilbius, Goodman & Knoxus, (qui ſcilicet exilium ſuum Mariæ imputabant, publicis libris (Genevæ impreſſis,) docuerunt eſſe contrà jus naturale, divinum & humanum, ut mulier etiam in rebus politicis regnet. At ubi Mariæ imperium Eliſabetha excepiſſet, eximia & Pontificiorum hoſtis, & Calviniſequarum fautrix, protinus verſo remigio à Reformatis Anglis, non Regina tantum in temporalibus, illa eſt proclamata, ſed etiam Caput Eccleſiæ in ſpiritualibus. Ita ſpacio duorum annorum (ipſiſſima Schluſſelburgii verba recito,) quod prius fuit Calviniſtis Genevæ moratis ipſiſſimum verbum Dei, mox atque in Angliam redierunt mutatum eſt in verbum Diaboli. Tantum videlicet potuit amor in Religionem, quam ſub alterius fœminæ Regno conculcatam viderent, ſub alterius reſurgentem, ut à perſonis in ipſum imperii genus deflectente ſe affectu, jam proſcriberent Gynæcocratiam, jam dignitati ac famæ reſtituerent (26). i. e. "Nothing was more odious to Calvin's followers than a woman's reign under Queen Mary. But on the other hand when they ſaw Queen Elizabeth raiſed to the throne, nothing was more venerable than ſuch a Queen. And, to quote again Schluſſelburgius, a Divine of great learning and conſtancy, Gilby, Goodman and Knox, all Calviniſts (who aſcribed their baniſhment to Queen Mary) have aſſerted in their books (printed at Geneva) that the Government of a woman, even in civil affairs, is againſt the law of nature, and laws human and divine. But after Mary's death Elizabeth being raiſed to the throne, who was an eminent Princeſs, an enemy of the Papiſts, and a protectreſs of the Calviniſts, the Engliſh Proteſtants altered their notion of government immediately, and the Queen had not only a ſupreme authority in civil affairs, but was alſo proclaimed the head of the Church in ſpirituals. Thus in two years time (theſe are Schluſſelburgius's own words) what was the very word of God in the opinion of the Calviniſts, when they were at Geneva, was changed into the word of the Devil at their return into England. Such was the effect of their love for Religion, which was perſecuted under one woman's reign, and reſtored again under another's, that their paſſion paſſing from the perſons to the very nature of government, now they condemn the government of a woman, and then again reſtore it to its dignity and reputation." Thomaſius, who furniſhes me with thoſe words, pretends, that the Calviniſts in France did alſo alter their maxims after the perſecution they ſuffered under Charles IX, and he quotes particularly Lambert Daneau who declared on the one hand againſt the Monarchy, and on the other for the government of women, in favour of Elizabeth Queen of England. Ut Anglico regimini præ Gallico faveret (Danæus) illud maximè fecit, quod ſuæ ſectæ hominibus et ſub Elizabetha lautiſſima eſſet fortuna, et ſub Carolo Gallo vix aliud præter gladium, crucem, ignem expectandum. Notæ ſunt Pariſinæ nuptiæ (§), eo actæ eventu, ut ab illis maxime temporibus ſcriptores Galli peſtilentem inciperent in Politica doctrina ſectam ſive novam condere, ſive ſepultam reſuſcitare, quam ſolemus vocare Monarchomachorum. Huic nomen addixit etiam ſuum Danæus; ut mirari aliquis poſſit, quomodo Scriptor ille, qui vix Regem æquo animo pati poſſet in ſolio Monarchico, ferre in eodem potuerit Reginam. Nempe vereor ut hic ſuas partes egerit hinc odium in perfidiam Galli, illinc amor tum in feliciſſimam Elizabethæ Gubernationem (*), tum in Religionem Calvini, cui perfugium eâ tempeſtate in iſta inſula ſatis tutum erat (27). i. e. "The reaſon "why Daneau preferred the Engliſh Government "to that of France, was that his ſect was ve- "ry happy under Queen Elizabeth, whereas under "Charles IX King of France, they had nothing to "expect, but fire, and ſword, and the gallows. All "the world remembers the nuptials at Paris, the "event of which was ſuch, that from that time "the French writers began to revive an abominable "ſect in Politicks which we uſe to call of the Mo- "narchomachi, or oppoſers of Monarchy. Daneau alſo "declared for that ſect, ſo that we may well wonder, "how this writer, who could hardly bear that a King "ſhould ſit on the Monarchical Throne, would ſuffer "a Queen on it. I ſuſpect very much that the paſſi- "ons acted their part here: on the one hand, the in- "dignation againſt the perfidiouſneſs of the French "King, and on the other hand, the love both for "Queen Elizabeth's happy adminiſtration, and for "Calvin's religion, which at that time met with a pret- "ty ſecure ſanctuary in England." It is certain that the ſtate affairs were at that time in ſo fluctuating a condition, both in France and in England, that both Parties, of the Proteſtants and Roman Catholicks, altered their principles by turns. See the remark (I) of the article HOTMAN. The Roman Catholicks, who exclaimed very much againſt the women's Government under Queen Elizabeth, had commended it very much under Queen Mary. Knox and ſome others acted on the other ſide with the ſame inconſiſtency. The Roman Catholicks in France inſiſted ſtrongly on the ſubmiſſion to the Royal Authority under Charles IX (28). But they did quite the contrary during the league, which their adverſaries thought very ſtrange. I have read a particular in Savaron, which I think is very curious (29). Petro Corneio, a Spaniard .... thinks it very ſtrange and wonderful, that this City (30) ſhould have continued loyal to its Prince, and that the laſt civil wars never interrupted its conſtancy nor ſhook its reſolution, ſince, ſays he, it is very zealous for the Roman Catholick Religion, and is adorned with a Church, in which God is worſhipped, with modeſty, ceremonies, muſick, and organs, and is as much revered there, as in any Church he ever ſaw. When the ſame perſons ſpeak for or againſt the right of Princes, according as the intereſt of their cauſe changes, it is, generally ſpeaking, a ſign, that they are ſwayed by their paſſions.

[A] He boaſted that he had a great many followers in the chief Cities of Europe.] Here follow his words. Nemo homo mihi vitio vertet, ſi una cum meis gregalibus (quorum innumerus mihi numerus Lutetiæ, Amſtelodami, Lugduni, in Anglia, Hamburgi, Hafniæ, nec non Holmiæ, imo Romæ et in contiguis locis adſtipulatur) univerſa Biblia bellæ fabulæ loco habeam, qua belluæ, id eſt Chriſtiani, rationem captivantes, et cum ratione inſanientes, delectantur (1). i. e. "No man will blame me, if "with my followers (of whom there is an infinite num- "ber, at Paris, at Amſterdam, at Leiden, in England, "at Hamburg, at Copenhagen, at Stockholm, and "even at Rome and in the adjacent places) I look up- "on the whole Bible as a downright ſtory, in which "the Beaſts, that is to ſay, the Chriſtians, captivating "their reaſon, and being mad with reaſon, take a de- "light." We ought not to imagine, that he made uſe here of an artifice common with thoſe who conſpire againſt the ſtate, who in order to draw a great many perſons over to them, always ſay that they have a large number of accomplices. It is much more probable that Knuzen ſpoke thus, becauſe he was a hare-brained and heedleſs fellow.

Non eſſe Deum neque Diabolum. II. Magiſtratum nihil æſtimandum, Templa contemnenda, Sacerdotes rejiciendos. III. Loco Magiſtratus, et loco Sacerdotum eſſe Scientiam, et rationem cum conſcientia conjunctam, quæ doceat honeſte vivere, neminem lædere, et ſuum cuique tribuere. IV. Magiſ- "trates are not to be valued, Churches are to be deſ- "piſed, and Prieſts rejected. III. Inſtead of Magiſ- "trates and Prieſts, we have learning and reaſon, "which joined with conſcience teach us to live honeſt- "ly, to hurt no man, and to give every one his due. "IV. Matrimony does not differ from fornication. "V. There is but one life, which is this, after which "there are neither rewards, nor puniſhments. VI. "The holy Scripture is inconſiſtent with itſelf." This ſyſtem, beſides that it is moſt horridly impious, is alſo manifeſtly impertinent. For a man muſt be ſtark mad to believe, that mankind could ſubſiſt without Magiſtrates. There would indeed be no occaſion for them, if all men followed the dictates of their conſcience, which that infidel mentions to us; but do they really follow them, even in thoſe countries where the judges puniſh with the greateſt ſeverity thoſe that do any injury to their neighbours? I do not know whether we might not aſſert, that there is no impertinency, how ſilly ſoever it be, but acquaints us with ſome truth. The impertinencies of this German ſhew us, that the notions of natural religion, the Ideas of the honeſtum, the impreſſions of reaſon, in a word the inward light of conſcience, may continue in the mind of a man, even when the notion of the being of God, and the belief of another world are intirely rooted out of it.

But if you have a mind to meet there with a good vindication of the Holy Scripture againſt that man's blaſphemies, you muſt conſult the ſecond edition. And if you underſtand the German tongue, you may alſo, by Mollerus's advice (5), conſult the book he refers you to (6), and take notice of his reflexion. He obſerves, than if men continue to raiſe ſuſpicions of atheiſm againſt their enemies, as the author of that work does, by an inconſiderate zeal, mixed with his private paſſions, they will afford a copious ſubject to Chriſtian Thomaſius, who is writing an Apology for thoſe that have been unjuſtly loaded with ſuch reproaches. The author of the Penſees ſur les Cometes (7) has hinted the deſign of ſuch a work, and has given us a pretty curious ſketch of it. But let us ſee, in Mollerus's words, the wickeneſs of ſuch accuſers. Quo in opere optandum eſſet ut Theol. celeberrimus (Jo. Mullerus Antiſtes Hamb.) ſuo in Antagoniſtas odio minus indulſiſſet, nec per inſignem animi impotentiam, Schuppii τῦ μακαρίτυ Demegorias, piis omnibus commendatiſſimas & Chriſt. Hoburgii, ad extremum Atheiſmo contrarium, ſuperſtitionem ſc. & Enthuſiaſmum, proclivioris, ſcripta collo obtorto iis, quæ Atheiſmum vel occultant, vel quadamtenus promovent, aggregaſſet. Certe, ſi zelo hujuſmodi præcipiti, privatiſque affectibus obnoxio, Theologi Atheomaſtiges ſibi inviſos in ſuſpicionem impietatis Atheiſmo affinis pergent adducere, vereor ne calamo Chriſt. Thomaſii παῤῥησιαςικῶ, Gabr. Naudæi (qui magicæ reis eſt patrocinatus) exemplo apologiam pro Atheiſmi falſo inſimulatis parturienti, campus ſe pandat ampliſſimus innocentiam illorum, cum hominum cordatorum applauſu, vindicandi (8). i. e. "It were to be wiſhed that this "moſt celebrated Divine (John Mullerus Miniſter at "Hamburg) had not, in that work, ſo much indulged "his hatred againſt his adverſaries; nor by an immode- "rate paſſion put the writings of the late Schuppius, "which are highly eſteemed by all pious men, and "thoſe of Chriſt. Hoburgius, who was ſo far from "Atheiſm, that he was rather inclined to the contrary "extreme, namely to ſuperſtition and enthuſiaſm; it "were to be wiſhed, I ſay, that he had not put thoſe "works in the ſame rank with thoſe, in which atheiſm "lies concealed, or which may in ſome meaſure pro- "mote it. And indeed, if thoſe Divines who write "againſt atheiſm, being hurried away by an incon- "ſiderate zeal, and ſwayed by their private paſſions, "continue to raiſe ſuſpicions againſt their enemies, "charging them with impious notions bordering upon "atheiſm, I am afraid they will open a large field to "the moſt eloquent Chriſt. Thomaſius; who, after "the example of Naudé (who took upon him the de- "fence of thoſe who were charged with magic) is "writing an apology for thoſe who are falſely accuſed "of atheiſm. He will thus have new opportunities "to vindicate a number of perſons, with the approba- "tion of all ſenſible men."

☞KŒMPFER (ENGELBERT) was born the 16th of September 1651 at Lemgow, a ſmall town in the Circle of Weſtphalia, belonging to Count de Lippe. His father John Kœmpfer was Miniſter of St. Nicholas Church in that town; and his mother, Chriſtiana Drepper, was the daughter of Joachim Drepper, formerly Miniſter of the ſame Church (a). His father obſerving that he had a genius for ſtudy, cultivated it to the utmoſt of his abilities [A]. After ſtudying in ſeveral towns he went to Dantzick, where he made ſome ſtay, and gave the firſt public ſpecimen of his proficiency, by a Diſſertation de Majeſtatis diviſione, defended in 1673. He then went to Thorn, and from thence to the Univerſity of Cracow, where, for three years, ſtudying Philoſophy and foreign Languages, he took his degree of Doctor in Philoſophy, after which he went to Koningſberg

[A] His father ... cultivated ... his genius ... to the utmoſt of his abilities.] He firſt ſent him to the ſchool of Hameln, in the dukedom of Brunſwick: and afterwards to Luneburgh, Hamburg, and Lubeck, in all which places he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by an induſtrious application, and the quick progreſs he made in the learned languages; in Hiſtory, Geography, and Muſic both vocal and inſtrumental (1).

ningſberg in Pruſſia, and ſtaid there four years [B]. He next travelled into Sweden, where he ſoon began to make a figure [C]; and being appointed Secretary of the Embaſſy to the Sophy of Perſia, he ſet out from Stockholm, with the preſents for that Emperor, March the 20th 1683, O. S. and went through Aaland, Finland and Ingermanland to Narva, where he met Mr. Fabricius the Embaſſador, who had been ordered to take Moſcow in his way [D], whither he arrived, after meeting with great difficulties; and made his public entry the 7th of July [E]. The Embaſſador having ended his negotiations at the Ruſſian Court, ſet out from Moſcow on his way to Perſia [F]. During their ſtay in Georgia, Dr. Kœmpfer went in ſearch of ſimples, and of all the curioſities that could be met with in thoſe parts [G]. The expreſſes ſent to the Perſian Court being returned, Mr. Fabricius ſet out on his journey thither in January 1684; and arriving at Iſpahan, was not admitted to audience till the 30th of July [H]. During their ſtay, which was near two years at Iſpahan, Dr. Kœmpfer, whoſe curious and inquiſitive diſpoſition ſuffered nothing to eſcape him unobſerved, made all the advantages poſſible of ſo long an abode in the capitol of the Perſian Empire [I]. The Embaſſador having ended his negotiations towards the cloſe of 1685, and preparing to return into Europe, Dr. Kœmpfer did not judge proper to go back with him [K]; but entering into

[B] He ... ſtaid ... four years ... in Konigſberg.] During all that time he applied himſelf very intenſely to the ſtudy of Phyſick and Natural Hiſtory; his father's deſign, and his own genius and inclination, happily conſpiring to bend his thoughts that way; and it was here he laid the foundation of thoſe many excellent and uſeful diſcoveries and obſervations, which he afterwards had frequent opportunities of making, in the long courſe of his travels (2).

(2) Idem, ibid. pag. vi.

[C] Sweden, where he ſoon began to make a figure.] His learning and prudent behavionr ſoon brought him into great reputation both at the Univerſity of Upſal, and at the Court of Charles XI, a great encourager of learning; inſomuch that very advantageous offers were made him, upon condition that he would ſettle in that Kingdom; but he thought fit to decline them, from the ſtrong deſire he always had of ſeeing foreign countries; and choſe to prefer the employment of Secretary of the Embaſſy, which the Court of Sweden was then ſending to the Sophi of Perſia; the chief deſign of which Embaſſy was, to ſettle a commerce between the Kingdoms of Sweden and Perſia (3).

(3) Idem, ibid. pag. vi.

[D] The Embaſſador ... had been ordered to take Moſcow in his way.] As a trade could not be well ſettled between the two crowns, unleſs their Czarian Majeſties, Iwan and Peter, who at that time governed the Ruſſian Empire jointly, would conſent to let the European and Perſian commodities paſs through their dominions on reaſonable terms; the Embaſſador was ordered to go firſt to the Court of Moſcow, and conclude a treaty on that head (4).

(4) Ibid.

[E] Whither he arrived, after meeting with great difficulties.] A miſtake in the Embaſſador's credentials, wherein the name of the Perſian Sophy was inadvertently writ before that of their Czarian Majeſties, and the unwillingneſs of the Waywode of Novogrod, to furniſh the expences neceſſary for conducting and defraying him, with his retinue, purſuant to the tenor of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns, detained them on the borders of Ruſſia a conſiderable time: but this affair was at laſt amicably adjuſted (5).

(5) Idem, ibid. and pag. vii.

[F] Having ended his negotiations ... he ſet out from Moſcow.] The Embaſſador had continued about two months in that city. He then went down the rivers Moſco, Occa and Wolga, to Caſan and Aſtracan, the capitals of two powerful Kingdoms, which had been conquered, and added to the Ruſſian Empire, by that heroic Prince Iwan Baſilowitz. After meeting with a dangerous paſſage over the Caſpian ſea, in which they had like to have been loſt by an unexpected ſtorm, and the unſkilfulneſs of the Pilots, the ſhip having two rudders and conſequently two Pilots, who did not underſtand each other's language, they arrived ſafe on the Perſian coaſts, and landed at Niſabad, where they made ſome ſtay, living under tents after the manner of the natives. They then proceeded with two other Embaſſadors to the Perſian Court, to Siamachi, the capitol of the province of Schirwan, in Georgia, where they arrived in December, and ſtaid till the Governor had notified their arrival to his Sovereign, and received orders from thence, as to the manner in which they were to be treated, and the way they were to be ſent to Court (6).

(6) Idem, ibid.

[G] Dr. Kœmpfer went in ſearch of ſimples, and of all the curioſities &c.] He viſited all the neighbourhood of Siamachi, gathering herbs, and obſerving whatever was remarkable in nature and art. To theſe laborious and learned excurſions we owe that curious and accurate account he has given in his Amoenitates Exoticæ, of the origin and fountains of the Naphta in the peninſula Okeſra, which he viſited on the ſpot (7). Dr. Scheuchzer obſerves on this occaſion, that few are ſenſible of the pleaſure a Natural Hiſtorian receives, when he meets with ſome new and ſingular phænomenon in unfrequented places (8). Dr. Kœmpfer had the ſatisfaction of meeting, in that Median Peninſula, with more wonders than he went in ſearch of; for he ſaw the town of Baku on the Caſpian ſea, the monuments of antiquity ſtill extant in the neighbourhood of that place, the fountains of Naphta, the burning field, boiling lake, a mountain which threw out a fine potter's earth, and ſome other ſingularities, which abundantly repaid the trouble and hazard of his excurſion thither (9).

[H] Mr. Fabricius ... was not admitted to audience till the 30th of July.] Schah Solyman, the Perſian Sophi, being of a ſickly conſtitution, was at that time, by the advice of his Aſtrologers, under a kind of voluntary confinement in his palace. Dreading the fatal conſequences of a malignant conſtellation, they would not ſuffer him to appear in public till the 30th of July, on which day he treated his whole Court with the utmoſt magnificence. There were then many foreign Embaſſadors at Iſpahan, who were ſeverally admitted to audience on that day; it being the cuſtom of the Perſian Monarchs, not to admit the Embaſſadors of foreign powers to their preſence but on ſome ſuch ſolemn occaſion, in a full Court, and in the moſt pompous manner. Mr. Fabricius was admitted to audience firſt; and very particular and diſtinguiſhing honours were ſhewn him, during the whole time of his abode at Iſpahan (10).

(10) Idem, ibid. and pag. ix.

[I] Dr. Kœmpfer ... made all the advantages poſſible of ſo long an abode.] His principal and favourite enquiries here, and in all other places, tended chiefly to the improvement of Phyſic and Hiſtory in their ſeveral branches; but he nevertheleſs did not abſolutely confine himſelf to that ſubject, though extenſive enough. The political Hiſtory of a country, the ſucceſſion and remarkable actions of its Princes, the ſtate of their Court and Government; their perſonal qualities, vices, or virtues; the cuſtoms, manners, and inclination of the natives; their way of life, commerce, the remains of antiquity, the modern buildings, whether ſacred or civil, the flouriſhing or low condition of arts and ſciences, and ſuch like, equally exerciſed his induſtry and attention (11). Our author was greatly aſſiſted in his enquiries into the Perſian affairs, by Father du Mans, Prior of the Convent of Capuchins in Iſpahan, who had acquired a thorough knowledge of the Perſian language, government, cuſtoms, &c. (12).

(11) Idem, ibid.

(12) Idem, ibid.

[K] Dr. Kœmpfer did not judge proper to go back with the Embaſſador.] He was offered the employments of Chief Phyſician to a Georgian Prince, with a conſiderable ſtipend &c; but his inclination to travelling not being yet abated, he reſolved to go further into the Eaſt; and the advice of Father du Mans, with into the ſervice of the Dutch Eaſt India Company, in quality of chief Surgeon to the Fleet, then cruiſing in the Perſian Gulph, he ſet out for Gamron or Benderabaſſi, in November 1685 [L], whither he arrived, after making ſome ſtay in Sijras, and was ſeized with a violent fit of ſickneſs [M]. Being a little recovered, he ſpent a Summer in the neighbourhood of Gamron, during which he made a great number of very curious obſervations [N]. He did not leave that city till the end of June 1688, when he went on board the Fleet, which, after touching at many Dutch ſettlements, came to Batavia in September 1689 [O]. This city having been ſo particularly deſcribed by preceding writers, Dr. Kœmpfer turned his thoughts chiefly to the natural hiſtory of the country about it [P]. He poſſeſſed many good qualifications neceſſary for the making a good Botaniſt [Q]. In May 1690 he ſet out from Batavia on his voyage to Japan, in quality of Phyſician to the embaſſy, which the Dutch Eaſt-India Company ſends once a year to the Japoneſe Emperor's Court [R]. He quitted Japan, in order to his return to Europe, in November 1692, and Batavia in February 1693. He ſtaid near a month at the Cape of Good Hope, and arrived at Amſterdam in October following. In April 1694 he took his degree of Doctor in Phyſic at the Univerſity of Leyden; on which occaſion he communicated, in what are called inaugural Theſes, ten very ſingular and curious obſervations, made by him in foreign countries [S]. At his return to his native country, with the recommendations of Mr. Fabricius, prompted him to enter into the ſervice of the Dutch Eaſt India Company, as Chief Surgeon of their fleet; a place, as he himſelf obſerves in one of his letters, leſs honourable indeed, but more adapted to his views of travelling (13).

(13) Idem, pag. x.

[L] He ſet out for Gamron or Benderabaſſi.] This is a celebrated trading town on the Perſian Gulph. Dr. Kœmpfer was honourably attended a mile out of Iſpahan by the Embaſſador's retinue. He ſtaid ſome time in Sijras, as well to make the neceſſary enquiries concerning the celebrated Perſian wines which owe their name to that town, as to viſit the boaſted remains of the antient Perſepolis, and the royal palace of Darius, that noble ſtructure, which fell a ſacrifice to wine and wantonneſs; and whoſe ſcattered ruins are a ſtill exiſting undeniable monument of its former ſplendor and greatneſs (14).

(14) Idem, ibid.

[M] He was ſeized with a violent fit of ſickneſs... in Benderabaſſi.] The ſultry heat of the air, and the want of water is ſuch, that few Europeans can live there any conſiderable time without great prejudice to their health. Dr. Kœmpfer felt the baleful effects of it ſoon after his arrival, he being ſeized with a malignant fever of which he lay delirious for ſome days. However, Heaven was pleaſed to ſpare him. His fever abating, threw him into a dropſy, and that into a quartan ague; and it was by theſe dangerous and unuſual ſteps that he recovered his health, but not his former ſtrength and vigour. As ſoon as he was able to remove, he retired into the country, as well for the change of air and recovery of his ſtrength, as to make new diſcoveries and obſervations, chiefly on thoſe things which, on account of the unhealthineſs of the climate, and other difficulties, had not, before, been thoroughly enquired into (13).

(15) Idem, ibid.

[N] Being... in the neighbourhood of Gamron.... he made a great number of very curious obſervations.] To this retirement we owe his account of the mountain Benna in the province Laar, on the Perſian Gulph; of its plants and animals, of the precious Bezoar, and the animal in whoſe ſtomach it is found, of the ſingular hot baths, a native balſam, and other curioſities obſerved on that mountain and in its neighbourhood. His deſcription of the native mummy, that moſt precious balſam, which ſweats out of a rock in the province Daar, and is gathered once a year with great pomp and ceremony, for the ſole uſe of the Perſian Sophy. His obſervations on the Aſa Fœtida, of the plant, which grows only in Perſia, yielding that ſubſtance, and on the manner of gathering and preparing it. His obſervations on the Vena Medinenſis of Arabian writers, or Dracunculus, as he calls it, a ſingular worm bred between the interſtices of the muſcles, in ſeveral parts of the human body. His account of the Sanguis Draconis, viz. of the true Eaſtern one, which he aſcertains to be obtained from the fruit of a coniferous palm. His curious and accurate Hiſtory of the Palma Dactylifera, growing in Perſia; its differing ſpecies male and female; its culture, growth, preparation and uſes, far beyond whatever was known of this ſingular tree; with many other obſervations equally curious and inſtructive (16).

(16) Idem, ibid. pag. xi.

[O] The fleet... touching at many Dutch ſettlements...] It having orders to do this at moſt Dutch ſettlements, in Arabia Fœlix, the Great Mogul's country, on the coaſts of Malabar, in the iſland Ceylon, in the gulph of Bengal and the iſland of Sumatra, Dr. Kœmpfer had an opportunity of ſeeing theſe ſeveral countries; animated wherever he went with the ſame ſpirit of induſtry, and the ſame thirſt of knowledge (17).

(17) Idem, ibid.

[P] He turned his thoughts chiefly to the natural Hiſtory of the country about Batavia.] The rich and curious garden of Cornelius Van Outhorn, then Director General of the Dutch Eaſt India Company, Mr. Moller's garden, and the iſland Eidam, lying but a few leagues from Batavia, offered to his obſervation a great number of rare and ſingular plants, native and foreign, many of them till then unknown, the deſcription and figures whereof he intended to have publiſhed, together with many others obſerved by him in the courſe of his travels, particularly in Perſia, the iſland of Ceylon, the Kingdom of Siam, and the Empire of Japan, all which are now in the hands of Sir Hans Sloane (18) (19).

(18) This was writ about 1728.

(19) Idem, ibid.

[Q] He poſſeſt many good qualifications neceſſary for the making a good Botaniſt.] He had a competent knowledge of that ſcience, ſo far as it was improved in his time; a body inured to hardſhips; a great ſtock of induſtry and application, and an excellent hand at deſigning. With all theſe advantages he did not confine himſelf barely to the curious part of this ſcience, an accurate deſcription of the plants and their parts, which, though ever ſo neceſſary, is yet thought too dry a ſubject by the generality of readers: he endeavoured to make his obſervations beneficial to mankind; and took great pains to enquire into the various uſes of the plants he deſcribes, whether relating to Phyſic, Huſbandry, Manufacture, &c; as likewiſe into the manner of cultivating and preparing them, in order to make them ſerve for theſe ſeveral purpoſes, in all which he was very ſucceſsful (20).

(20) Idem, ibid. pag. xii.

[R] He ſet out for Batavia on his voyage to Japan.] To make all the advantages poſſible of this voyage, he obtained leave to go on board the ſhip which was ordered to touch at Siam, that he might have an opportunity of ſeeing that Kingdom alſo (21). After taking alſo a tranſient view of the Kingdom of Camboia, Southern China, and the adjacent countries, he arrived in Japan (22), where he reſided two years. This was not only the laſt Eaſtern country he intended to viſit, but alſo that which he had long deſired to ſee, and always conſidered as a ſubject worthy of a laborious enquiry. The almoſt inſurmountable difficulties, enough to deter even the moſt induſtrious, ſpurred him on to more painful reſearches; and he willingly ſacrificed his time, art and money, to procure for himſelf and others, a thorough information of a country, of which, till then, no ſatisfactory account had been given (23).

The long courſe of his travels, the fatigue of his profeſſion, and ſome private misfortunes in his family (b), had very much impaired his conſtitution; ſo that, after a variety of ailments, he died the ſecond of November 1716 [W], aged a little more than ſixty five years, and was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Nicholas at Lemgow (c). [W] He died . . . after a variety of ailments.] In the latter part of his life he was frequently troubled with the cholic, of which he had two very ſevere fits, one in November 1715, and another at the beginning of 1716. The laſt fit laid him up for three weeks; nevertheleſs he recovered it ſo far, that he was able to attend his Prince and family, in quality of their Phyſician at Pyrmont; whence he returned, in July, to his country ſeat (27) at Steinholf near Lemgow in pretty good health. However on the 5th of September following he was ſuddenly ſeized with fainting fits and a vomiting of blood, which continuing all night, brought him very low. From that time he continued in a lingering condition, though not altogether without hopes of recovery, having gathered ſtrength ſo far as to be able to walk about the room: but on the 24th of October, having been troubled, ever ſince this laſt attack, with a nauſea and loſs of appetite; his vomiting of blood returned very violently upon him, and a fever, which laſting till the ſecond of November, carried him off on that day (28).

The peruſal of his inaugural Theſes, and his Amœnitates exoticæ, gave Sir Hans Sloane the firſt idea of his abilities, and prompted him to purchaſe all his curioſities, and manuſcripts. The work for which our author is ſo deſervedly eſteemed, is his Hiſtoria Imperii Japonici &c. or the hiſtory of JAPAN: giving an account of the antient and preſent ſtate and government of that Empire; of its Temples, Palaces, Caſtles, and other buildings; of its metals, minerals, trees, plants, animals, birds and fiſhes; of the chronology and ſucceſſion of the Emperors, eccleſiaſtical and ſecular; of the original deſcent, religion, cuſtoms and manufactures of the natives, and of their trade and commerce with the Dutch and Chineſe. To which is added, part of a journal of a voyage to Japan, made by the Engliſh in the year 1673. Illuſtrated with many copper plates. In II Vol. folio. London 1728. This noble work is dedicated to the King by the learned tranſlator, who obſerves in his epiſtle, that it gives an account of a mighty and powerful empire, which owes its greatneſs to itſelf, and the flouriſhing condition it is in, to its being debarred all communication with other nations (29) It unfolds the rules and maxims of a government, where the mutual checks, jealouſies and miſtruſts of Perſons inveſted with Power are thought the moſt effectual means to oblige them to a faithful diſcharge of their reſpective duties: It ſhews a long ſeries of eccleſiaſtical emperors, all deſcended from one family, who ſwayed the ſcepter of Japan for upwards of two thouſand years, and ſtill keep up their titles, rank and grandeur, though diſpoſſeſſed of the ſupreme power by the ſecular monarchs; It deſcribes a valiant and invincible nation, a polite, induſtrious and virtuous people, enriched by a mutual commerce among themſelves, and poſſeſſed of a country on which nature hath laviſhed her moſt valuable treaſures (30). Dr. Kœmpfer ſays in his preface, that "if the pride and warlike humour of the Japoneſe "are ſet aſide, they are as civil, as polite and cu- "rious a nation as any in the world; naturally in- "clined to correſpond and entertain a familiarity "with foreigners, and deſirous to exceſs, to be in- "formed of their hiſtories, arts and ſciences (31)." He afterwards tells us, that beſides the private informations he received from thoſe who came to viſit him, he was particularly happy in the aſſiſtance of a diſcreet young man, by whoſe means he was richly ſupplied with whatever notices he wanted, concerning the affairs of Japan. This man, who was appointed to wait upon him, at his arrival in Japan, as his ſervant, was taught the Dutch language by him; after which he employed him to procure as ample accounts as poſſible, of the then ſtate and condition of the country, its government, the imperial court, the religions eſtabliſhed in the empire, the hiſtory of former ages, and remarkable daily occurrences, and this Japoneze was ſo very ſerviceable to our author, that he procured him and explained, whatever books he wanted (32). He had ſaid before; I can aſſure the reader, that both my deſcriptions and repreſentations of things, though perhaps leſs elegant and perfect, are yet ſtrictly agreeable to truth, and without embelliſhments, ſuch as they occurred to me. I muſt own that as to the more private affairs of the empire, I could not procure full and ample informations enough: It is known, how difficult a matter it is for a foreigner to do it in any country, and I found by experience that it is much more ſo in Japan. Ever ſince the Roman Catholick religion hath been extirpated, the Dutch and Chineſe Merchants in a manner impriſoned, and the whole empire ſhut up to all commerce and communication with foreign nations, the natives muſt be extremely cautious and reſerved in their behaviour with regard to theſe foreigners, who are permitted to trade lic is obliged to that great encourager of learning Sir Hans Sloane, who purchaſed, for a conſiderable ſum of money, all our author's curioſities both natural and artificial, as likewiſe all his drawings and manuſcript memoirs; and prevailed with the late learned Dr. Scheuchzer, to tranſlate the Japoneze Hiſtory abovementioned into Engliſh, which he has done in ſuch a manner as does the greateſt honour to his memory.

He afterwards declares, that all ſuch Japoneſe as have any tranſactions with the Europeans, are obliged to take an oath not to diſcover any thing relating to their government, country, &c. (34). Dr. Scheuchzer has given an excellent introduction to the hiſtory of Japan. "My "deſign therein, ſays the learned tranſlator, is in a "ſhort ſurvey of the preſent work, to point out ſome of "its peculiar excellencies, and to illuſtrate the whole "with a few additional remarks, tending to clear up "ſome doubtful points from the lateſt diſcoveries, and "to explain others which have been hitherto but "ſlightly, if at all, touched upon. As the tranſla- "tion and publication of this Hiſtory led me into "farther ſearches concerning the Empire of Japan, "and put me upon enquiring what other authors have "wrote on this ſubject, I thought that it would not "be unacceptable, nor altogether uſeleſs, to publiſh a "liſt of them, with ſome obſervations I made upon "peruſal, on the character, tranſactions and ſeveral "editions of the moſt conſiderable (35)." This introduction contains an ample catalogue of the authors, in the Library of Sir Hans Sloane, relating to the eccleſiaſtical, political, or natural hiſtory of Japan; and ends with a liſt, which is very curious, of the Japoneſe writers themſelves; the far greateſt part whereof, ſays Dr. Scheuchzer, were brought by Dr. Kæmpfer into Europe, and are now in the valuable collection of Sir Hans Sloane (36). A French tranſlation of this work, from the Engliſh, was publiſhed at the Hague in two volumes in folio, 1729, which is aſcribed to Mr. Des Maizeaux (37). There is alſo a ſecond edition of the French in 12mo. I.

KONIG (GEORGE MATTHIAS) in Latin Konigius, Profeſſor of Poetry and of the Greek tongue, and Library-Keeper in the Univerſity of Altorf, deſerves a place here in the moſt particular manner: for I ſhould be ungrateful if I did not acknowledge that the book which he publiſhed in the year 1678 (a) is of very great uſe to me. And I do not queſtion but it is alſo very uſeful to a great many men of letters, notwithſtanding the defects that have been obſerved in it [A]. Our Konig died towards the end of the year 1698, at the age of fourſcore and two (b). He was the ſon of GEORGE KONIG (c), a native of Amberg, who died in the year 1654, having taught Divinity thirty eight years in the Univerſity of Altorf.

(a) Intitled, Bibliotheca vetus & nova. I quote it often, and ſometimes I criticize upon it.

[A] The defects that have been obſerved in his work.] A very learned man named John Mollerus, who in the year 1691 publiſhed at Hamburg an Iſagoge ad Hiſtoriam Cherſoneſi Cimbricæ, (An Introduction to the hiſtory of Denmark) had publiſhed four years before Cimbriæ literatæ prodromus, "An eſſay on the hiſtory "of the learned in Denmark"; in which, according to that liberty, which every ſubject of the republick of Letters ought to enjoy, he ſpoke very freely of the defects he had obſerved in Konig's work. Whereupon Daniel William Mollerus an Hungarian, and profeſſor of Metaphyſicks and hiſtory in the Univerſity of Altorf, roſe immediately againſt the critick, and was nevertheleſs obliged to confeſs, that a great part of the defects, that had been obſerved, were real defects. Now the critic's judgment, as he has expreſſed it in a preface (1), comes in ſhort to this. Innumeros in Opere Konigiano autores eſſe omiſſos, de Antiquis pauciſſima ſatiſque confuſe in medium allata, è Recentiorum, etiam Polygraphorum, Scriptis quamplurimis plerumque vix unius aut alterius factam mentionem, ac raro Synopticam aliquam de Autoris patria, ætate ac vita, librique editi loco ac tempore, narrationem adjectam, manifeſtius eſt, quam ut latere lectorem eruditum, aut negari ab homine candido poſſit. Nomina etiam ſæpius, ut in Prodromo monui, & ſcripta falſa auctoribus eſſe attributa, circa patriam atque vitam illorum erratum, inedita pro editis venditata, & ex uno ſcriptore duos aut tres inepte procuſos, exemplis plurimis ὀφθαλμοφανεστάτοις poſſem oſtendere, ſi in expurgando hoc Augiæ ſtabulo tempus pariter atque operam vellem perdere, aut ſordes alius in præfationem hanc convectare. i. e. "A great many authors are omitted in Konig's work; "he tells us but very few particulars of the antients, "and without any order; and he hardly mentions "a book or two of the moderns, even of thoſe who "wrote a great deal, and publiſhed a vaſt number of "works; he ſeldom gives us ſo much as a ſhort ac- "count of their life, in what country they lived, "and at what time; nor does he tell us when and "where their books were printed. This is ſo evi- "dent, that it cannot be unknown to the learned, "nor denied by any candid man. He does alſo often "give falſe names to the authors he mentions, as "I have obſerved in my eſſay, and aſcribes works to "them, which they never wrote. He blunders in "mentioning their native Country, and the time when "they flouriſhed; he gives us manuſcripts for printed "books, and makes two or three authors out of one. "I could prove all this by a great many inſtances, if "I would loſe my time and labour in cleanſing this "Augean ſtable, or carry the dirt out of it into this "preface." He adds that his opinion in this reſpect agrees with that of ſeveral of the moſt learned men. Agnoverunt eandem, quotquot ex chori literarii primiceriis, de Opere Konigiano, aut eadem mecum, aut his etiam aſperiora judicarunt. Petrus ſcil. Lambecius, non alio, quam Rhapſodi, titulo Autorem dignatus (*), Dan. Georg. Morhofius (†), & (qui meum de eodem judicium ſuo verbotenus adjecit) ἀκριβέστατος Wilh. Ern. Tenzelius (‡). Alii item complures, quorum verba allegare ſupersedeo, cum rerum teſtimonia ipſi adverſario, nolenti volenti, veritatis confeſſionem extorſerint. Non audet enim is Bibliothecam hanc, cui patrocinatur, veterem ac novam pro accurata, aut talem, quæ Sæculi applauſum mereatur, venditare, ſed fatetur nomen in ipſa interdum cum nomine eſſe confuſum, errata nonnulla commiſſa, & Autores aliquot omiſſos, in qua ipſius confeſſione acquieſco. i. e. "This has been acknow- "ledged by the moſt eminent men in the repub- "lick of letters, who paſſed the ſame judgment with "me, or even a more ſevere one, on this work of "Konig. As Peter Lambecius, who did not think "he deſerved a better name than that of a Rhapſodiſt. "Daniel George Morhoff, and the moſt ingenious "William Erneſt Tenzelius (who added my judg- "ment word for word to his) and a great many more, "whoſe names it is needleſs to mention, ſince the "matter is ſo plain, that my adverſary has been forced "to acknowledge the truth, whether he would or "not. For he dares not maintain that this ancient "and modern Library, which he undertakes to vindi- "cate, is exact, or ſuch as to deſerve the approbation "of the world. But he confeſſes, that there is now and "then one name put for another, that there are ſome "blunders committed, and ſome authors omitted, in "which confeſſion I agree with him." Obſerve that Mollerus does not deny Konig the reputation of an old Profeſſor, who had done ſome ſervice to the Republic of Letters.

KOORNHERT (THEODORE) a native of Amſterdam, and Secretary to the City of Harlem in the ſixteenth Century, made himſelf famous by ſome very extraordinary

nary works on subjects relating to Religion (a). He is reckoned to have been one of those spiritualists or enthusiasts, who imagine that all the sects amongst the Christians were corrupted a great many ages ago, and that no man has a right to take upon him the office of a Minister of the Gospel without an extraordinary mission supported with miracles (b). And accordingly he condemned openly Luther and Calvin's undertakings, though he acknowledged that the Church of Rome was not the true Church. He wished that till such time as God should be pleased to raise reformers in all respects like the Apostles, all the Christian sects would unite together by way of interim [A]; his scheme being, that only the text of God's word was to be read to the people, without proposing to them any explication, and without prescribing the congregation any thing by way of commandment, or prohibition, but at most by way of advice. He did not believe that it is necessary, in order to be a true Christian, to be a member of any visible Church; and he acted accordingly [B], for he did not take the Sacrament either with the Roman Catholics or with the Protestants. He wrote very freely against the Reformed

[A] He wished.. that all the Christian sects would unite together by way of interim.] Hoornbeck, who had read over Koornhert's books written in Dutch, explains this fancy of his to us, in the following words. Iste Coonhert passim suis libris . . . aliquod schema Ecclesiæ communis erigendæ proponit, in quâ, vel solus Scripturæ textus legeretur, absque glossis & expositionibus, vel etiam admonitiones ex Scriptura sub aliorum judicio, non autem ex authoritate, aliquando fierent, ad modum alterius & novi Interim, usque dum novâ divinâque ad extruendam aliam Ecclesiam missione accederent Ministri quales Apostoli fuerunt, Ecclesiam ex Christi præscripto novam erecturi, quâ jam divina missione ad erigendam per Reformationem aliam Ecclesiam omnes, juxta eum, careant. Tomo primo, pag. ult. in delineatione istius Ecclesiæ sic loquitur. " Raro aut nunquam utuntur hic " humanis glossis non quod peccatum sit, sed quia incertum, a sole ad stellas, & a fonte ad cisternas re- " currere. Atque ita etiam nemo hic sibi (absque certa " & speciali missione) arrogat docendi officium, ut cum " authoritate mandet vel prohibeat, benè quidem ut sub me- " liori sententiâ admoneat, idque ex Scripturâ (1)." i. e. " This Koonhert throughout his books . . . proposes " some form of a Church, in which the Holy Scripture is only to be read, without any gloss, or exposition, or at most some warnings from the Scripture, with " submission to other people's judgment, be sometimes offered, but not with authority; thus he would " establish a kind of new Interim, till there should " come some Ministers like the Apostles, with a new " and divine mission, to establish another Church, according to Christ's command; all the Ministers at " present wanting, according to him, such a mission " to establish a new Church by way of Reformation. " In the last page of the first volume of his Description of that Church he speaks thus: These human " glosses or explications are seldom or never used, not " that it is a sin, but it is unsafe to go from the sun to " the stars, from the spring to the cistern. And none " take upon them, without a certain and particular " mission, the office of a Minister, to command or " forbid any thing without authority, but only by " way of advice, from the Scriptures, and with sub- " mission to other people's better judgment." This Visionary would have the Magistrates command the Preachers not to say any thing but what was contained word for word in the Scriptures, and oblige the Laymen, upon pain of paying a fine, to part with all their Theological books. You will meet with a more accurate account of this in the following Latin words (2). Hoc Libello vel Dialogo (3), ita sententiam suam exponit. " Existimo, magistratui significandum, quæcunque " scripta humana, glossas, dogmataque, quid impuri, " erroris & ambagis continere, a quibus omnibus immu- " nis est Scriptura, certam pandens salutis viam. Quare " reverenter rogandus esset, ut vellet ad modum novi " alicujus interim (& hoc ad tempus usque quo concorditer " decretum esset, qua doctrina sequenda foret) omnibus " Concionatoribus interdicere, ne è suggestu populum aliud " quid docerent, prælegerent, dicerentve, præter clarum " Scripturæ textum, citra unius sylabæ aut additionem " aut demtionem, quomodo in Veteri Novoque Testamento " solebat fieri. Hoc demum pacto sectus evaniturus. " Præterea populo sub mulcta injungendum esset, ut om- " nes suos libros de Scriptura tractantes, quæ ipsæ non " essent mera Scriptura, ad manus Magistratus defer- " rent, ibique servarentur, ut vel redderentur postmo- " dum suis Dominis, vel prout visum foret, de istis " disponeretur." Hæc Coornhertus. i. e. " In that " pamphlet or dialogue he expresses his opinion thus. " I think that we ought to give notice to the Magistrates, that all human writings, glosses and doctrines, contain something amiss, some errors, and " some ambiguities, from all which the Holy Scripture is entirely free, shewing us a safe way to salvation; the Magistrates therefore must be desired, " that they would be pleased to establish a kind of new " Interim (till such time as it should be unanimously " agreed what doctrine must be followed) and to forbid " all the Preachers to teach, read or say any thing " from the pulpit, but the bare text of the Scripture, " without adding or omitting one single syllable, as it " was the custom under the old and the new Testament. " This is the only method to make all sects vanish " away at last. And besides, the people must be ordered, under the penalty of a fine, to carry all their " books which treat of the Scriptures, and are not the " bare Scriptures, to the Magistrates, to be kept by " them, in order to be afterwards returned to the " owners, or otherwise disposed of, as it should be " thought proper." " Thus far Coornhert."

[B] He did not believe that it is necessary . . . . to be a member of any visible Church, and he acted accordingly.] As he did not think, that there is now one single Church upon earth without a blemish, and governed by true Pastors, he took the sacrament no where. He did not deny but it was necessary, for the security of those that are weak, to establish an outward communion, but he pretended that no man had a right to claim a divine mission, or to teach that it is necessary to take the sacrament. This is the substance of the Latin passage which I shall now transcribe. Coonhertus palam scribebat inter omnes sectas se nullibi Christi Ecclesiam deprehendere; Romanam nostrâ, quam ne quidam Ecclesiæ nomine dignabatur, meliorem esse, Tom. 1. in Dialogis, fol. 484. nec S. Collapsam quidem esse Dei Ecclesiam, sed non apparere manifestum mandatum eam restaurandi: attamen vile aliquod pro infirmis adversus varios lupos defendendis, sub tali nempe libertate, qua nemo sibi arroget, à Deo se ad docendum missum esse, & Sacramentorum baptismi ac Cœnæ usus relinquatur liber, pro infirmis habendum; nullum verò istorum urgeri debere præceptum aut necessitatem (4). i. e. " Coornhert wrote publicly, that amongst all " the sects he could meet no where with the Church of " Christ, and that the Church of Rome was better " than ours, which he would not honour even with " the name of a Church. *Tom. 1. And he was conſidered as ſo great a diſturber of Religion, that the Magiſtrates of Delft baniſhed him their City, and the States of Holland came to ſeveral reſolutions, which made him complain that they revived the Inquiſition (d). Nothing, in his opinion, was more inconſiſtent with Reaſon and with the Goſpel, than the perſecuting of thoſe who are not of the Religion eſtabliſhed by law. He wrote upon this ſubject againſt Beza, and againſt Lipſius [C]. He died October the 20th 1590 (e), acknowledging the truth of the doctrine of Predeſtination, which he had ſo ſtrongly oppoſed [D]. They publiſhed an edition of his works in the year 1630, in three volumes in folio. I ſhall obſerve below that he began pretty late to ſtudy [E]. Lewis Guicciardini (f) mentions an excellent Engraver who was born at Harlem (g), and named THEODORE COORNHERT. He is undoubtedly the ſame who is mentioned in Freherus's Theatre [F], and who is the ſubject of this article. This is all that I had been able to collect from ſome Latin books, and I was ready to ſend it to the preſs with the ſix remarks, which the reader will find below; and I had no thoughts of making any additions to this article, but being told that there was a Life of our Coornhert written in Dutch, and prefixed to his works, I have procured ſome extracts from it, which will give me an opportunity to make this article much longer. I met with the following particulars in thoſe extracts. Coornhert was born in the year 1522 of an ancient and good family of Amſterdam. Being ſtill very young he took a journey into Spain and Portugal, and on his return he married contrary to what his father, who was dead, had ordered by his laſt will, and without aſking his mother's advice. As he had taken a wife who had hardly any eſtate, he was obliged to enter into the family of Reynold of Brederode Baron of Vianen, who made him his ſteward, and whoſe favour he gained; but yet he ſoon left him, becauſe he did not like a Court-life. He ſettled at Harlem, and gained a livelihood there by following his profeſſion of an Engraver. Being puzzled with ſome difficulties upon Theological ſubjects, he imagined that he ſhould meet with the ſolution of them in St. Auguſtin, and in ſome other fathers: ſo that he began to learn Latin at the age of thirty; and he made ſuch a conſiderable progreſs in that ſtudy, that he was ſoon capable to tranſlate Tully's Offices and ſeveral other works into Dutch; he underſtood Muſic and Poetry, and was very agreeable at an entertainment, but ſo as always to direct his diſcourſes to the edification of his neighbour, and he never went beyond the rules of temperance. He loved working, and had made it his conſtant practice never to be above ſix hours in bed. He was admitted a Notary in the year 1561, and Secretary to the city of Harlem in the year 1562, and Secretary to the Burgomaſters of the ſame City in the year 1564. In the years 1565 and 1566 he was ſeveral times ſent to the Prince of Orange Governor of Holland, and had ſeveral conferences with Henry of Brederode on account of the troubles [G], which began to ariſe in the Low-Countries, and of the famous petition which was preſented to the Dutcheſs of Parma in April 1566. He was taken up at Harlem and carried to the Hague, where he ſuffered a long and cruel impriſonment; during his confinement he compoſed ſeveral Poems in Dutch. His wife being perſuaded that he ſhould never be ſet free, endeavoured to get the plague, that by communicating it to him they might both die. He reproved her ſeverely for ſuch an attempt, forbidding her to do the ſame again, and deſiring her to wait patiently how Providence ſhould diſpoſe of him. He defended himſelf ſo dexterouſly that he was ſet at liberty, being only commanded not to leave the Hague; but hearing that there were freſh orders come from Bruſſels to impriſon him again, he ſtole away to Harlem, and thence he went into the country of Cleves, where he got a livelihood by his old trade of an Engraver. The States of Holland having taken the vigorous reſolution in the year 1572 to aſſert their liberty againſt the tyranny of the Spaniards, Coornhert returned into his own country, and was honoured with the office of Secretary to the States of the Province. He had endeavoured to put a ſtop to the diſorders and diſturbances which the ſoldiers committed; and was deputed to inform againſt them, which made him ſo odious to the commanding officers of thoſe daring troops [H], that in order to ſecure his life he was

[E] He begun pretty late to ſtudy.] "I have ſeen at the Hague in Monſieur van Beuning's library the works of Theodore Volcard (11) Coornhert, in Dutch. He was an Enthuſiaſt, who had a very ready wit. He learnt the Greek and Latin tongues by himſelf (12) at the age of forty years, and made ſo great a progreſs in theſe two languages, that he could tranſlate any author into Dutch. He wrote ſeveral theological treatiſes, ſome of which have been refuted by Calvin and by Daneau. He wrote even againſt Lipſius, who anſwered him in his book de una Religione. The Dutch ſpeak of him as of a wonder. He died in the year 1590, at the age of 68 (13)." There are ſome exaggerations in this paſſage of Colomies. I have read in a very good author, that Koornhert was but thirty when he began to learn Latin (14). He was never thoroughly maſter it, and it is a great while ago ſince his writings have been much eſteemed. Obſerve that Boxhornius (15) relates moſt of the particulars contained in the paſſage quoted from Colomies.

(11) Obſerve that Volcard was not his name but his father's.

(12) It is obſerved in his Life, that Doctor John Baſius, who was afterwards Counſellor to the Prince of Orange, taught him Latin, but there is not a word ſaid of the Greek tongue.

He was alſo a good Poet. He died at Gouda in the year 1590, at the age of ſeventy eight (16). This is our Coornhert: But it ſhould have been ſaid that he died at the age of ſixty eight, and not ſeventy eight. See the margin (17).

[G] He had ſeveral conferences with Henry of Brederode on account of the troubles.] Coornhert had been ſteward to Rainold of Brederode, and had done him ſome ſervice. By this means he had made himſelf known in an advantageous manner to Henry of Brederode Rainold's ſon. He had conferences with him at Vienna, at Utretcht, at Amſterdam and at Harlem, concerning the means to maintain the liberty of his Country; and he perſuaded him to preſent to the Dutcheſs of Parma that petition, which had ſuch remarkable conſequences. He was the author of the firſt Manifeſto, which Prince William publiſhed in his Camp (18), and which was intitled, An advertiſement to the inhabitants of the Low Countries, for the Law, for the King, and for the flock (19). Bor, who mentions that Manifeſto in the fourth book of his hiſtory, folio 182, declared to ſome perſons, that he knew perfectly well, Koornhert had compoſed it (20.)

was obliged to go into a voluntary baniſhment. He acquainted the Prince of Orange and the States of Holland with the reaſons which obliged him to look for a ſanctuary, and retired to Embden: he returned to Harlem when things were in a better ſituation, and engaged in controverſies, in which the moſt zealous Miniſters were his antagoniſts. He publiſhed ſeveral writings in defence of his cauſe, which he maintained by diſputations at Leyden and at the Hague; he went to live at this laſt place, that he might be the ſooner ready to enter the liſt. Theſe verbal diſputations being prohibited by the authority of the Sovereign [I], he petitioned the States and the Miniſters ſeveral times, particularly in the Synod held at Gouda, deſiring that theſe diſputations might be continued and completed; he preſented alſo a petition to the Prince of Orange upon the ſame ſubject, and ſupported it by ſeveral arguments. He humbly requeſted of him, that in caſe his whereby they expoſed him to a thouſand dangers. They had a very plauſible pretext to repreſent him thus; for he was continually aſſerting, that it was but juſt, and the intereſt of Holland, not to perſecute the Roman Catholics, but to perform the promiſe which the Prince of Orange had made them, concerning the free exerciſe of their religion, &c. Count de Lumei, who commanded the army in Holland, was very far from performing that promiſe. Koornhert blamed his conduct with ſome freedom; and was therefore traduced as a moſt curſed favourer of Popery. Count de Lumei, with whom they had made him very odious, ſwore his ruin, and gave orders to kill him. He was not ſafe either in the roads in the country, nor in the ſtreets in the towns. He applied to the Prince of Orange for his protection, but this was not ſufficient to balance the great credit which the Count had with the ſoldiers. So that Koornhert was obliged to retire into the country of Cleves (21). This happened in the year 1572. Obſerve that he was ſo far from favouring the cauſe of the Spaniards, that he was excepted by name from the Act of Oblivion, which Lewis de Requeſens cauſed to be proclaimed at Bruſſels in the year 1574, in favour of thoſe who within two months ſhould receive abſolution from a Prieſt (22). Let us relate here a ſtory which ſhews, that Koornhert did not love the Church of Rome, and yet wiſhed that the Papiſts might be allowed a liberty of conſcience.

The private exerciſe of their religion was prohibited in Holland in the year 1580. Some of them deſired Koornhert to draw up a petition to be preſented to the Prince of Orange, praying that they might have the free exerciſe of their religion in the Monaſteries at Harlem, and in the Church which the Proteſtants had abandoned when they made themſelves maſters of the great Church. Koornhert being obliged to appear before the Magiſtrates of Harlem to anſwer about that petition, delivered it into their hands according to the orders he had received, and declared that he did not pretend to defend it, nor to plead the cauſe of the Popiſh Church, which he conſidered as a neſt of murtherers, but that he was nevertheleſs perſuaded, that it was doing an injury to the Roman Catholics, not to keep the promiſe that had been made to them, and to refuſe them liberty of conſcience. The Burgomaſters gave this petition to the Prince of Orange, who referred it to the States. The latter ſent for the citizens of Harlem, who had ſigned it, and commanded them to blot out their names. They alſo ordered Koornhert to tear the rough-draught of it in pieces: all which was done accordingly (23).

[I] Theſe verbal diſputations being prohibited by the authority of the Sovereign.] Here follow ſome particulars concerning the diſputations. They were begun at Delft in the year 1578, and were firſt occaſioned by a certain man, who had forſaken the Church of Rome, and turned Proteſtant; he gave ſuch reaſons for his changing his religion, as ſhewed that he was but very indifferently acquainted with both. Koornhert told him plainly, You muſt now examine whether the religion you have choſen be better than that which you have left. He was obliged to anſwer for theſe words; for there was a great outcry made about them, and a very odious conſtruction put upon them: and this occaſioned the conference that was held between Koornhert and two Miniſters at Delft, and in which they diſputed about the marks of the true Church. Koornhert undertook to prove, that the Churches which admitted the doctrines of Calvin and Beza, were falſe Churches; and grounded his aſſertion upon theſe three articles, that of predeſtination, that of juſtification, and that of puniſhing heretics. The conference was hardly begun, when the ſtates of the province put a ſtop to it. It was renewed by their order, and in the preſence of their Commiſſioners at Leyden April the 14th: but it continued only a day and a half, for Koornhert retired, complaining that his adverſaries made uſe of the ſecular power againſt him: he boaſted that he had ſilenced the two Miniſters, though he had not been ſuffered to attack them upon the laſt article (24). He pretended that his mentioning Calvin and Beza furniſhed his adverſaries with an evaſion, becauſe the Commiſſioners declared the States would not ſuffer that theſe two Miniſters of Geneva ſhould be concerned in that controverſy; ſo that Koornhert might expect to ſuffer from the reſentment of the States. Finding himſelf thus threatened, he declared that he would no more come to a meeting, where he had not full liberty to ſpeak. The Commiſſioners and the Miniſters went nevertheleſs to the place where the conference had been firſt held. They waited for Koornhert, ſent to his houſe, and took his abſence for a flight, and for an unqueſtionable proof of his defeat. The States of Holland prevailed with the Magiſtrates of Harlem to forbid him to publiſh any thing relating to this conference (25).

Some years after he wrote againſt the Catechiſm of Heidelberg, which the Reformed Churches had admitted. He dedicated his work to the States of the province, repreſenting to them with an exceſſive boldneſs the bad conſequences, which he pretended would attend the admitting of that Catechiſm, and the deſign, which he ſaid the Miniſters had to put every one under a neceſſity to think and to ſpeak as they did. He begged that theſe misfortunes might be prevented, and offered to prove his aſſertions. The Miniſters alſo preſented to the ſame States a writing full of complaints againſt Koornhert, and declared that they were ready to prove their propoſitions. The States, after mature deliberation, reſolved, with the approbation of the Prince of Orange, to make Koornhert diſpute with the Miniſters, in the preſence of fifteen Deputies. Hadrian Saravia, Divinity Profeſſor at Leyden, was choſen to maintain the cauſe of the Miniſters. They appointed a Notary for him, and another for Koornhert, that all that ſhould be ſaid on both ſides might be taken down in writing in the moſt authentic manner. The diſpute began at the Hague October the 27th 1583, and continued till the 3d of November, on which day Koornhert begged leave of the Commiſſioners to go to Harlem to ſee his wife who was dying. The diſpute began again November the 28th. But as Saravia had dictated very long writings to his Notary during four days following, the Deputies reſolved to ſend Koornhert home, that he might there compoſe his anſwer. It was ſtill more prolix than Saravia's writings, and was refuted by a reply of the Miniſters much more prolix ſtill. The States hearing that of above fifty articles, which were to be examined, ſo many meetings had been ſpent in treating of one only, judged that they would never ſee the end of this affair, and put a ſtop to it. Koornhert boaſted that he had gained the victory, and that he went on purpoſe to live at the Hague, that he might be more at hand to diſpute. Notwithſtanding the order of the States to break off the conferences, the parties continued to attack each other in writing (26).

(26) Ibid. B. 13. pag. 693, 694, 695. under the year 1583.

The Synod of South-Holland meeting at Gouda in Auguſt 1589, Koornhert, who lived in the ſame city, ſent a letter to the aſſembly, offering to begin the diſpute again. The Synod having read the letter, ſent it back to the author, declaring they had nothing more to do with him, and that if he deſired any thing he might apply to the States (27).

his petition was rejected, he might at leaſt be ſuffered to continue to refute the errors in a modeſt and chriſtian manner, and to enjoy in this reſpect that liberty of conſcience, which had been ſo dearly bought; and in caſe this alſo was denied him, the laſt favour he begged was, that he might have leave to retire into ſome country ſituated near Holland, and in alliance with it, that he might employ the remainder of his life in compleating an Index to the Holy Scriptures; to the writing of which he had already applied himſelf twenty ſix years, and that he might alſo enjoy liberty of conſtience, and avoid the dangers to which he was expoſed, the hardſhips of poverty and want, and the offence which the Proteſtant Church might take at him. He aſked for a ſafe conduct, and promiſed that he would return to the Hague to finiſh the diſputation, as ſoon as it would be thought proper to recall him. All his petitions being rejected, he continued nevertheleſs to declare that he found a great many errors in the Catechiſm of Heidelberg; by which he only raiſed more enemies againſt himſelf; he was exclaimed againſt and expoſed from the pulpit, and in other places: he was loaded with injuries and ſlanders; and had a great many vexations to ſuffer, his conduct having prepoſſeſſed and exaſperated a great number of perſons againſt him. He ſuffered this adverſity with great moderation and conſtancy. It is very probable that the Prince of Orange protected him [K]. None in thoſe times wrote ſo ſtrongly as he did in favour of the liberty of his country, and of liberty of conſcience [L]. His writings againſt the doctrines of Predeſtination and of Original Sin were ſupported with ſo many arguments, that when the Conſiſtory of Amſterdam charged James Arminius, ſome years after, to refute them, that Miniſter anſwered, that he did not think that he himſelf or any other perſon could find in the holy Scripture wherewithal to refute thoſe arguments (h). When he had almoſt finiſhed his Dutch Tranſlation of Eraſmus's Paraphraſe (i), he had a fit of ſickneſs, during which time he gave ſtrong proofs of his patience and held very edifying diſcourſes till he expired, truſting in God's mercy, October the 29th (k) 1590. He was buried at Gouda (l); for he would not be buried at Amſterdam where he was born, nor at Harlem, where he continued longer than in any other place. He has been commended by Iſaac Pontanus in his deſcription of the City of Amſterdam, and by Grotius, and even by his adverſary Juſtus Lipſius. This is what I borrow from the Latin Extracts of Theodore Koornhert's Life written in Dutch, which Extracts have been communicated to me. I ſhall tranſcribe ſome other particulars from them in the remarks. the

(k) I have quoted an author above, who ſays the 20th. But this difference is owing probably to that which is between the old and the new ſtyle; and alſo to this reaſon, namely, that when a man dies in the night between the 19th and the 20th day of a month, ſome ſay he died the 19th and others the 20th.

(l) In the great Church, with a very honourable epitaph, written by his good friend Henry Laurence Spiegel. See Gerard Brandt, Hiſtory of the Reformation in the Low-Countries, book 15. under the year 1590.

[K] It is very probable that the Prince of Orange protected him.] It is certain that the Prince knew him to be a man of genius, a great lover of liberty, and a great enemy to the Spaniards; ſo that he judged him proper to be employed in the affairs of thoſe times. He made uſe of his pen on ſeveral occaſions; he charged him with divers commiſſions, and deſired that he ſhould be recalled from his baniſhment (28): and one can hardly comprehend how Koornhert had been able to ſtand his ground againſt the great number of his enemies, had he not been ſecretly ſupported by a powerful protection, artfully managed: for he had not the leaſt regard for the public doctrines of the Churches of Holland; he attacked the calling of the Miniſters, he condemned all the ſects, and would have the Roman Catholics enjoy a full liberty of conſcience, which conſidering the circumſtances of thoſe times would have been very dangerous. His cenſure of the Catechiſm of Heidelberg was ſo bold and abuſive, that ſince the States of Holland, who had it examined by a Profeſſor of Divinity and by a Miniſter, only ordered that the copies of it ſhould be lodged in the hands of the Magiſtrates (29), we ought to think that ſome perſons, who had an unlimited power, protected him. If the Prince of Orange had not been dead, when Koonhert went to live at Delft, I do not believe that the Magiſtrates would have commanded him to leave that city in four and twenty hours time, as they did in the year 1518 (30). Some perſons would have him impriſoned for the remainder of his life, but the Prince of Orange and the Sovereign Magiſtrates would not conſent to it (31).

[L] None . . . wrote ſo ſtrongly as he did in favour of the liberty of his country, and in favour of liberty of conſcience.] Whilſt he was at Santen (32) in a voluntary baniſhment during the year 1574, he drew up the plan of a book, in which he deſigned to ſhew to all Chriſtian Princes, that the conduct of thoſe provinces which reſiſted the King of Spain and the Duke of Alva, was not a rebellion, nor a popular inclination to pull down images, but a conſequence of that ſovereign right which all nations have to defend their privileges, their laws, and liberty of conſcience. Add to this what I have related in the remark [H]. The Acts of the Pacification of Cologne, begun in the year 1579, publiſhed at Delft with a licence from the States, and with excellent notes by Haggai Albada, an intimate friend of our Koornhert, are thought to be the work of the latter. Euſebius Philalethes aſcribes all this to him in a book printed in the year 1617. See alſo Koornhert's firſt treatiſe againſt Juſtus Lipſius. In the year 1584 he wrote a pamphlet concerning the means of reſiſting the King of Spain; and ſhewed amongſt other things, that the Dutch muſt put themſelves under the protection of the French King. Being perſuaded that peace amongſt Chriſtians is one of the moſt important doctrines of the Goſpel, and that it could not be obtained but by reducing the articles neceſſary to ſalvation to a very ſmall number, and by ſuffering a diverſity of opinions with regard to the other articles, he endeavoured as much as lay in his power to put things upon that footing. He ſupported his opinion in this particular by the authority of the great Eraſmus (33), and agreed with two Doctors of the Reformed Church (34); it ſeems even that Prince William was a little inclined that way, Conſult Bor's Hiſtory, Book XXI, folio 107.

Koornhert was continually ſaying, that Luther, Calvin and Menno had briſkly attacked an infinite number of errors of the Roman Catholics; but that they ſucceeded very ill with regard to the horrid and impious doctrine of perſecuting for conſcience ſake; and that inſtead of refuting it effectually, they had rather confirmed it the more, each of them acting from that principle, when and where they could be maſters; having thus raiſed up a new Papacy by erecting a ſchiſmatical Church, which condemns all the other Churches. By this means, ſaid he, they have encouraged Popery to continue its ancient method; and they have not only gained nothing againſt its perſecuting maxims, but they have even introduced new confuſions, and new ſchiſms, by depriving men of the liberty of propheſying (35). As for him, he maintained that we ought to hate no man, and that all pious perſons, who by their faith in Jeſus Chriſt endeavour to imitate him, are good Chriſtians; and that the Magiſtrates ought to hold all peaceful inhabitants for good and loyal ſubjects (36). He was ſo full of that hypotheſis, that he made a ſacrifice of his reſt, and of all his temporal advantages, to aſſert it with all the courage, wit and learning he was maſter of (37).

I ſhall alſo make uſe of ſome Latin Extracts from a work of Gerard Brandt, I mean the Hiſtory he wrote in Dutch of the Reformation of the Low-Countries. They were made by the ſame perſon who communicated to me thoſe from Koornhert's Life, and who underſtands Dutch very well, and is very accurate. I believe that we may depend upon him.

KORNMANNUS (HENRY) a German Civilian, author of ſome pretty curious treatiſes [A], and which bore ſeveral impreſſions. He lived in the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century.

[A] Author of ſome pretty curious treatiſes.] That intitled de Virginitatis jure Tractatus novus & jucundus, ex jure civili, canonico, patribus, hiſtoricis, poëtis, &c. confectus, and that which is commonly joyned with it intitled, Linea Amoris, ſive Commentarius in verſiculum Gl. viſus, colloquium, convictus, oſcula, factum, have borne ſeveral impreſſions. The oldeſt edition that I know of is of Frankfort 1610. The ſubject is great and fruitful, but this author always rides poſt; he does not go to the ſcource of things, and publiſhes nothing but very true particulars, and is very fit for thoſe who love brevity. His other works are as follow. Templum Naturæ hiſtoricum, ſeu de natura & miraculis quatuor Elementorum. De Miraculis vivorum, ſeu de natura, proprietatibus &c. hominum vivorum, Frankfort 1614. De Miraculis mortuorum, &c. Some one has ſaid, that Kirchmannus, in his book de Funeribus Romanorum borrows a great number of particulars from this laſt work of our Kornmannus (1). Nevertheleſs I do not find that the treatiſe de Miraculis mortuorum was before 1610. Now the book de Funeribus Romanorum was printed in 1604. The author indeed gave a new edition of it in 1625, and he might have taken advantage of the treatiſe of our Kornmannus, with regard to his additions. This may be examined another time, in caſe there be opportunity for it.

KORTHOLT (CHRISTIAN) Doctor and Profeſſor of Divinity at Kiel, was born the 15th of January 1633 at Burg in the Iſle of Femeren (a). He was educated very carefully in piety and learning, in his father's houſe, and at the ſchool of Burg till ſixteen years of age, after which he was ſent to Sleſwick where he continued his ſtudies two years. He afterwards ſtudied in the College of Stetin, and there gave public proofs of the progreſs he had made; he maintaining two theſes (b), the one de veracitate & taciturnitate, and the other de natura Philoſophiæ ejuſque in Theologia uſu. He was author of the latter. Going to Roſtoch in 1652, he aſſiduouſly frequented the Lectures of the Profeſſors, and maintained two other theſes (c) to great advantage, the firſt whereof he had wrote. His father's death obliged him to leave that Univerſity in a year; but he returned to it ſome months after, and there gave new proofs of his erudition, as well by the theſis or diſputation de Chriſto θεανθρώπῳ which he compoſed and defended publickly, as by the Lectures he read at home on Logic, Metaphyſics and Hebrew. He took his degree, in a ſolemn manner, of Doctor of Philoſophy in the year 1656; and afterwards went and ſtudied in the Univerſity of Jena, where he gained great reputation by the academical acts, wherein he was ſometimes reſpondent, and ſometimes moderator; and by the private Lectures he read on Philoſophy, the Eaſtern Tongues, and Divinity. He left the Univerſity of Jena in 1660; and went and viſited thoſe of Leipſic and Wittemberg, and returned afterwards to Roſtoch, where he diſplayed his capacity a variety of ways; ſo that, in February 1662, he was made Greek Profeſſor. He took his degree of Doctor in Divinity in December the ſame year. Not long before he had ſhewed his genius and learning, in three diſputes with Roman Catholics [A], in preſence of Chriſtian Duke of Mecklenburg. He married the 26th of April 1664; and the next year was invited to be the ſecond Profeſſor of Divinity, in the Univerſity founded juſt before in Kiel. his petition was rejected, he might at leaſt be ſuffered to continue to refute the errors in a modeſt and chriſtian manner, and to enjoy in this reſpect that liberty of conſcience, which had been ſo dearly bought; and in caſe this alſo was denied him, the laſt favour he begged was, that he might have leave to retire into ſome country ſituated near Holland, and in alliance with it, that he might employ the remainder of his life in compleating an Index to the Holy Scriptures; to the writing of which he had already applied himſelf twenty ſix years, and that he might alſo enjoy liberty of conſtience, and avoid the dangers to which he was expoſed, the hardſhips of poverty and want, and the offence which the Proteſtant Church might take at him. He aſked for a ſafe conduct, and promiſed that he would return to the Hague to finiſh the diſputation, as ſoon as it would be thought proper to recall him. All his petitions being rejected, he continued nevertheleſs to declare that he found a great many errors in the Catechiſm of Heidelberg; by which he only raiſed more enemies againſt himſelf; he was exclaimed againſt and expoſed from the pulpit, and in other places: he was loaded with injuries and ſlanders; and had a great many vexations to ſuffer, his conduct having prepoſſeſſed and exaſperated a great number of perſons againſt him. He ſuffered this adverſity with great moderation and conſtancy. It is very probable that the Prince of Orange protected him [K]. None in thoſe times wrote ſo ſtrongly as he did in favour of the liberty of his country, and of liberty of conſcience [L]. His writings againſt the doctrines of Predeſtination and of Original Sin were ſupported with ſo many arguments, that when the Conſiſtory of Amſterdam charged James Arminius, ſome years after, to refute them, that Miniſter anſwered, that he did not think that he himſelf or any other perſon could find in the holy Scripture wherewithal to refute thoſe arguments (h). When he had almoſt finiſhed his Dutch Tranſlation of Eraſmus's Paraphraſe (i), he had a fit of ſickneſs, during which time he gave ſtrong proofs of his patience and held very edifying diſcourſes till he expired, truſting in God's mercy, October the 29th (k) 1590. He was buried at Gouda (l); for he would not be buried at Amſterdam where he was born, nor at Harlem, where he continued longer than in any other place. He has been commended by Iſaac Pontanus in his deſcription of the City of Amſterdam, and by Grotius, and even by his adverſary Juſtus Lipſius. This is what I borrow from the Latin Extracts of Theodore Koornhert's Life written in Dutch, which Extracts have been communicated to me. I ſhall tranſcribe ſome other particulars from them in the remarks. the

(k) I have quoted an author above, who ſays the 20th. But this difference is owing probably to that which is between the old and the new ſtyle; and alſo to this reaſon, namely, that when a man dies in the night between the 19th and the 20th day of a month, ſome ſay he died the 19th and others the 20th.

[K] It is very probable that the Prince of Orange protected him.] It is certain that the Prince knew him to be a man of genius, a great lover of liberty, and a great enemy to the Spaniards; ſo that he judged him proper to be employed in the affairs of thoſe times. He made uſe of his pen on ſeveral occaſions; he charged him with divers commiſſions, and deſired that he ſhould be recalled from his baniſhment (28): and one can hardly comprehend how Koornhert had been able to ſtand his ground againſt the great number of his enemies, had he not been ſecretly ſupported by a powerful protection, artfully managed: for he had not the leaſt regard for the public doctrines of the Churches of Holland; he attacked the calling of the Miniſters, he condemned all the ſects, and would have the Roman Catholics enjoy a full liberty of conſcience, which conſidering the circumſtances of thoſe times would have been very dangerous. His cenſure of the Catechiſm of Heidelberg was ſo bold and abuſive, that ſince the States of Holland, who had it examined by a Profeſſor of Divinity and by a Miniſter, only ordered that the copies of it ſhould be lodged in the hands of the Magiſtrates (29), we ought to think that ſome perſons, who had an unlimited power, protected him. If the Prince of Orange had not been dead, when Koonhert went to live at Delft, I do not believe that the Magiſtrates would have commanded him to leave that city in four and twenty hours time, as they did in the year 1518 (30). Some perſons would have him impriſoned for the remainder of his life, but the Prince of Orange and the Sovereign Magiſtrates would not conſent to it (31).

[L] None . . . wrote ſo ſtrongly as he did in favour of the liberty of his country, and in favour of liberty of conſcience.] Whilſt he was at Santen (32) in a voluntary baniſhment during the year 1574, he drew up the plan of a book, in which he deſigned to ſhew to all Chriſtian Princes, that the conduct of thoſe provinces which reſiſted the King of Spain and the Duke of Alva, was not a rebellion, nor a popular inclination to pull down images, but a conſequence of that ſovereign right which all nations have to defend their privileges, their laws, and liberty of conſcience. Add to this what I have related in the remark [H]. The Acts of the Pacification of Cologne, begun in the year 1579, publiſhed at Delft with a licence from the States, and with excellent notes by Haggai Albada, an intimate friend of our Koornhert, are thought to be the work of the latter. Euſebius Philalethes aſcribes all this to him in a book printed in the year 1617. See alſo Koornhert's firſt treatiſe againſt Juſtus Lipſius. In the year 1584 he wrote a pamphlet concerning the means of reſiſting the King of Spain; and ſhewed amongſt other things, that the Dutch muſt put themſelves under the protection of the French King. Being perſuaded that peace amongſt Chriſtians is one of the moſt important doctrines of the Goſpel, and that it could not be obtained but by reducing the articles neceſſary to ſalvation to a very ſmall number, and by ſuffering a diverſity of opinions with regard to the other articles, he endeavoured as much as lay in his power to put things upon that footing. He ſupported his opinion in this particular by the authority of the great Eraſmus (33), and agreed with two Doctors of the Reformed Church (34); it ſeems even that Prince William was a little inclined that way, Conſult Bor's Hiſtory, Book XXI, folio 107.

Koornhert was continually ſaying, that Luther, Calvin and Menno had briſkly attacked an infinite number of errors of the Roman Catholics; but that they ſucceeded very ill with regard to the horrid and impious doctrine of perſecuting for conſcience ſake; and that inſtead of refuting it effectually, they had rather confirmed it the more, each of them acting from that principle, when and where they could be maſters; having thus raiſed up a new Papacy by erecting a ſchiſmatical Church, which condemns all the other Churches. By this means, ſaid he, they have encouraged Popery to continue its ancient method; and they have not only gained nothing againſt its perſecuting maxims, but they have even introduced new confuſions, and new ſchiſms, by depriving men of the liberty of propheſying (35). As for him, he maintained that we ought to hate no man, and that all pious perſons, who by their faith in Jeſus Chriſt endeavour to imitate him, are good Chriſtians; and that the Magiſtrates ought to hold all peaceful inhabitants for good and loyal ſubjects (36). He was ſo full of that hypotheſis, that he made a ſacrifice of his reſt, and of all his temporal advantages, to aſſert it with all the courage, wit and learning he was maſter of (37).

I ſhall alſo make uſe of ſome Latin Extracts from a work of Gerard Brandt, I mean the Hiſtory he wrote in Dutch of the Reformation of the Low-Countries. They were made by the ſame perſon who communicated to me thoſe from Koornhert's Life, and who underſtands Dutch very well, and is very accurate. I believe that we may depend upon him.

KORNMANNUS (HENRY) a German Civilian, author of ſome pretty curious treatiſes [A], and which bore ſeveral impreſſions. He lived in the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century.

[A] Author of ſome pretty curious treatiſes.] That intitled de Virginitatis jure Tractatus novus & jucundus, ex jure civili, canonico, patribus, hiſtoricis, poëtis, &c. confectus, and that which is commonly joyned with it intitled, Linea Amoris, ſive Commentarius in verſiculum Gl. viſus, colloquium, convictus, oſcula, factum, have borne ſeveral impreſſions. The oldeſt edition that I know of is of Frankfort 1610. The ſubject is great and fruitful, but this author always rides poſt; he does not go to the ſcource of things, and publiſhes nothing but very true particulars, and is very fit for thoſe who love brevity. His other works are as follow. Templum Naturæ hiſtoricum, ſeu de natura & miraculis quatuor Elementorum. De Miraculis vivorum, ſeu de natura, proprietatibus &c. hominum vivorum, Frankfort 1614. De Miraculis mortuorum, &c. Some one has ſaid, that Kirchmannus, in his book de Funeribus Romanorum borrows a great number of particulars from this laſt work of our Kornmannus (1). Nevertheleſs I do not find that the treatiſe de Miraculis mortuorum was before 1610. Now the book de Funeribus Romanorum was printed in 1604. The author indeed gave a new edition of it in 1625, and he might have taken advantage of the treatiſe of our Kornmannus, with regard to his additions. This may be examined another time, in caſe there be opportunity for it.

KORTHOLT (CHRISTIAN) Doctor and Profeſſor of Divinity at Kiel, was born the 15th of January 1633 at Burg in the Iſle of Femeren (a). He was educated very carefully in piety and learning, in his father's houſe, and at the ſchool of Burg till ſixteen years of age, after which he was ſent to Sleſwick where he continued his ſtudies two years. He afterwards ſtudied in the College of Stetin, and there gave public proofs of the progreſs he had made; he maintaining two theſes (b), the one de veracitate & taciturnitate, and the other de natura Philoſophiæ ejuſque in Theologia uſu. He was author of the latter. Going to Roſtoch in 1652, he aſſiduouſly frequented the Lectures of the Profeſſors, and maintained two other theſes (c) to great advantage, the firſt whereof he had wrote. His father's death obliged him to leave that Univerſity in a year; but he returned to it ſome months after, and there gave new proofs of his erudition, as well by the theſis or diſputation de Chriſto Θεανθρώπῳ which he compoſed and defended publickly, as by the Lectures he read at home on Logic, Metaphyſics and Hebrew. He took his degree, in a ſolemn manner, of Doctor of Philoſophy in the year 1656; and afterwards went and ſtudied in the Univerſity of Jena, where he gained great reputation by the academical acts, wherein he was ſometimes reſpondent, and ſometimes moderator; and by the private Lectures he read on Philoſophy, the Eaſtern Tongues, and Divinity. He left the Univerſity of Jena in 1660; and went and viſited thoſe of Leipſic and Wittemberg, and returned afterwards to Roſtoch, where he diſplayed his capacity a variety of ways; ſo that, in February 1662, he was made Greek Profeſſor. He took his degree of Doctor in Divinity in December the ſame year. MATTHIAS NICHOLAS KORTHOLT and SEBASTIAN KORTHOLT, his brothers, had already given excellent teſtimonies of their genius. JOEL JOHN KORTHOLT, the youngeſt of all, purſued his ſtudies very happily, and was a very promiſing youth. Natu minor, theſe are the words of the funeral Programma. JOEL JOANNES, pietatis & literarum ſtudio diligenter incumbens, optimam de ſe ſpem excitat, quam abunde jam impleverunt ætate profectibuſque multò majores, MATTHIAS, NICOLAUS, & SEBASTIANUS, pluribus præclaris bonæ indolis ingeniique excellentis ſpeciminibus editis. i. e. "JOHN "JOEL, the youngeſt, applying himſelf aſſiduouſly "to piety and literature, gives the moſt hopeful pro- "miſes, which MATTHIAS, NICHOLAS, and SEBAS- "TIAN had already greatly fulfilled, they being much "older than he, and having made a much greater "proficiency in learning, and given many ſpecimens "of an excellent diſpoſition and genius." I have ſeen the diſſertation de Poëtis Epiſcopis, which Sebaſtian Kertholt publiſhed in 1699, and ſubmitted to the examination of the learned, examini Eruditorum publico, when he was preparing to receive his Doctor's degree in philoſophy: Pro ſummis in Philoſophia honoribus impetrandis. It is a very curious piece, and ſhews the author's great reading. Since the printing of this, I have ſeen two other of his works, of which I form the ſame judgment; the firſt is intitled Diſquiſitio de enthuſiaſmo Poëtico, and was printed at Kiel in the year 1696, in 4to. The other treats de Puellis Poëtriis omiſſis ab Adriano Bailleto, and was printed in the ſame city, in the year 1700, in 12mo, I have alſo heard that the author has been made poetical Profeſſor in the univerſity of Kiel in February 1701; and

KOTTERUS (CHRISTOPHER) was one of the three Fanaticks, whoſe Viſions were publiſhed at Amſterdam in 1657, with the following title, Lux in tenebris [A]. He lived at Sprottaw in Sileſia, and his viſions began in June 1616. He fancied he ſaw an that Matthias Nicholas, his brother, having been invited to be profeſſor of eloquence and poetry in the univerſity of Gieſſen, made his inaugural oration the 22d of June 1700. It treated de antiqua eloquentia recentiorum perperam poſtpoſita à Carolo Peralto ſcriptore libri, cujus eſt titulus, Parallêle des anciens & des modernes &c. I thought this oration a very good one. The elogium of this profeſſor may be ſeen in a letter of Mr. Majus (6), dated at Kiel the 22d of May 1700.

[A] The following title, Lux in tenebris.] I took notice elſewhere (1) why this title was given it, and therefore will not repeat it here. This work was printed in 1657, at the expence of a rich patron (2) whom Comenius had met with in Amſterdam. It comprehends the viſions or revelations of our Chriſtopher Kotterus, thoſe of Chriſtina Poniatovia, and thoſe of Nicholas Drabicius. Comenius publiſhed an abridgment of them in 1660, with this title, De Revelationum divinarum in uſum ſeculi noſtri factarum Epitome. He republiſhed the whole work with additions, and under the following title, Lux è tenebris novis radiis aucta &c. This laſt edition contains the ſequel of Drabicius's Revelations till the year 1666. A Divinity Profeſſor in Franeker, a Pole, named Nicholas Arnoldus, wrote publicly and ſpeedily againſt this work, and anſwered Comenius's Apology. Des Marets (Mareſius) Divinity Profeſſor at Groningen, attacked this ſame work in his theſes de tribus Videntibus, anno 1659; and when he publiſhed ten years after, an anſwer (3) to a little piece of Comenius concerning the Millenium, he reproached him more than once, and with great ſtrength, for printing the pieces of thoſe three pretended Prophets. This work, in a few years, was contemned and forgot; but was prodigiouſly ſought after when the Turks beſieged Vienna 1683. Thoſe who had lodged the copies of it in garrets, where they had laid a long time, took them out, and ſold ſeveral at a high price; and had the Turks made themſelves maſters of Vienna, I do not doubt but a new edition of it muſt have been made, how dear ſoever the copies might have coſt. A great number were ſought after in France, and Mr. d'Avaux ſent ſome thither, whence we may very much wonder why Mr. Jurieu ſuppoſed, in 1691, that Drabicius was not known in Paris. This is an unpardonable ſuppoſition, becauſe he himſelf, not long before, had greatly contributed to ſpread the name of that fanatic all the world over. Beſides, he alledged this ſuppoſition as a proof of a ſtate-crime; for he pretended that the Avis aux Refugiez, i. e. "Advice to the "Refugees," as it mentioned Drabicius, could not have been writ in France. Theſe are particulars which my readers could hardly be induced to credit; and therefore it will be neceſſary for me to prove them, by giving an account of the reply that was made to him. Here then follows the anſwer which was made him by the author he accuſed (4).

"The perſon (*), who wrote this Avis, gives a cir- "cumſtantial account of Drabicius's prophecies; he "has ſeen it, he has read it, and knows all the parti- "cularities concerning it.

"Now the Literati of Paris ſcarce know Drabicius's "name.

"Conſequently the author of the Avis is not in "Paris.

"If I ſhould deny his firſt propoſition, I am ſure he "could never be able to prove it; becauſe it does not "appear from the Avis aux Refugiez, that the author "of it knew any more of Drabicius, except that he "did all that lay in his power, to ſtir up a war againſt "the Houſe of Auſtria. Now could not any man of "letters know this, without having ever read the "books of that prophet?

"But the ſecond propoſition is ſtill more viſibly "falſe. For not to ſay that, during the ſiege of "Vienna, Drabicius's book was very much talked "of in France, and that ſeveral copies of it were ſent "for from hence; I my ſelf was deſired by a friend "of Roan to ſend him one, who does not know that "the great elogiums which Mr. Jurieu has beſtowed "on the prophetical triumvirate, I mean on Chriſtina "Poniatovia, on Kotterus, and on Drabicius, in a "(ã) work more common, and more univerſally ſpread "than Almanacks, as he himſelf boaſts (ẽ), mak- "ing uſe of the moſt juſt compariſon that was ever "employed; who does not know, I ſay, that the "great elogiums beſtowed on Drabicius, and ſo well "adapted to make this Prophet become the topic of "all converſations, have drawn on the panegyriſt ſome "very mortifying cenſures from the Biſhop of Meaux "(ĩ), and of Mr. Peliſſon (), in books publiſhed "at Paris before the Advice to the Refugees was printed? "Who can doubt that the ſatyr entitled l'Eſprit de "Mr. Arnauld, which has been in ſo much vogue "ſince the year 1684, excited a curioſity in a num- "berleſs multitude of Frenchmen to ſee Drabicius's "prophecies, the plan (õ) whereof is drawn by Mr. "Jurieu in ſuch a manner, that he promiſes the pub- "lic, on one hand, from Drabicius, the ruin of the "Houſe of Auſtria; to the King of France the Im- "perial Crown; to the Turks the taking of Vienna, "Carinthia, Stiria; with the deſtruction of the com- "monwealth of Venice, and of the city of Rome? "And to promiſe, on the other hand, in the name of "the Proteſtants, all that they can do to fulfil thoſe "prophecies?" The Literati of Paris muſt have been very ſtupid, had they not enquired after a work of which Mr. Jurieu has given the following idea. "I "found, ſays he (5), in the prophecies of Kotterus, "Chriſtina, and Drabicius, which Comenius publiſhed, "ſomething great and ſurprizing. Kotterus, the firſt "of theſe three Prophets, is great and lofty; the "images of his viſions are alſo noble and majeſtic, "that thoſe of the antient prophets are not more ſo. "They all are wonderfully well concerted or drawn "up; they are all of a piece, and no inconſiſtency is "found in them. I cannot conceive how it was poſſi- "ble for a meer mechanic to hit upon ſuch exalted "things without the aſſiſtance of God. The two "years of Chriſtina's prophecy are, in my opinion, a "ſeries of miracles, as great as have happened ſince "the Apoſtles time: nay, I have not met with any "thing in the lives of the greateſt Prophets more mi- "raculous than what has befallen the maiden in "queſtion. Drabicius has alſo his loftineſſes, but then "he is much more difficult and obſcure. Theſe three "Prophets agree in foretelling the fall of the Anti-Chri- "ſtian Empire, as what muſt come to paſs very ſoon: but "on the other hand, ſo many things in them offend, "that one cannot well ſet one's heart upon them." Had not this excited a deſire of knowing Comenius's prophetical collection; at leaſt thoſe would have had ſuch a curioſity as had ſeen Peliſſon's Reflections on the diſputes concerning Religion: for when a writer has diſplayed a great deal of haughtineſs, it is impoſſible for a perſon not to feel ſome joy, when he ſees ſuch a writer mortified as Mr. Jurieu was by the following words of M. Peliſſon. "A Prophet, and more "than a Prophet; doubtleſs a forerunner of the Mille- "nium which he declares to us; who, at leaſt, aſſumes "the authority of reforming, correcting, and chaſtiſ- "ing at pleaſure, thoſe whom he has expreſly acknow- "ledged to be inſpired men and prophets (*); a "ſet of people whom the event has already proved to "be guilty of and hundred impoſtures; and whom "Heaven has juſt now confounded in the ſight of the "whole world, by the taking of Buda, though they "had aſſured us, in the name of God, that the "Chriſtians would never recover it by force of arms, "but by a treaty with the Turks (6)." He gave (7) expreſs proofs of all this, by citing Mr. Jurieu's own words (8); and the places where Drabicius declared ſo expreſly, that Buda ſhould never get out of the hands of the Turks but in an amicable way. When people are affected towards an author, as the Pariſians were with regard to Mr. Jurieu, they are ſo highly pleaſed to ſee ſuch an author convicted either of impoſture or fanaticiſm, that they will go to the ſource of ſuch a conviction. But is it true, ſay theſe people, that Drabicius an angel under the form of a man, who commanded him to go and declare to the Magiſtrates, that unleſs the people repented, the wrath of God would make dreadful havock. Though he had received this order ſix times ſucceſſively, he yet did not put it in execution; he being diſſuaded from it by his paſtor and his friends: but imagining, in April 1619, that he ſaw the ſame ſpirit, who threatened him with eternal damnation in caſe he continued ſilent, he executed his commiſſion in a full aſſembly of the Magiſtrates, the 29th of Auguſt 1619. Kotterus was laughed at; the viſions or apparitions continued, and were followed by extaſies and prophetic dreams. The Elector Palatine, whom the Proteſtants had declared King of Bohemia, was introduced in theſe viſions. Kotterus waited upon him in Breſlaw in December 1620, and informed him of his commiſſion. He went to ſome other places, and at laſt, in the year 1625, to the Court of Brandenburg [B] (a). He got acquainted the ſame year with John Amos Comenius, who did all that lay in his power to promote his prophecies (b) [C]. Now as moſt of theſe bicius affirms ſuch a particular? may one not ſee this with one's own eyes, that no ſcruple may be left, to leſſen the ridiculouſneſs of ſuch a ſcene? Then the people in queſtion ſeek for one of Drabicius's books wherever they think it may be found: and if they cannot meet with any of them, they nevertheleſs treaſure up the name in their memory, and conſider it as worthy of ridicule.

No one can ſay that I digreſs from my ſubject; for ſince it is a falſity, in point of fact, to aſſert that Drabicius's name was ſcarce known in France in the year 1690, it belongs properly to this Dictionary; and it was proper for me to make uſe of all the proofs which refute this falſity.

Had Mr. Jurieu been contented with ſaying, that in comparison of the noiſe which Drabicius's name would have made in France, in caſe the Turks had taken Vienna, he was ſcarce known at Paris when the Advice to the Refugees was writ; I am of opinion that he would not have been in the wrong; for had Vienna been taken, Drabicius would have been more talked of than the Grand Viſier. The book which Jurieu wrote during the ſiege of that city, to praiſe and vindicate Comenius's three Prophets, by fine illuſtrations and learned commentaries, would have been tranſlated into ſeveral languages, and have made Drabicius, for a long time, the topic of converſations. Now his performance came to nothing with regard to Drabicius's memory, by the raiſing of the ſiege; the mighty Sobieſki, at the diſtance of two or three hundred leagues, deſtroyed a book that was juſt going to preſs. I began to know during the ſiege of Vienna, how greatly I had miſtook, in imagining that mankind were quite cured with regard to thoſe chimerical hopes that are ſo often grounded on viſions. I met every where with people, who ſpoke of nothing but Drabicius's prophecies, of the truth of which they ſeemed perfectly perſuaded; and who built ſo many caſtles in the air, that they were to deſtroy Babylon in an inſtant. They could not ſufficiently wonder how Drabicius came to gueſs ſo pat with regard to Tekely. This is what I wanted them to ſay; for I made it appear that Tekely, at that time the great actor of this Opera, makes no manner of figure in Drabicius's book, which is a perfect nullity I do not doubt but the French would have been vaſtly attentive, had the Grand Viſier ſucceeded in his enterprize; and they would gladly have aſſiſted the credulous, in making them believe as much as poſſible, with regard to Drabicius's viſions, ſince they promiſe the Empire to the King of France. It is therefore certain, that this falſe Prophet's name would have become infinitely more famous in Paris, in caſe the Turks had taken Vienna.

[B] He went... in the year 1625 to the Court of Brandenburg.] The Elector George William having heard the great noiſe which Kotterus's Revelations made, had a mind to ſee him. He then put it into the hands of the Divines of Francfort on the Oder, in order for them to examine it; after which he ſent for them twice to Berlin, the firſt time in 1625 and afterwards in 1626. The fame of our Kotterus having reached Straſburg, it made ſuch an impreſſion on one of the Burgomaſters there, that he ſent a meſſenger into Sileſia, to deſire Kotterus to explain to him ſixty two points; and to come to Straſburg where his prophetic miniſtry might be in greater ſafety. Kotterus anſwered the ſixty two queſtions; but excuſed himſelf from going to Straſburg, upon his declaring that he had no commiſſion for it from the Spirit, and permitted his picture to be ſent to the Burgomaſter (9).

(9) Comenius, in Epit. Revelat. Append. 3. pag. m. 209.

[C] He got acquainted... with John Amos Comenius, who did all that lay in his power to promote his prophecies.] After the Emperor's edicts, by which all Proteſtant Miniſters of Bohemia and Moravia, in the year 1624, were ordered to leave the country, it was reſolved in a private aſſembly, held in March in 1625, that the Miniſters of Bohemia ſhould retire into Poland, and thoſe of Moravia into Hungary; and that ſome of them ſhould be deputed with letters, both into Poland and Hungary, to prepare a reception for them. Comenius was ſent into Poland. Paſſing through Gortlitz in Luſatia, the tutor of young Count de Zerotin informed him, as a very conſolatory article of news, that the ruin of Antichriſt was at hand, ſince the Holy Ghoſt had revealed this to one Chriſtopher Kotterus, an honeſt man of Sileſia. He mentioned and read ſeveral paſſages in it; and becauſe Comenius made too many ſcruples, he adviſed him to go upon the ſpot, in order to confer with the Prophet. Comenius paſſing through Sprottaw deſired to ſee Kotterus, but was told by his wife that the Elector of Brandenburg had ſent for him. This was likewiſe confirmed to him by the Miniſter of the place (10), who aſſured him that Kotterus was a true Seer, and gave him his Revelations to read. Comenius waited for Kotterus, during which time he peruſed and meditated on the manuſcript in queſtion, and was amazed at it. Not long after he ſaw Kotterus, performed his journey, returned ſoon to Sprottaw, tranſlated the manuſcript of Revelations into the Bohemian language, and was fully convinced that they came only from God. He returned to Poland, and carried the Prophet thither, who informed him in the way, that he knew by Revelation that a Council would be held of all Chriſtendom, wherein the Pope would be depoſed, and a Canon enacted, forbidding all perſons hereafter to uſurp the title of univerſal Biſhop. Comenius repreſented to him, that he had not read that article in the manuſcript, to which Kotterus made the following anſwer, I have not been ordered to write it, but I nevertheleſs heard it. Being returned from Poland, Comenius left Kotterus, and went to Berlin, where he found that, even among the refugees of Bohemia and Moravia, a very different judgment was formed of this man; ſome conſidering him as a true Prophet, and eſpecially when the poſt brought advice, that the King of Denmark was raiſing a body of troops; others declared that Kotterus was a knave, who having ſpent his all, and not knowing which way to turn himſelf, had ſet up for a Prophet. Alii rurſum ex iiſdem meis ſcabioſiſſima de Cottero effutiebant: helluonem, rei ſuæ decoctorem, deſperationeque ad prophetandum adactum dictitantes, miraque de prophetiis ipſius mendacia inter ſe ſpargentes, mihique referentes (11). This gave Comenius ſome uneaſineſs; but Chriſtopher Pelargus, Superintendant General of the Churches of Brandenburg, who had examined Kotterus by the Elector's order, made him eaſy, by ſaying, that he ought not to queſtion the truth of this man's extraordinary miſſion, nor repent his having tranſlated his Revelations into the Bohemian Language. Vides hanc Bibliothecam meam (inſtructiſſimam habebat, celeberrimus ob eam totam per Germaniam, quo me ſecretius hoc colloquium expetentem introduxerat) omnes Authores, antiquos & recentes conſului, ut quid de quæſtione illa, Utrum poſt Chriſtum & Apoſtolos, obſignatumque Novi fœderis Canonem, ullæ novæ admittendæ ſint, divi- theſe things related to preſages of felicity with reſpect to the Elector Palatine, and unhappineſs for his Imperial Majeſty; it ſo fell out that David Wachſman, the Emperor's Fiſcal or Exchequer Attorney in Sileſia and Luſatia, ſet every engine at work to ſeize Kotterus, whom he looked upon as a ſeditious impoſtor. Accordingly Kotterus fell into his hands the ſecond of January 1627. He was examined, was thrown into a dungeon, and the ſentence of the Chamber of Appeals was waited for from Prague. The Fiſcal Attorney received it the 28th of April, but happening to die a little after, the purport of it was not known. Kotterus was taken out of the dungeon, and his wife and friends were allowed to viſit him; but he at laſt was ſet on the pillory [D], and baniſhed the Emperor's dominions, not to return upon pain of death. Upon this he went to Luſatia, at that time ſubject to his Electoral Highneſs of Saxony, and lived there unmoleſted till his death, which happened in 1647 (c). It is by an error of the preſs that he is ſaid, in Moreri's Dictionary, to have lived fourſcore and twelve years [E]. Comenius is inexcuſable for printing ſuch prophecies [F]. He had ſeen part of them evidently næ vel Angelicæ, revelationes ſentiendum ſit cognoſcerem? ſed nemo me ſcrupulis liberare potuit. Ego igitur ad preces converſus, ardentiſſime invocabam Deum (ſæpe etiam noctu ſurgens & me in faciem provolvens) ut ne pateretur illudi Eccleſiæ ſuæ orans. Poſt omnia vero tandem penſitata divinitusque ſuggeſta, non aliud habeo quod dicam, niſi DEUM MISISSE ANGELUM SUUM, qui nuntiaret nobis ſervis ea, quæ oportet fieri cito: quæ ſunt Angeli verba Apoc. 22, 6. (12). The tranſlation in queſtion was not kept ſecret as the author ſays he deſired; but was ſhewn to perſons who would keep a copy of it by them, by which means the copies multiplied prodigiouſly in Bohemia; a circumſtance which however we need not wonder at, as it promiſed King Frederick an hundred triumphs. Some time after it was printed, in the Bohemian tongue, at Perna in Miſnia, with encomiums and marginal notes. However all the Miniſters were not caught in this trap. Two of them, with ſome of the Elders of their Church, blamed the copying of the book in queſtion. The intereſt of the true faith, and the danger to which they expoſed themſelves, were the two cauſes or motives which prompted them to vote for the ſuppreſſion of thoſe chimæra's, as being either a meer invention, or the wild dreams of an enthuſiaſt. Scriptum illud (ſive id ab aliquo ingenioſo conflictum, ſive ab ipſo fanatico homine conſcriptum eſſet) ſupprimi petierunt. Duplex enim ſubeſſe periculum: & Conſcientiarum, ſi ſe homines a certo Dei Verbo ad incerta id genus figmenta abduci paterentur: & Corporis atque vitæ, ſi hæc in adverſariorum veniant manus (13). In 1626, the Electreſs Juliana, mother of King Frederic, having informed a Moravian Nobleman of high diſtinction, who as well as herſelf was at that time a refugee in Berlin, that ſhe had received a letter from the King her ſon, to enquire whether it was poſſible to get a manuſcript copy of the prophecies of the Sileſian; the Nobleman abovementioned procured a copy of them; and not being able to preſent it himſelf, becauſe he was ſick, he employed Comenius, at that time in Berlin, to do it. Comenius, inſtead of delivering it to the Electreſs, went directly to the King, who was at the Hague, where being admitted to audience, he made a ſpeech to him; and told him, among other particulars, that ſince his Majeſty and his children were the principal characters in that divine Drama, the perſons poſſeſſed of it would have thought themſelves guilty of an abſurdity, had they not communicated it to his Majeſty. Cujus (Cotteri) omnia cum ſint in ſcriptum relata, ibidemque Majeſtas Veſtra, cùm Progenie ſuâ, tanquam primaria in hac Dei Comœdia introducitur Perſona: abſurdum viſum eſt illis, qui ea ſuis hactenus cuſtodierunt manibus, ad notitiam Majeſtatis veſtræ hæc non deduci. Non quidem ut Majeſtati Veſtræ iſta præcisè credendi imponatur neceſſitas, ſed, Primùm, ut hæc apud Majeſtatem veſtram tanquam in archivo ſacro aſſerventur, in futurum teſtimonium: nè, ſi demùm poſt completa prædicta hæc palam fiant, ex eventu ſic eſſe collecta, ſuſpicari quis, aut calumniari poſſit. Deinde, ut occaſio ſit attendendi, num fortè divina providentia tales in eventus res diſponat. (Nam ſi de imminente rerum mutatione Politicos diſcurſus, vel Aſtrologicas prædictiones, aut ſimiles Prudentiorum conjecturas, cognoſcere non aſpernamur, cur hæc ab altiori venientia principio aſpernari libeat?) Curarunt itaque ex authentico deſcribi exemplar, quod Majeſtati veſtræ per me humili cum obſervantia exhibent: ſimulque exhibui (14). This is not meant, adds he, to impoſe on your Majeſty the neceſſity of believing theſe things; but only to deſire you to keep them in your archives; in order that if they are confirmed by the event, no one may have room to object, that thoſe predictions were made after the event; and that you likewiſe may have an occaſion to obſerve from thence, whether providence prepares the way to thoſe great revolutions.

The myſtery lies here; they would have Princes who are capable of executing a deſign, and intereſted in the execution of it, form ſuch a deſign, in hopes of ſucceeding in it. This is very frequently the firſt ſpring or motive of our Prophets and Apocalyptical Commentators, and of thoſe who favour and ſupport them. But to reſume the thread of our Hiſtory.

Comenius was graciouſly received and diſmiſſed by King Frederic, and went to Bohemia, whither Kotterus went alſo in October 1626, and was in conference with ſome Miniſters and Gentlemen (15).

The following paſſage does not appear to me accurate. Quam turpiter vero in horum (Cotteri & Drabicii) & Chriſtinæ Poniatoviæ virginis Bohemiæ conatibus, qui ejuſdem omnino farinæ erant, juvandis modo dictus Comenius ſe dederit, è Voetii Diſpp. part. 2. p. 1080 (16). i. e. Diſp. part. "2. pag. 1080." Thus ſpeaks Hartnac, in his new edition of Micrælius's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. He had juſt before condemned the pretended Prophecies of Kotterus, and Comenius who publiſhed them. He had been ſaying, that Drabicius's head and hand had been cut off, he having juſtly deſerved that puniſhment. Interceptus in illo regno (Hungariæ Drabicius) capite manuque amputatis libro quoque cui titulus, Lux in Tenebris, infami loco combuſto dignam pœnam luit (17). He adds immediately after, that it appears from pag. 1080, of Tom. II. of Voetius's Diſputations, that Comenius committed a moſt ſhameful fault in publiſhing the Revelations of the perſons in queſtion. I have conſulted this place in Voetius; but there is not ſo much as one word relating to Comenius, either in page 1080 or the following.

evidently convicted of falſity by the event; and ſince his death, they have been more and more refuted by the courſe of affairs in Europe. The Turks who, according to Kotterus, were to ruin the Houſe of Auſtria, have reſtored it to its former glory by their continual cies.] Heaven forbid that I ſhould pronounce judgment, with regard to my neighbour's thoughts. Thoſe myſteries belong only to God; but on ſome occaſions men may give their judgment on appearances; much more may I be allowed to relate, hiſtorically, the judgment of others with regard to Comenius's conduct. Whilſt he reſided in Pruſſia, ſome debates were made concerning him in the Courts of ſome Princes; and it was given as a caſe of conſcience, to examine, whether he would not deſerve the puniſhment enacted by the Law of God againſt falſe Prophets. He has been ſuſpected to have been Counſellor and Secretary to thoſe who meditated an inroad into Bohemia; and which would have been put in execution, had the Engliſh (19) furniſhed them the ſuccours deſired. He, and thoſe of his character were looked upon as the abettors of the war which Ragotzki and the Princes Radzivil undertook againſt Poland. The object that was ſet before their eyes, in order to excite them to take up arms, was the delivery of the Church from Papal tyranny. I relate nothing here but what I have good authority for, Arnoldus writing as follows to Comenius. Prævaricatio illa, quam dicis, tanti tamen non fuit, ut ſuper ea in aulis Principum deliberaretur, caſus conſcientiæ formati viris doctis decidendi mitterentur, an ſim falſus Propheta, & conſequenter, an in me pœna divinitus in falſos Prophetas ſtatuta animadvertendum non eſſet, quod de te in Boruſſia cum adhuc morarer perſcriptum memini, & forte autographum illarum literum adhuc poſſideo. Tanti, inquam, non fuit illa prævaricatio, ut propter eam πολυπράγμων audirem, ac deſertâ ſtatione mea Profeſſoria, Magnatibus pro ſtabello in concitandis motibus bellicis eſſem, uti de te rumor eſt, qui à manu & conſiliis intimis fuiſſe illis diceris, qui in Bohemiam irruptionem ante annos moliebantur, ſi modo annuiſſent illorum votis Angli ſollicitati. Ego id non dico, quanquam ſtilus literarum tuo non ſit abſimilis. Jam per rumores in Boruſſia (uti, niſi me omnino fallat memoria, illinc ad te perſcripſi,) audiveram, Principes Radzivilios & Rakocium à vobis fuiſſe inductos, qui arma contra Polonos capeſſerent, ſpe liberandæ Eccleſiæ à tyrannide Pontificia, cujus rei haud exigua paſſim in volumine illo triuno extant argumenta. Ego tamen non definio (20). i. e. "Nevertheleſs the prevarication you "mention, was not ſo great, as to occaſion deliberation about it in the Courts of Princes; and for caſes "of conſcience to be drawn up, and ſent to learned "men, in order that they ſhould give the deciſion of "them whether I am a falſe Prophet; and in conſequence thereof, whether the puniſhment which "Heaven inflicts on falſe Prophets ought not to be inflicted on me; which I remember was writ with regard to you, at the time that I reſided in Pruſſia; "and I happen ſtill to have the copy of thoſe letters "by me. I ſay, that that prevarication was not ſo "great, as to get me the name of medling fellow, "who, abandoning my Profeſſorſhip, am as an incendiary in ſtirring up the great to engage in war; as "is reported concerning you, who are declared to have "been the principal fomenter of thoſe, who intended, "in caſe the Engliſh had ſuccoured them, as was deſired, to have made an inroad into Bohemia ſome "years ſince. However, I don't pretend to affirm "this, although the ſtyle of the letters is not unlike "yours. I before had heard it reported in Pruſſia, "(which I informed you of by letter from thence, if "my memory fails me not) that the Princes Radzivil "and Ragotzki, had been excited by you, in order "that they ſhould take up arms againſt the Poles, in "hopes of freeing the Church from Popiſh tyranny, "whereof many ſtrong arguments or proofs, in many "places, appear in that three-one volume. Never"theleſs, I don't determine any thing." I don't wonder that Comenius ſhould have been ſuſpected of carrying on political machinations and intrigues of war; for a Divine who travels ſo much as he, and has buſineſs ſo often in the Courts of Princes, is a man who is not to be very much truſted. The Electreſs, mother to King Frederic, aſks whether a collection of Kotterus's Prophecies can be procured; the perſon to whom ſhe makes the application gets a copy tranſcribed; and not having an opportunity of preſenting it, he deſires Comenius to do it. The laſt mentioned, who is at Berlin, and could, in a quarter of an hour's time, preſent it to the Electreſs, chuſes rather to come to the Hague, in order to give it into King Frederic's own hand, and harangue him on the contents of the book in queſtion, which would, at leaſt, ſaid he, make him attentive to the occurrences (21). Theſe perſons foretel the things they deſire ſhould be attempted; and after this they ſet every engine at work, in order to engage all ſuch in the enterprize as they think fit for it. It is very probable, that the great application with which Comenius laboured at the reunion of the Proteſtants (22), proceeded from a deſire he had to form a powerful party, which might fulfill the Prophecies with temporal weapons. Another circumſtance did Comenius an injury: he was a man of parts and learning; he argued very ſenſibly on other matters, and in theſe like a man of wit; and there was nothing in his perſon that appeared like an enthuſiaſt. This made people conclude that he did not believe the things he uttered. There may be, and there ſometimes is, impoſture in extatic grimaces; but thoſe who boaſt their being inſpired, without ſhewing by their countenance or expreſſions that their brain is diſordered, and without ever doing any action that is out of nature, ought to be infinitely more ſuſpected of fraud, than thoſe who, from time to time, fall into ſtrong fits, as the Sybils did more or leſs.

I am willing to have it thought, that Comenius did not harbour any ſiniſter deſign. But what ſhall we ſay againſt thoſe who cenſure him for publiſhing Kotterus's Prophecies, as inſpired by heaven, even when the event had proved the falſity of them (25)? I will own that this appears to me quite inexcuſable. And with regard to Drabicius, could any one imagine that he was inſpired by heaven? Had heaven inſpired him, he would have been ſtrongly deſirous that Prince Ragotzki ſhould deſtroy the Houſe of Auſtria, and have known that heaven deſigned him for that mighty work. But had heaven been ſtrongly inclined to this, would he not have inſpired that Prince with a deſire of engaging in war againſt the Emperor, or at leaſt with ſome little credulity in favour of Drabicius? Here follows a circumſtance, that ſhews the obſtinacy of Comenius. His ſon-in-law (26) deſired Arnoldus, Profeſſor of Divinity in Franeker, to favour his father-in-law with his his good advice, he ſeeming to heſitate about the printing of the three Prophecies. Arnoldus adviſed him not to print them (27); his ſon-in-law did the ſame (28), and enforced his opinion with very ſtrong reaſons. But how ſhould Comenius follow the advice of two perſons, ſince he had paid no deference to the decree of the Poliſh Churches, which, after having examined the pretended Revelations of Kotterus and Chriſtina Poniatovia, ſentenced them to be for ever ſuppreſſed? Cotterianæ & Poniatovianæ viſiones ut vanæ ad ſilentium & tenebras fuerunt ab illis condemnatæ (29).

[G] The Turks who, according to Kotterus, were to ruin the houſe of Auſtria, have reſtored it to its former glory by their continual loſſes.] See, on this occaſion, the indecent inſults of the author of the advice to the Refugees. It is certain, ſays he (30,) that the glory and felicity of his imperial Majeſty in this war againſt the Turks are wonderful; and that God, to the eternal confuſion of the prophecies of your DRABICIUS, has given greater ſucceſs to the Prince than to the Emperour Charles V. That falſe prophet, more eager at curſing than Balaam, who, even when a neighbouring Monarch importuned him with mighty promiſes, would do nothing raſhly, pronounced againſt the houſe of Auſtria, during ſeveral years, the moſt dreadful curſes that came into his head; and had devoted it, as it were, to the furies and infernal Gods, Diris & numinibus infernis, becauſe it had perſecuted their religion. But the event has ſhewn that he did not underſtand the trade, and that he was not very expert at curſing. No man ever leſs deſerved the elogium which was beſtowed on Balaam, he whom thou bleſſeſt ſhall be bleſſed, and he whom thou curſeſt ſhall be curſt; and if all your prophetical imprecations are like thoſe of Drabicius, people will be extremely ſollicitous hereafter to be curſed by you; and you will be ſought for with greater importunity to utter them, than the King of the Moabites employed, to make the falſe prophet Balaam curſe his enemies. Since the printing of the advice to the Refugees, the ſucceſs of the Emperor's arms has been interrupted ſometimes (31); but this has been but a ſhort reſpite for the Turk; their ill fortune ſoon diſplaying itſelf with its utmoſt fury. This fortune had like to have cruſhed them laſt year (32): She made them feel every were her indignation, in Dalmatia, Hungary, Poland and the Archipelago; and, if our Gazettes are to be credited, they loſt two naval battles in a very ſhort ſpace of time, laſt winter; thus the victors have not thought proper to purſue their victory, but rather to abandon the iſland of Chios. The new Sultan raiſes in ſome meaſure the hopes of the Port. They apply to him what Florus ſaid of Trajan, viz. that the empire, which was almoſt ruined by the indolence of former Emperors, was reviving, and reflouriſhing under Trajan. Quibus inertia Cæſarum quaſi conſenuit atque decoxit, niſi quod ſub Trajano Principe movet lacertos, & præter ſpem omnium ſenectus imperii, quaſi reddita juventute, revireſcit (33); but we do not find hitherto, according to the relations of our Gazetteers, that he has been very ſucceſsful. With regard to Tekely, who, during the ſiege of Vienna, was exhibited to us as Drabicius's chief Hero, we have lately been told in our news papers, that the Turks, quite weary with the continual malignity of his ſtar, have impriſoned him in the ſeven Towers.

(33) Florus in Præmio, Ext.

This I wrote in October 1695. at a time when we ſaw a kind of ſuſpenſion of the great and glorious fortune of the imperial arms in Hungary. The Paris Gazettes daily magnified the victory which the Sultan had lately gained, whilſt the other News Papers were perpetually leſſening it. It was not yet known according to thoſe news-writers, to which party the conſequences of this battle would be favourable. The progreſs of the Turks would have confirmed the accounts given by the Paris news-writers, and refuted thoſe of Holland and Germany. But the Turks made no progreſs at all; they retiring a little after into their own territories, without atchieving one action that ſhewed them to be conquerors, whereby the conteſt was ended to the confuſion of the Paris news-writers. His imperial Majeſty's arms triumphed afterwards, and chiefly in 1697, when the Turks ſuſtained ſo complete, ſo ſhameful and prejudicial a victory, that the like can hardly be found in their annals. The Sultan, who was there in perſon, received ſo ſignal an overthrow on this occaſion, that he thought of nothing but peace; and accepted it in the following year on any conditions which the victors were pleaſed to preſcribe; conditions exceedingly glorious and advantageous to his imperial Majeſty. No falſe prophets ever met with ſuch cruel affronts, as thoſe which the prophecies publiſhed by Comenius received by this ſignal treaty of peace. The Emperor, whom they ſo highly menaced, mortified, humbled, and trod under foot the haughtineſs of the Turks, to whom they had promiſed ſo many conqueſts over the houſe of Auſtria. He added the ſplendor of an advantageous peace to the glory which had accompanied his arms; and which had made him triumphant, as well by the reduction of the ſtouteſt places, as by the gaining of ſeveral battles. All things are at his diſpoſal in Tranſylvania; he has made a kingdom (34), which was always elective, hereditary; and he formerly poſſeſſed but a little part of it, but is now maſter of the whole. What ſhall we ſay of the advantages and glory he gained by the treaty of Ryſwick; by the recovery of ſo many countries which had been taken from the Empire, or his allies; and by the reunion of Friburg and Briſac to the hereditary dominions of the houſe of Auſtria? If the Prince in queſtion is happy abroad, he is no leſs ſo at home; fecundity, marriages &c. give proſperity to his family. His ſecond ſon is to inherit almoſt the whole monarchy of Spain, by ſuch ſtipulations as France it ſelf has conſented to fix (35). Take warning by theſe confuſions of Comenius's falſe prophets, all you who had preſumed to menace, with the book of revelations, all thoſe who are not agreable to you.

(34) That of Hungary.

(35) I write this in June 1706, at a time when the News-writers mention a treaty of Partition of the Spaniſh Monarchy, agreed upon by France, England, and the States-General.

[H] The ſame ſuſpicions are entertained of a Miniſter, whoſe Prophecies are more recent.] What I have ſaid of Comenius, I apply to a famous divine of Rotterdam, who has explained the ſcripture prophecies, with an extreme bold pretence of his being inſpired. I do not take upon me to judge of his heart, and will allow it to be ſuppoſed, that he did not act againſt his conſcience; but no one ought to be offended with my declaring, that he has been ſuſpected to harbour no other deſign than that of exciting people to take up arms, and to ſet all Europe in a flame. The foundation of their belief is this, viz. his not ſhewing any ſigns of confuſion, after that the event had given the lie to his prophecies, in ſuch a manner as was quite indiſputable. He entertained, ſay theſe people, ſo high an opinion of his own genius and knowledge, that he would have been ſeized with the deepeſt grief and fallen into a ſtate of the loweſt humiliation, by ſo flagrant a proof of illuſion and ignorance as his would be; but being inwardly convinced that he was not miſtaken or deceived, he has retained all the ſame good opinion he had before entertained of his underſtanding; and ſo the ill ſucceſs of a prophecy, which, with reſpect to him, was no more than a juggler's trick, has not humbled him in any manner. They build likewiſe on this, viz. that after the example of Comenius, he has attempted to reunite the Lutherans and Calviniſts (36); in hopes, as 'tis ſaid, of increaſing the number of the troops to attack Antichriſt. Once again, I am willing that this ſhould be conſidered only as a faithful relation of what many think and ſay. Let us go farther, and ſee what one of his adverſaries has publiſhed (37). " A man muſt be ſtupid not " to ſee through ſo groſs an artifice, particularly when " he himſelf ſeems to give you notice of it; and leaves " here and there in his work, ſome traces as it were, " by which he may diſcover his ſecret to you hereaf- " ter, and ſecure himſelf from your reproaches. It " is certain, ſays he in one place, (*), that frequently " prophecies, whether fictitious or true, have inſpired " thoſe, for whom they were made, with the deſign of " undertaking thoſe things which were promiſed them. " Perſons of good ſenſe need no more than this, in " order to make them underſtand his intention, and " ſee into his views. (38) The two paſſages, for inſtance, quoted by Peliſſon out of the Accompliſſement des Prophéties.

The knaveries, that have been diſcovered among the petty Prophets of Dauphiné, have given occaſion to a very large commentary on the abovecited paſſage from Peliſſon. We need but read a work entitled, Hiſtorie du Fanaticiſme de nôtre tems &c. i. e. The Hiſtory of the Enthuſiaſm of our Age; and the deſign there was of exciting the malecontents among the Calviniſts, in France, to take up arms. It was printed at Paris in the year 1692. Mr. Brueys, author of the tract in queſtion, having collected a great number of paſſages out of Mr. Jurieu's book, to prove that this Miniſter ſet up for a Prophet, adds immediately after: " We nevertheleſs muſt not imagine, " that this Miniſter was himſelf perſuaded of the " truth of thoſe things of which he wanted to per- " ſuade others; he had an artful deſign in aſſuming " the air and manners of a Prophet; he knew per- " fectly well that he was not a Prophet; but he was " deſirous of impoſing on the people, in order to ex- " cite them to take up arms, and light up a civil war " in the heart of this country, in order to favour the " inclinations of our enemies. He was ſo full of this " deteſtable project when he wrote his Book of Pro- " phecies, that he cannot forbear diſcovering his de- " ſign to a reader of ever ſo little penetration. The " time in which he wrote it, the motives which " prompted him, and the touches that eſcape from " his pen, and on which occaſion he has inadvertently " let fall ſome drops of the venom, with which his " heart was filled: all theſe things diſcover the falſe " Prophet's deſign (39)." I ſhall not tranſcribe the proofs he has given of each of theſe remarks; and will only mention what he obſerves with reſpect to the laſt. Here, ſays he (40), is what has eſcaped him in ſome part of his book, and which manifeſtly ſhews that he had no other view but to excite nations to take up arms.

(39) Brueys, Hiſtoire Fanaticiſme, pag. 44.

" The Prophecies that are inſerted in this piece, " had at firſt ſcandalized the moſt judicious of his " party, which he himſelf owns in the 2d edition of his " book. There are ſome people, ſays he (a), who believe " that the hopes I give of a reſtoration in a few years, " may be of great prejudice. He firſt endeavours to " ſhew that this need not be feared, and adds as fol- " lows. It is certain, ſays he, that frequently Pro- " phecies, whether fictitious or true, have inſpired thoſe " for whom they were made, with the deſign of under- " taking thoſe things which were promiſed them. Could " he have declared more expreſly the deſign he had " of running the hazard to vent falſe Prophecies, in " order to excite the malecontents of France to make " an inſurrection; and to fire them with a deſign of " attempting to procure themſelves, by force of arms, " that ſpeedy deliverance which he promiſed them? " Thoſe of his party had not only been ſcandalized " at his preſuming to publiſh Prophecies, but were ſtill " more ſo at his ſpeaking in too affirmative a tone. " It is ſtill himſelf who informs us of this. With re- " gard to the remark, ſays he (e), which ſo many people " have made, viz. that I ſpeak too confidently of things, " which I ought perhaps to have propoſed, at moſt, as " weighty conjectures; the world may perhaps one day " be informed of the chief reaſon, which made me ſpeak " in ſo deciſive a tone, and ſo confident an air. What " then is that chief reaſon which he does not dare to " mention, and which the world may perhaps be in- " formed of one day? Is he firmly perſuaded of the " truth of thoſe things which he declares? This is the " only motive, that ought to make a man of honour and " probity ſpeak with a reſolute affirmative tone of " voice. But if this be his, why does he not ſay " ſo? Is he afraid of ſpeaking the truth? Let us urge " him no farther on that ſubject; he is ſincerer than " we imagine; he himſelf has already told the chief " reaſon: had he not juſt before ſaid, It is certain, " that frequently Prophecies, whether fictitious or true, " have inſpired thoſe for whom they were made, with " the deſign of undertaking thoſe things which were " promiſed them. This is his chief reaſon, and we " muſt not look for any other. This falſe Prophet " did not expect that thoſe two paſſages would one " day be joined (41). He had deſignedly placed them " in two ſeparate volumes; but now they are toge- " ther; and they explain one another ſo naturally, " that a man muſt be blind not to ſee, that the reaſon " why Mr. Jurieu ſpeaks in ſo deciſive a manner, " and with ſo confident an air of the approaching de- " liverance, which he promiſed the Proteſtants of " France, was, becauſe he is of opinion, that fre- " quently Prophecies, whether fictitious or true, in- " ſpire thoſe for whom they are made, with the deſign " of undertaking thoſe things which are promiſed them."

(e) Tom. 2. pag. 184.

(41) Brueys often repeats the conſequences he draws from the joining of thoſe two paſſages. See particularly, pag. 227, 230, 241.

Brueys ſeems ſo fully perſuaded of his having diſcovered the whole myſtery, that he repeats this obſervation more than once; nay he is ſo malicious as to remind the reader of the artifices of the heathens. I will alſo quote that paſſage. " This Miniſter pro- " miſed the Calviniſts that Popery ſhould have its " downfal, and the approaching deliverance of their " Church. He promiſed her thoſe things as from " God, by telling them that they were contained in " the oracles of the Revelations. It therefore was " not poſſible that thoſe Prophecies could inſpire thoſe " for whom they were made, with the deſign of un- " dertaking thoſe things which were promiſed them; " becauſe nothing has a greater aſcendant over the " mind of man than religion; and that all things " appear lawful to them, when they firmly believe that " God is on their ſide, and that they only execute his " orders. Thoſe who know the uſe which the artful " Greeks and Romans made of their Oracles, their " Southſayers, their Augurs; and of thoſe Prieſts " whom they called Haruſpices, Feciales, Præpetes " and Oſcines (42), whoſe employment was to foretell " the will of the Gods, whenever any important affair " was debated on; ſome in viewing the entrails of " the victims, the harmony, the flight, or various mo- " tions of certain birds. Thoſe, I ſay, who know " of what uſe theſe things were formerly, are ſenſible " that perſons of good ſenſe gave no manner of cre- " dit to them; and made no other uſe of them than " to inſpire nations and ſoldiers with the deſigns which " they promiſed them in the name of their Gods; " but which, in the main, was nothing but what " they themſelves had reſolved to do, before they con- " ſulted their oracles. Here we have directly the " pretended Prophecies of Mr. Jurieu, and his pretended " perſuaſion (43)."

(42) Theſe two names Præpetes & Oſcines were not given to Prieſts, but to Birds that were employed in Divination.

I again repeat, in this place, the proteſtation I already made, viz. that I do not here ſet my ſelf up as judge, but only relate what is ſaid by others. I indeed will not conclude this remark without obſerving, that in all ages and countries, Prophecies have been forged in order to excite people to rebellion. I could cite an hundred examples, but one will be ſufficient on this occaſion. The Spaniards who rebelled againſt Charles V, ſpread a malicious propheſy, viz. that a Prince named Charles would reign over Caſtile; a Prince who would deſtroy and burn the country; but that a ſon of the King of Portugal would poſſeſs himſelf of Caſtile, and reſtore the country to a very flouriſhing condition. The ringleaders of the ſedition cauſed this Prophecy to be printed, and commanded every one of their partizans to keep a copy of it by them (44).

(44) See among the Golden Epiſtles of Anthony de Guevara, that which the Admiral of Caſtile wrote to the inhabitants of Seville, in 1520. It is the 13th of book 3. What I quote is pag. m. 65.

[I] The things with which he is charged are a little too much exaggerated.] If the reader examines carefully the following words of le Brueys, he will find ſuch an artful rhetoric in them as ought juſtly to be ſuſpected. "It is impoſſible but Mr. Jurieu's beſt "friends muſt own, that the ſole motive of his pub-"liſhing his predictions on the Revelations, was, in "order to excite the malecontent Calviniſts in France "to take up arms, in order that the League which "was then forming, finding this Kingdom divided "againſt itſelf, might have the eaſier opportunity of "ruining it entirely; and that the Calviniſts might "ſee their Religion re-eſtabliſhed on the ruins of "their country.

"Let any perſon now ſum up, if this can be done, "all the crimes and wicked attempts that are com-"prized in ſo execrable a project; the artifices, "fictions and impoſtures made uſe of, in order to "ſeduce the ſimple; the profanation of the holy "Scriptures and its ſacred Oracles; the impieties and "blaſphemies againſt the Holy Ghoſt; the violation "of the moſt ſacred Laws of the Chriſtian Religion; "the overthrowing the principles of the morality of "Jeſus Chriſt; the contempt of the conſtant practice "of the Church, and of the examples of the Mar-"tyrs; the forgetfulneſs of his own maxims; the "precepts of rebellion againſt the powers eſtabliſhed "by God; the exhortations to Subjects, Chriſtians "and Frenchmen to take up arms, and join thoſe "who have conſpired the ruin of their country; the "horrid wiſhes he prompts them to make for the de-"feat of our armies; the plundering of this Kingdom; "the deſolation of our provinces; the burning of our "Cities, the effuſion of blood, and the murther of "their fellow-citizens, friends and relations. In fine, "all the inhuman and barbarous actions which a civil "and inteſtine war could have added to the moſt fu-"rious and moſt bloody foreign war that was ever "known.

The ſenſe is,
"Strange, that Religion ſhould perſuade ſuch evils!

"Thus you ſee (to ſpeak of things as they really are) "the conſequences of Mr. Jurieu's falſe prophecies, "and the ſcope of the ſeditious writings of that fa-"mous defender of Calviniſm, who, to get the public "exerciſe of his Religion re-eſtabliſhed in France, "breathes into thoſe of his party greater fury, and "prompts them to greater cruelties than the barba-"rous Mahomet committed, in order to get his Alco-"ran eſtabliſhed (45)."

(45) Brueys, Hiſt. du Fanaticiſme, pag. 241.

(46) This is not the only anachroniſm in Mr. Brueys's book. We are told here, pag. 17. that Mr. Jurieu, tired with writing controverſial pieces and paſtoral letters, reſolved to take another courſe, and ſet up for a prophet. He did not begin his Paſtorals till after he had publiſhed his Prophecies. Brueys, pag. 14. ſpeaks of a peace concluded in 1682, but he ſhould have ſaid 1684.

I muſt here lay aſide the character of a mere copyiſt, and aſſume that of a critic. It is falſe to aſſert that a League of any kind was formed againſt France, at the time that Mr. Jurieu publiſhed his Predictions; for they were given out in March 1686, above two years before he had the leaſt ſuſpicion of the tranſactions that broke out in 1688; ſo that the anachroniſm which his adverſary has committed is a groſs blunder here (86). Had Brueys conſulted Nicole he would have been more equitable; and not have been ignorant that Mr. Jurieu, in publiſhing his explication of the Revelations, imagined that war would not have any ſhare in the events foretold by him. Nicole has done him juſtice as follows (47). "Who would not, "for inſtance, conſider as the menace, of a very "bloody war, the following lines from the preface of "his ſyſtem of the Church (48)? We ſhall ſoon go and "eſtabliſh truth even on the throne of falſhood; and the "raiſing up of what was juſt before caſt down ſhall be "performed in ſo glorious a manner, that the whole earth "ſhall be aſtoniſhed at it. What author ever wrote "in ſuch a ſtrain? And who would not imagine that "ſuch a diſcourſe would have been followed by an "army of a hundred thouſand Proteſtants combined "together, to reſtore the pretended reformed Religion "in France? Jurieu might even be accuſed of high-treaſon, and looked upon as a ſeditious perſon. It "is therefore proper to undeceive the world in this "particular, and to inform them that this diſcourſe is "not grounded on any conſpiracy formed againſt "France. . . . (49). All that he ſays here, tranſient-"ly, in ſo terrible a manner, is much leſs dreadful "when explained at length by his Accompliſhment of "the Prophecies: for it is there we ſee that this glo-"rious re eſtabliſhment of the pretended reformed (the "Calviniſts) will be brought about without any, or "very little effuſion of blood (*); or that it ſhall not "even be, either by foreign troops, or by a multitude "of Miniſters who ſhall ſpread themſelves over "France; but by the effuſion of the Spirit of God, "which ſhall reanimate the extended bodies of Enoch "and Elias; that is, according to Mr. Jurieu †, of the "Proteſtants who were formerly witneſſes to the truth, "and who having baſely abandoned it are now de-"prived of life, and ſtretched out in the great ſquare "of the city of Antichriſt; that is, over all France, "the principal part, according to him, of the Anti-"chriſtian Empire." There is another particular, in which Mr. Brueys appears to me blame-worthy; he inſinuating (50) that Mr. Jurieu is the oracle who was conſulted, in order for the ſetting up of a ſchool (51) where children ſhould be taught inſpiration. Here follows the deſcription of that infamous ſchool: Could any one believe this who had not ſeen it? It was then that a ſchool was firſt opened, in which the art of Prophecy was taught; where people went to learn to foretel things to come; and where, after having paſt through the neceſſary trials, they imagined they received the Holy Ghoſt from the impure mouth of a ſacrilegious maſter, who pretended to breathe it with a kiſs into the mouths of thoſe wretched pupils (52). This is a deſign of ſo horrid a nature, that it ought never to be declared, nor even ſo much as inſinuated without ſtrong proofs, that a Miniſter was ſo wicked as to ſuggeſt the plan of it. Brueys has given too much extent to the conſequences he draws from Mr. Jurieu's prodigious care to ſave the honour of the petty prophets (53). "He could ne-"ver be prevailed upon to revoke the particulars he "had publiſhed at firſt concerning this propheteſs (54); "and he entertained it with ſo much obſtinacy in "all his letters, that even after Heaven had recovered "the maiden in queſtion from her errors, and ſhe was "become a true and pious catholic, and had owned to "her Judges in what manner du Serre had ſeduced "her; ſtill this Miniſter perſiſted in what he had "advanced; was conſtant to his ſhepherdeſs notwith-"ſtanding her infidelity; and had even the impudence "to ſay, ſpeaking of her and of the other ſleeping "petty prophets, that they might be become knaves, but "that they nevertheleſs had been prophets . . . (55). This "Miniſter declared himſelf publickly in favour of "the petty prophets, in ſpite of all that the honeſt "men of his party could ſay to him; and maintained "that they were really inſpired, with an invincible "but affected obſtinacy, as I before obſerved; becauſe "he had his views, and would appoint ſucceſſors to "himſelf in prophecy, as he had already appointed "forerunners. . . . (56). Can we (57) wonder after this, "that Mr. Jurieu could not prevail with himſelf to "abandon a ſett of people, who had improved ſo well "by his leſſons; and that like a fond father, who is "blind to the faults of his Children, he would never "own the folly of thoſe to whom he had given birth?" The conſequences which are drawn from thence are not very juſt; for how many things are there, which men perſiſt obſtinately in maintaining, when they find them already done or formed, without knowing the whole guilt that was in their formation; which they would never adviſe to produce or form after a criminal manner, in caſe they were to be formed or produced? In this manner charity prompts us to extenuate, as much as poſſible, our neighbours faults, and to ſuſpend our own judgments, notwithſtanding the ſtrongeſt probabilities, in caſe they do not amount to a good proof.

The reader will have a ſtill better idea of Mr. Brueys's raſhneſs, if he obſerves that Mr. Brueys, not contented with inſinuating his accuſation, propoſed it in clear and affirmative terms, not only againſt Mr. Jurieu the miniſter, but likewiſe againſt ſeveral others. The moſt factious among the fugitive (refugee) Miniſters, ſays he, (58) who burnt with impatience to reviſit what they had left in France, conſidering that the ſtratagem which Mr. Jurieu had hit upon might promote their affairs; hearing how greedily the malecontents of that Kingdom received prophecies, which aſſured them of an approaching deliverance, and being perſuaded that there was no better way to prompt them to rebel; imagined that they ought not to let ſlip ſo fine an opportunity of lighting up, in the heart of the country, that civil war which was to give it its mortal wound, in hopes of ſeeing their religion riſe up again on the ruins of a monarchy which they imagined was near its deſtruction. And yet theſe were the very Miniſters who, at firſt, had cried aloud againſt his prophecies; threatned to complain of them, and were offended at his ſpeaking in too affirmative a tone of voice: but the falſe prophet having whiſpered his ſecret to them, and given them to underſtand, that frequently prophecies, whether fictitious or true, have inſpired thoſe for whom they were made with the deciſion of undertaking thoſe things which were promiſed them; and having told them in the ear, that principal and ſecret reaſon they were to know one day, and which had prompted him to ſpeak with ſo confident an air; they were ſoon agreed; his ſtratagem was approved in their ſecret council, and a reſolution was taken to propheſy, in order to excite people to take up arms. Two things may be criticiſed here; for, in the firſt place, no proof can be given that the French miniſters were concerned in the horrid combination of thoſe ſeducers, who taught young children to pretend to inſpiration; and 2dly, it is falſe to aſſert that the French Miniſters had cried aloud againſt Mr. Jurieu's prophecies, and threatned to complain of them. Mr. Brueys alledges that falſe ſuppoſition an hundred times (59), though he has cited, page 216, a paſſage which might very eaſily have undeceived him. The paſſage is as follows. "The other thing they are offended at (theſe are "Mr. Jurieu's words) relates to the MILLENIUM. "Several Divines of this country have murmured aloud, "and even threatned to complain of it." It is manifeſt that theſe loud murmurs and theſe threats to complain, came from the Flemiſh Divines, and not from the French Miniſters; and did not relate to the promiſes of an approaching deliverance &c. But the Millenium, a doctrine that is extremely odious to the Churches of Holland; and for which Mr. Jurieu would have been brought into trouble, had he not been favoured with human ſupports. But notwithſtanding theſe ſupports, complaints were made againſt him in the Walloon Synod, the members whereof inſerted a few words in an act or inſtrument, of which we may ſay what cardinal d'Oſſat ſaid of thoſe ſtrokes of the ſwitch, which the proxies of Henry IV received (60).

[K] The author of Thoughts upon Comets aſſerted, that Drabicius's prophecies met with little credit.] He has been more equitable than the writer cited in the remark [G], and acknowledged that the Proteſtants had little eſteem for Drabicius. "The proteſtants themſelves, "ſays he, (61), are not very ſtrongly perſuaded that "Drabicius was a prophet. Some indeed fancy that he "was an enthuſiaſt, whoſe brain had been turned by his "reading the commentaries on the prophecies of the old "teſtament, and thoſe of the revelations; that after he "had filled his imagination with theſe ideas he looked "upon the emperors of Germany as ſo many Pharoes, "Sennacheribs, Nebuchadnezzars, and emiſſaries of the "great whore, drunk with the wine of the wrath of "her whoredom; and that he at laſt was perſuaded, "that God appointed him to command ſeveral princes to extirpate thoſe perſecutors. Thoſe who had "ſuffered theſe perſecutions, and imagined that divine "providence would one day puniſh the authors of ſo "barbarous a conduct, in all probability gave credit "to Drabicius's viſions. Nevertheleſs, moſt of them "paid little regard to them; eſpecially after finding "that he was deluded, and contradicted himſelf pretty often in a very viſible manner; in a manner "that cannot be excuſed but by having recourſe to a "great number of gloſſes, which make unbelievers "laugh more than the ſincere confeſſion of that man's "errors would; for, by the help of ſuch gloſſes, "which are multiplied as occaſion ſerves, there is no "falſe prophet but may find an apology.

KRANTZ or KRANTZIUS (ALBERTUS) a famous Hiſtorian, and native of Hamburg [A], had no ſooner gone through his claſſical learning in his own country, but he ſet out upon his travels. He viſited the principal parts of Europe; and ſo ſtudiouſly cultivated the Sciences in his travels, that he became a very able man. He was Doctor of Divinity, and of the Canon Law, and Profeſſor of Philoſophy and Divinity in the Univerſity of Roſtoch; and was Rector there in 1482 (a). Thoſe who affirm that he was a Canon of Naumburg are miſtaken [B]. He went from Roſtoch to Hamburg, and was made a Canon in the Cathedral of that City. He did not enjoy, in an indolent manner, like ſo many of his brethren, this preferment, to which he had been raiſed; but ſpent his time in preaching, and reading theological Lectures. He was elected Dean of the Chapter of 1508, and went through the viſitation of his dioceſe, with the frame of mind of a man, who was deſirous of reforming ſuch diſorders as he ſhould find in it. He did the ſame in 1514. He did many good Services to the city of [C] He did many good ſervices to the city of Hamburg.] One could not deny, upon pretence that this city began but in 1546 to have ordinary Syndics, what is inſerted in the Daniſh remonſtrance in anſwer to the apology of the Hamburgers in the year 1642, viz. that Albert Krantzius was Syndic of Hamburg; for that title, in his time, was given to thoſe perſons, who were deputed by the city on ſome particular affair. Now it is certain that Albert Krantz was ſent upon two or three deputations. He was preſent, in the name of the Hanſe towns at the aſſembly of Wiſmar, in the year 1489 (8); he went into France in the year 1497 to ſue for a truce; and to England in the year 1499, to deſire ſome privileges againſt pirates (9). Theſe particulars we are told by Mollerus in the above-cited work. His proofs are inſerted in the margin.

[E] He died the 7th of December 1517.] This we find by his epitaph; ſo that it is an error, to ſay with the continuators of Geſner and Theodore Zwinger, that he flouriſhed in the year 1520. Mollerus ought not to have looked upon this as an error in Geſner (11). Father Fournier the Jeſuit, and John Andrew Boſius have made a much greater miſtake. The Jeſuit ſays that he died in 1569 (12), and the other in 1570 (13). But theſe errors would be inconſiderable in compariſon of thoſe of a famous Profeſſor in Oxford (14), in caſe he took Albert Krantz to be the ſame with Albert the Great, Biſhop of Ratiſbon. But Mollerus who had charged him with it has found his miſtake, and acquits him entirely of that error. No one had taken notice of it to him; he himſelf diſcovered the error, and owns it publicly like a man of honour. See page 738, 739 of his treatiſe De Scriptoribus homonymis.

[F] . . . . Having been ſenſible, that the Church ſtood in great need of being reformed.] He perceived the neceſſity of this as well with reſpect to doctrine as morals, if we may credit Melchior Adam. "Animadverſtit in doctrinâ ejus temporis multum fuiſſe errorum ſuperſtitionum; & mores Canonicorum ac Monachorum acerrime reprehendit; eoſque in ordinem redigere conatus eſt. Sed cum id fruſtra ſe tentare videret, quod perverſitas illorum hominum munita eſſet auctoritate Pontificis, dixiſſe fertur; nunquam poſſe eos reduci ad me"liorem frugem, niſi prius à viris doctis expugnata "arce. Interrogatus cur ſeſe ipſe non opponeret tam "craſſis erroribus, reſpondit: ſe neque eruditione neque "ætate parem eſſe tantis negotiis (15)." i. e. "He ſaw "that there were, in the doctrine of the age in which "he lived, many errors and ſuperſtitions; and he in"veighed very ſharply againſt the morals of the Ca"nons and Friars, and uſed his endeavours to reform "them. But perceiving that this was a vain effort, "becauſe the perverſe conduct of that ſet of men was "defended by the Papal authority, we are told that he "declared, that it would be impoſſible for them to be "made to conduct themſelves better till their fortreſs "ſhould be taken by learned men. And it being aſked, "why he himſelf did not oppoſe thoſe groſs errors, "he anſwered that he had not learning enough, "and was too far advanced in years for ſo great an "undertaking." A circumſtance that recalls to my memory Teleſinus in Velleius Paterculus. This Teleſinus was General of the Samnites, and a very brave warrior. He bore a mortal hatred to the Romans, and advanced near Rome with an army of forty thouſand men, firmly determined to finiſh his exploit at once; and to effect this he was perpetually encouraging his ſoldiers with the following words. It will be abſolutely neceſſary for us to deſtroy this city; for there never will be wanting a ſet of wolves, thoſe raviſhers of the liberties of Italy, ſo long as the foreſt wherein they ſhelter themſelves ſhall be ſtanding. Paterculus's Latin deſerves to be tranſcribed here. Circumvolans ordines exercitus ſui Teleſinus, dictitanſque adeſſe Romanis ultimum diem, vociferabatur eruendam delendamque urbem, adjiciens nunquam defuturos raptores Italicæ libertatis lupos, niſi ſilva, in quam refugere ſolerent, eſſet exciſa (16). He did not reaſon amiſs. Albert Krantz judged in like manner, that ſo long as the Court of Rome ſhould be ſuffered to continue in all its ſtrength and vigour, it would be impoſſible ever to ſuppreſs the corruption of the Monks and Eccleſiaſticks. I muſt here animadvert on a flagrant act of inſincerity in Moreri, for this name we ought to give to his fault. He had read what Melchior Adam relates, viz. that Albert Krantz ſeeing the poſitions of Martin Luther againſt the doctrine of indulgences, cried; He has too powerful adverſaries; he will not ſucceed; I adviſe him to deſiſt from his enterprize, and to ſhut himſelf up in his cell, in order to ſay, Lord have mercy upon me. Nihil effecturum eſſe contra tam potentes adverſarios, ſuum eſſe conſilium ut ab incepto deſiſteret. Frater, frater, inquit, abi in cellam tuam, & dic miſerere mei Deus (17). What has Moreri done? He has caſtrated the paſſage? has taken but the laſt words of it; and turns them in ſuch a manner as though Krantz had condemned Luther's attempt. Krantz, ſays he, bewailed this misfortune (18), in his expiring moments, which he had foretold in his life-time. It is affirmed that, at the juncture in queſtion, he often repeated the following words, ſpeaking againſt Luther; Frater, abi in cellam, & dic miſerere mei Deus. i. e. "Brother, go into thy cell, and "ſay, God have mercy upon me." Though we ſhould not conſider many paſſages in Albert Krantzius's works, which teſtify the opinion he entertained with regard to the corrupt ſtate of the Church; the words which he ſpoke when he ſaw Luther's firſt poſitions, would alone ſufficiently diſcover's Moreri's prevarication. Conſider what follows (19). Vitia, quæ doctrinam & cultum Eccleſiæ Romanæ publicum deformabant, agnovit, & quanto emendationis eorundem deſiderio teneretur, cum locis Scriptorum ſuorum plurimis, tum vocibus hiſce Cygnæis eſt teſtatus, quibus ſuum de Theſibus Lutheri Anti-Tezelianis in lectulo ſibi emortuali oblatis, judicium expoſuit (†). Vera quidem dicis, bone Frater: ſed nihil efficies: Vade igitur in cellam tuam, & dic miſerere mei Deus. i. e. "He owned the vices and corruptions, "which deformed the doctrine and public worſhip of "the Romiſh Church; and how ſtrongly deſirous he "was that thoſe corruptions ſhould be reformed, ap"peared both by many paſſages of their writers, and "by theſe ſwan-like words, wherein he gave the opi"nion he entertained with regard to Luther's Anti"Tezelian Theſes, which were brought to him whilſt "he lay on his death-bed; Good Brother, what you "ſay is true, but it is to no purpoſe; retire therefore "to your cell, and ſay, God have mercy upon me." I will conclude this remark with a paſſage which ſhews, that if Flaccius Illyricus did not employ Albert Krantz's authority againſt the Church of Rome in his catalogue of witneſſes of the truth, Catalogus teſtium veritatis, the compilers who followed him, made amends for that omiſſion; they having given good collections of thoſe particulars, which they had read in Albert Krantz, which favoured their deſign. Nay, the editors of the Frankfort edition have taken the pains to ſpecify thoſe things in marginal notes. Here follows the paſſage I promiſed (20). Ipſi Theologi Proteſtantium cordatiores ſcriptoris hujus, licet Pontificii, atque adeo, ἀλλοφύλω, Lectionem ſibi habent commendatiſſimam, & Arma ex illo depromunt, quibus adverſus Eccleſiæ Romanæ Hyperaſpiſtas haud infeliciter κατ' ἄνθρωπον depugnatur, Invectivas ſcilicet in Vitia non Monachorum ſolum ac Canonicorum, ſed & Epiſcoporum atque Pontificum, παῤῥησιαστικὰς, crebraſque de ſtatu Eccleſiæ & Aulæ Pontificiæ corruptiſſimæ

He publiſhed the Latin text the next year in the ſame city. A ſecond edition of it was printed in the year 1562. John Wolfius, Counſellor to the Marquis of Baden, procured a third and fourth edition at Frankfort, in the year 1575, and in the year 1583 (22). II. The work was printed in the ſame city in the year 1574, and in the year 1595. The Wechels printed three editions of it at Frankfort, in 1575, 1580 and 1621, which are preferable to the Colen editions. A German tranſlation of this work by Baſil Faber was printed at Leipſic in 1563, and 1582 (23). III. The German tranſlation, printed in Lubeck in the year 1600, was by Mark Stephen Macropus (26). IV. The work intitled, Metropolis. It includes, in twelve books, the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Saxony, Weſtphalia and Jutland; with the Lives of the Prelates who, from 780 to 1504, enjoyed the twelve Biſhopricks of that country. Joachim Mollerus the younger, a native of the city of Hamburg, and Counſellor to the Dukes of Hamburg, firſt publiſhed this work, which he did, at Melanchthon's requeſt, from the author's original. This was the only manuſcript in being of that work; and Henry Bucholz, Biſhop of Lubeck, had given it to this Mollerus's father. The firſt edition is by Operinus at Baſil in the year 1548, which was followed by that of the year 1568, from the ſame preſs; and by two others (27), at Colen (28), and three more at Frankfort (29). Great elogiums have been beſtowed upon him by ſeveral learned men, (34), but then he has been ſtrongly attacked by ſome criticks. He is accuſed of publiſhing a great number of falſhoods with regard to the origin of nations; of giving very wrong citations of antient authors; of tranſcribing whole pages from other writers without naming any perſon; and of falſifying the monuments of hiſtory, to gratify his paſſions. Mollerus (35) names the authors of theſe various cenſures, and ſays ſomething in his vindication. He does not deny but that Krantzius was guilty of plagiariſm; he only endeavours to apologize for him, from its being the practice of the age. *Solenne præterea ei eſſe fatemur, Eginhardum, Witekindum, Herm. KUCHLIN (JOHN), Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity, was born in 1546, in a little town in the country of Heſſe, called Wettera. His father, who was a good honeſt mechanic, and had the charge of ten ſons and three daughters, whom he ſupported merely by the labour of his hands, deſigned him for learning; but was prevented by death from ſeeing him make any conſiderable progreſs. The Miniſter (a) of the place took care of the child with ſo much the more ſatisfaction, as he ſaw, that he made a good progreſs in Latin and Greek under Juſtus Wulteius Rector of the ſchool at Wettera. But when it was time to go to the Univerſity, Kuchlin had no ſmall difficulties to encounter on account of his poverty. However he did not loſe courage; he reſolved to ſeek his fortune; and for that purpoſe went to travel, as a young College-adventurer. He met met with nothing at Frankfort. His landlord at Mentz carried him to the Jeſuits, who kept him no longer than till they found, that he would not abjure the Proteſtant Religion. All that he met with at Straſbourg was a letter of recommendation from John Sturmius to Brentius, who was Profeſſor at Tubingen. The latter did not keep him long; he thought him not ſufficiently inclined to the opinion of the Ubiquitarians. Kuchlin having got back the letter of Sturmius, went to Heidelberg, where he at laſt obtained what he ſought for; for Urſin procured him a ſubſiſtence, in order that he might continue his ſtudies at eaſe. The Univerſity of Heidelberg was then in a very flouriſhing ſtate. The young man made a conſiderable progreſs there for ſix years; after which he was ſent to teach in the ſchool at Neuſtad [A], where he had, among other collegues, Fortunatus Crellius and Frederic Sylburgius (b). He was afterwards admitted Miniſter, and ſettled in the Church of Tackenheim; which he ſerved faithfully, till after the death of the Elector Frederic in 1576, when Lewis his ſucceſſor baniſhed the Miniſters who would not become Lutherans. Kuchlin retiring to Heſſe his own country, and meeting with nothing but diſcouragement there, took refuge (c) by his wife's advice in the great Ark of the Refugees, I mean in Holland. He paſſed through Embden in 1577, and ſtaid there for ſome time, whence he was ſent for to Amſterdam to be Miniſter there [B]. He accepted the call, and diſcharged that poſt eighteen years; after which he exerted himſelf vigorouſly in the Rectorſhip of a College of Divinity, which the States of Holland had erected at Leyden in 1591, and of which he had from that time the direction for ſome months. It was in 1595 that he diſengaged himſelf intirely from his Church at Amſterdam, in order to apply himſelf wholly to the buſineſs of this College. He taught Divinity there till his death, which happened July the 2d 1606. He had married his two daughters to two learned men; one to Peter Bertius, and the other to Feſtus Hommius (d). All the Theological Theſes, which he had cauſed to be maintained at different times, have been collected in one volume in 4to at Geneva in 1613. Guy Patin has extremely commended him, and a little too much; for he calls him one of the moſt learned men of his age (e).

[A] He was ſent to teach in the ſchool at Neuſtad.] The author of the Diarium Biographicum (1) tells us, that Kuchlin was rector of that ſchool; but his funeral oration, in which that preferment would not have been omitted, expreſly informs us, that he taught at Neuſtad when Baſil Pithopœus was rector there. There is another miſtake in the ſame Diarium; it repreſents as two different works the Diſputationes Theologicæ ad Catacheſeos Eccleſiarum Belgicarum explicationem, and the Diſputationes de Religionis Chriſtianæ præcipuis capitibus. They are one and the ſame book.

[B] He was ſent for to Amſterdam to be Miniſter there.] Moreri examined ſo little the authors, which he conſulted, that he conſidered only the firſt part of the period of Meurſius. If he had had the patience to read the whole period, he would have ſeen the direct contrary of what he affirmed. He ſays that Kuchlin was Miniſter at Emden and Groningen in the Low-countries; but it is certain that he was not at Groningen. He had the choice between that City and Amſterdam, and he inclined rather to the former than the latter. However he was induced to fix upon the latter. Let us hear Meurſius (2). Inſtinctu uxoris, quæ Belgica erat in Belgium abiit, Emdamque venit anno cIↃ IↃ LXXXVII, ubi cum operam aliquamdiu tam in ſchola quam in Eccleſia navaſſet, eodem tempore ab Amſtelodamenſibus & à Groeningenſibus evocatus fuit. Ille, cum propter Germanici idiomatis vicinitatem Græningenſes præferendos judicaret, à clariſſimo viro D. Menſone Altingio graviſſimis rationibus permotus fuit, ut operam ſuam Amſtelodamenſi Eccleſiæ addiceret. i. e. "At the ſollicitation of his wife, who was born in "the Low Countries, he went thither, and came to "Emden in the year 1587, where having ſpent ſome "time in the ſervice of the ſchool and the Church, he "received at the ſame time an invitation from the in"habitants of Amſterdam and Groningen. He incli"ned to Groningen on account of the neighbourhood "of the German Idiom, but was at laſt prevailed up"on by that eminent man, Menſo Alting, upon ve"ry important reaſons, to devote himſelf to the ſer"vice of the Church of Amſterdam."

It is a great inſtance of negligence in the ſame Moreri, to ſay in general, that Kuchlin taught Divinity at Leyden. He ſhould have ſpecified whether he did this as Profeſſor in the Univerſity, or Principal of the College of Divinity. Meurſius would have furniſhed him with a clear account of this.

KUHLMAN (QUIRINUS) was one of the Viſionaries of the ſeventeenth Century. He was born at Breſlaw in Sileſia February the 25th 1651 (a), and gave great hopes by the early progreſs which he made (b). But it was interrupted by a ſickneſs, under which he laboured at eighteen years of age (c). He was thought to be dead on the third day of his illneſs. That day he had a terrible viſion. He thought himſelf ſurrounded with all the devils in hell, and this at mid-day when he was awake. This viſion was followed by another of God himſelf, ſurrounded by his Saints, and Jeſus Chriſt in the midſt. He ſaw and felt then things inexpreſſible. Two days after he had more viſions of the ſame kind (d); and when he was cured of his diſtemper, he perceived in reality a great change with regard to theſe ſights, but ſaw himſelf perpetually accompanied with a circle of light, on his left hand (e). He had no longer any taſte for polite learning. He (f) had ſometimes ſuch extatic diſtractions, that they hindered him from ſeeing and hearing thoſe who were with him; and he formed the plan of a vaſt number of books, which were ſo many methods to learn every thing, without much pains and to perfection. At nineteen years of age he left his country, where he had not juſtice done him ſufficiently, and went to ſee the Univerſities. He put out a ſecond edition of his epitaphs (g), a work which he had compoſed at fifteen years of age, and he publiſhed a Treatiſe of Morality (b); but as he made an extraordinary progreſs from day to day, he found the ſheets, which the Printer ſent to him, unworthy of him, ſo much was his knowledge increaſed during the courſe of the impreſſion (i). He had no value for the public

His deſire to ſee Holland was ſo ſtrong as not to permit him to delay his journey thither, till he might ſee more clearly what would be the iſſue of the war, which had been ſo fatal to that country in 1672. He landed at Amſterdam (l) three days before the retaking of the City of Naerden (m). He went to Leyden a few days after; and was not there long before he met with Behme's works [A], of which he had never heard any mention before. The reading of them was like oyl thrown into the fire: he was ſurprized that Behme ſhould have propheſied of things, of which no body but Kuhlman himſelf had the leaſt knowledge (n). There was at that time in Holland one JOHN ROTHE, who undertook to propheſy [B]. Kuhlman contradicted the

[A] He was not at Leyden long before he met with Behme's works.] Jacob Behime or Boehme was a Fanatic, of whom I ſhall ſpeak ſome time or other more fully. He was born in a village of Germany near Gorlitz in 1575; and when he had learned to read and write, he was taken from ſchool in order to be a ſhoemaker. He begun to exerciſe that trade at Gorlitz in 1594. He was ſeized with an extaſy in 1600, if we may believe what he has publiſhed in a book, which he intitled Aurora. This book was carried to the Magiſtrates of Gorlitz by George Richterus Dean of the Miniſters of that place; it was carried to them, I ſay, as containing a great many of the errors of Paracelſus and Wigelius; for Behme had amuſed himſelf with Chemiſtry in his youth. The Magiſtrates ſuppreſſed this Aurora as much as poſſible, and commanded the author to write no more. He was ſilent for ſeven years; but when he found that the director of the electoral laboratory had recommended him to a great many perſons of the Court as a good Chemiſt, he lifted up his head, and boldly oppoſed Richterus, and wrote above twenty books in the ſpace of five years. He died November 18, 1624 (1). A great many perſons have been infatuated by the viſions of this man. Kuhlman was not the leaſt of his admirers. Here is a paſſage, which will inform us of this. Ejus (Johannis Rothii) inde veſtigia legit Quirinus Kuhlmannus *Sileſius, Jacobi Bohemi ſimul propugnator, Calovii verò atque Scherzeri acerrimus inſectator. He was ſo charmed with the Sieur Labadie, that he devoted himſelf to his ſect, and uſed all his endeavours to procure him new Diſciples; but ſome time after he became a ſchiſmatic from him, and erected himſelf into the head of a party. He ſaid, that the glorious kingdom of Jeſus Chriſt was coming on; and he was not contented with the office of St John the Baptiſt, I mean, of forerunner and harbinger, but he pretended to be director of that great work, and more than ſtandard-bearer of this new world. Hic a Johanne Labadæo, *novo, ut videri volebat, Eccleſiarum Reformatore, morumque rigidiore Caſtigatore, ſub intenſioris Devotionis ſpecie, ita primum dementatus fuit, ut totus ei adhæſerit non tantum, ſed quoſcunque poſſet, ad familiam ejus novam pertrahere totis viribus allaborarit. He boaſted of his revelations; he promiſed mountains and wonders to thoſe, who ſhould inliſt themſelves under his ſtandard; he diſturbed the Church and State by his libels; he ſaw nothing fall out, which he had foretold: and to compleat his misfortune he was ſhut up in the priſons at Amſterdam. See all this more particularly related in the following paſſage of Saldenus (5). Hinc numeroſas vacillantium animarum copias colligere, ſocits ſuis aureos montes promittere, Eccleſiam Rempublicamque libellorum famoſiſſimorum plauſtris conturbare, Servum Dei Johannem Prophetamque eximium ſeipſum indigitare, Revelationum *tandem extraordinariarum univerſa volumina in vulgus ſpargere, neque erubuit neque deſtitit. He ſtiled him a man of God, and John III, the ſon of Zacharias. He deſired the aſſiſtance of his knowledge, and pronounced a woe upon thoſe who did not hearken to him [D]. He dedicated to him his Prodromus quinquennii mirabilis, printed at Leyden in 1674. This was to be followed by two other volumes. He had a deſign to introduce in the firſt the ſtudies and diſcoveries which he had made ſince his firſt viſion till the year 1674. There would have been in it an hundred thouſand inventions, which would have aſtoniſhed all ages. Multa millena millia inventa omnem ætatem ad ſtuporem provocantia (q). The laſt volume would have been the key to Eternity, and Æveternity, and Time. He communicated his deſign to Father Kircher; and commending the excellent books which that Jeſuit had publiſhed, and particularly the Ars Combinatoria ſive Ars magna ſciendi, he let him know, that he had only ſketched out what himſelf had a deſign to carry much farther [E]. We find in Micrælius's continuator (8), that John Rothe being the ſon of a man, whoſe name was Zacharias, boaſted of being the forerunner of the Son of God with reſpect to the Laſt Judgment; and that in the year 1668 he declared on the part of King Melchiſedeck to the Emperor, the Kings, and Princes, that they ought to lay down their ſovereignties, ſince the Kingdom of Chriſt was at hand. That he was examined in 1677, and ſhut up in priſon by order of the States of Holland and Weſt Friſeland: and afterwards being ſet at liberty, was laughed at by every body, his Prophecies being found contrary to the event (9). The author ſhould have added, that he was cured of his viſionary humour, and married, and returned to the common courſe of life. He is living at the time I write this (10).

[C] He contradicted the Proverb, which ſays, that perſons of the ſame profeſſion envy each other.] This was more edifying upon the whole, than what we have ſeen above. We have ſeen two expoſitors of the Apocalypſe write one againſt the other, though they agreed upon the pretended myſteries of the year 1689. But becauſe they came to this point of reunion by different paths, each of them would maintain his hypotheſis in prejudice to his brother-expoſitor. This was not right; and if the public had been leſs indulgent than it was, it ought not to have been thought at all ſtrange.

[D] Pronounced a woe upon thoſe, who did not hearken to him.] He declared in a thundering and redoubled manner (11), Væ, væ! ſi prophetias ſervorum Dei ſpreveritis, ſeu Batavia, olim mirabilis, nunc miſerabilis ſprevit & moriens ſpernit. i. e. " Woe! Woe! if you " ſhall deſpiſe the Prophecies of God, as Holland, " once flouriſhing, but now wretched and dying, deſ- " piſed them, and continues to do ſo." Hoc anno, adds he, & hujus anni una die veniet & mors & luctus & fames Babylonis Belgicæ, & igne exuretur cæleſti, quia validus eſt Dominus Deus damnans eam. i. e. " This year, and on one day of this year, death and " mourning and famine ſhall befall the Belgic Baby- " lon, and it ſhall be burnt up with fire from heaven, " becauſe the Lord God, who condemneth it, is " mighty." All this, becauſe they had exclaimed much againſt John Rothe, and laughed at his viſions. Kuhlman aſſerted, that heaven had declared for this Prophet by the great ſtorm on the 24th of May 1674, and by the rains, which happened in divers places May the 21ſt following (12). He referred to the Gazettes, which had mentioned this, and applied to his friend the celebrated words of an antient Poet. O Miſelli Theoſophiſtæ & Diabologi! nullis verbis, calumniis, invectionibus eluditis Prophetam, nimium Deo dilectum,

He addreſſed himſelf particularly to Amſterdam (14), where the wind had torn up many trees, and did not omit the thunder, which fell upon the Church of Utrecht; but eſpecially he cried out a miracle (15), becauſe it had thundered on the 24th of March, the evening before John Rothe left Holland, when there was ſtill ſnow in the ſtreets, and ice in the canals. Theſe ſtorms, theſe thunders, theſe lightnings, according to him, were the forerunners of the ruin of the country. Notwithſtanding this the affairs of the United Provinces became more proſperous from that time. It is proper to remark all theſe things, in order to ſhew the ſpirit, which governs this ſort of people: they abuſe every thing; they find their pretended myſteries every where. We have inſtances of a later date.

[E] He let Father Kircher know, that he had only ſketched (16) out what himſelf had a deſign to carry much farther.] Father Kircher did not trouble himſelf to defend his works, nor to vie in knowledge with this man. He ſtruck ſail before him, and declared, that having written only as a man he did not pretend to equal thoſe, who wrote by inſpiration. Quod porro de arte combinatoria, cæteriſque paradoxis meis, tum in polygraphia, tum in muſurgia, jam publicæ luci traditis meliori modo fieri potuiſſe contendis, nil moror, cum SCIENTIÆ TUÆ TAM SUBLIMIS ET Θεοδίδακτος *prorſus incapacem ineptumque me eſſe humili mentis obſequio fatear. What I have written, I have written after " an human manner, that is, by knowledge gained by " ſtudy and labour, not divinely inſpired and infuſed, " which I think is not to be obtained pure among men " ... I do not doubt, but that you, by means of the in- " comparable and vaſt extent of your genius, will pro- " duce diſcoveries much greater and more admirable " than my trifles." Our author took this for a ſerious complement, and did not perceive, that the Jeſuit ridiculed him. He took great care to publiſh Father Kircher's anſwers, and to uſe capital letters in thoſe paſſages where he thought himſelf praiſed.

This Jeſuit wrote to him a civil anſwer, and gave him good advice [F], particularly with regard to his deſign of writing againſt the Pope [G]. For the reſt, the prophetic ſpirit had not made our Kuhlman renounce the pleaſure of being praiſed; for there was no compliment written to him, either by thoſe to whom he had ſent copies of his works, or by others, which he did not take the pains to prefix to his Prodromus. With reſpect to the commendations which he gives himſelf to his writings, they are undoubtedly very ſtrong (r); but as he declares, that every thing which he does comes from the incarnate Wiſdom (s), I will not determine, that it is a mark of pride (t). I am not certain when he left Holland, but have juſt ſeen a book (u), which acquaints us, that he wandered a long time in England, France, and the Eaſt [H], and that at laſt he was burnt in Muſcovy

[F] Kircher gave him good advice.] Kircher's ſecond letter plainly ſhews, that he had diſcovered the illuſion of the man, and that he laughed at him, when he ſays with ſo ſerious an air, Magna ſane ἄπιστα καὶ ἀνυπόστατα promittis, QUÆ UTI SUPRA OMNEM HUMANI INGENII CAPTUM LONGE CONSTITUTA SUNT, ITA EA QUOQUE A NEMINE HUC USQUE NON DICAM TENTATA, SED NEC COGITATA QUIDEM FUISSE AUDACITER AFFIRMO, atque adeo aliud mihi ſuſpicari non liceat, niſi talem te divino munere ſcientiam adeptum eſſe, qualem ſacra pagina de PROTOPLASTO & SALOMONE teſtatur: explico Adamæam, Salomonicam, verbo INFUSAM, nulli mortalium niſi Tibi ſoli notam, cæteris inexplicabilem ſcientiam. i. e. "You promiſe great and incredible things, "which as they far tranſcend all human capa- "city, ſo I affirm boldly that they have never been at- "tempted or even thought of by any perſon hitherto; and "therefore I cannot but ſuſpect, that you have ob- "tained by the gift of God ſuch a knowledge, as "the Scriptures aſcribes to Adam and Solomon, I mean "an Adamic, and Salomonic, in ſhort, an infuſed "knowledge, known to no mortal but yourſelf, and "inexplicable by any other." But what follows is a piece of charitable advice. All things being well conſidered Father Kircher adviſes him to keep this infuſed knowledge to himſelf, and not to expoſe himſelf to the raillery of an age ſo apt to ſcoff as ours. It ſeems indeed, that our age is more formidable to viſionaries than the preceding The Biſhop of Meaux has touched ſomething upon this in one of his letters; but I do not know whether at the bottom the appearances do not deceive us in this point (17). Quicquid ſit, it is Kircher, who ſpeaks, ego ſane conſiderato rei non parvi momenti negotio, pro ſingulari quo te proſequor affectu etiam atque etiam quam obnixiſſimè contenderim, ne hanc tuam noviter obtentam ſcientiam Centraliſque abyſſi profunditatem ulli vana quadam jactantia oſtenderes, ne Tertii poſt Adamum Salomonis dicam & cum riſu nomen incurras. Potiſſimum hoc ſæculo ſarcaſtico, quo Criticaſtrorum, Thraſonum, & Sycophantarum non parvus eſt numerus, qui aliud non moliuntur quàm ut glorioſos aliorum labores canino dente rodere, ſannis ludibriiſque exponere non ceſſent. i. e. "However that be, "having conſidered the whole affair, which is of no "ſmall importance, I earneſtly entreat you out of "the ſingular eſteem, which I have for you, not to "diſcover, out of vain glory, to any perſon the pro- "found knowledge lately obtained by you, leſt you "ſhould be ridiculed with the name of the third Solo- "mon after Adam; eſpecially in this ſarcaſtical age, "in which there is no ſmall number of pretenders to "criticiſm, boaſters, and ſycophants, who aim at no- "thing elſe, than to carp at the glorious labours of "others, and to expoſe them to contempt." And to make the greater impreſſion upon him by his remonſtrances, he owns to him what had happened to himſelf. He acknowledges to him, that he knew by experience, that a man expoſes himſelf to an infinite number of evils, when he raſhly and inconſiderately becomes an author. Quanta malorum Ilias ex inconſiderata ſcriptione reſultet, ego jam 40 annorum ſpatio quo in hoc omnium gentium & nationum theatro, meam utut poſſum perſonam ago, frequenti experientia comperi.

[G] Particularly with regard to his deſign of writing againſt the Pope.] Though Kuhlman imagined, that he was the perſon promiſed by Drabicius, and though he knew that Drabicius's promiſes related to the deſtruction of the Roman Antichriſt; yet he had an inclination to write to the Pope. He conſulted Father Kircher upon this point, and aſſured him, that he was paſſionately deſirous to communicate to the Pope his great ſecrets for the good of Chriſtianity. A Te, Reverendiſſime Pater, peterem ne denegares mihi occaſionem præbere, qua Pontificis Maximi manibus propriis quædam Epiſtola à me in ſignum obſervantiæ tranſmittenda traderetur . . . Vellem enim arcana ponderoſiſſima ad Chriſtianæ Eccleſiæ commodum ſingulariter proficua, candido ore ſtyloque candido, tam admirabili tempeſtate Pontifici communicare, amore Reip. Chriſtianæ impulſus. I do not know the particular good advice which he received from that Jeſuit upon this ſubject; he omitted them in the anſwer which he had received; for here is the manner in which he publiſhed that paſſage. Quod denique de litteris ad ſummum Pontificem dandis, eidemque propriis manibus à me conſignandis te cogitare ſcribis . . . quæ ſcribo ut quanta cautela & circumſpectione Romæ procedendum ſit cognoſcas. i. e. "As for what "you write, concerning your deſign to write to the "Pope, and delivering your letter to him by my "hands . . . which I write in order that you may "know with what caution and circumſpection things "are to be conducted at Rome." But he did not omit the place, where he was aſſured, that his great work dedicated to the Pope would be applauded and admired, provided that he left nothing in it, which might offend the cenſors of books, and took care not to aſcribe to himſelf an inſpired knowledge, ſilentio quoque ſuppreſſa divinitus Tibi inſpirata ſcientia. This laſt advice, though good in itſelf, was the leaſt probable to be reliſhed by him; for it is by boaſting of a celeſtial illumination, that a man ſtrikes the people with amazement (18). Let us ſpeak a word concerning the impoſtures or illuſions of falſe Prophets. About the time that Kuhlman was ready to write reſpectfully to the Pope for the good of Chriſtianity, he wrote to others his hopes of the approaching deſtruction of the Papacy. This is what the following words of Kuhlman ſignify, according to the ſtyle of our viſionaries. O Pontifex Clemens X! an ſigilli mei duplicatum Quinarium X excedes, mox orbis aſpiciet univerſus? In Clemente I Petro & Lino jure præterito Epiſcopatus Romanus incepit: in Clemente X quid futurum ſit tempus evolvet. i. e. "Pope Clement X! whether you will "exceed the double Quinary X of my ſeal, will the "whole world hereafter judge? In Clement I (Peter "Linus being very juſtly omitted) the See of Rome "began: what ſhall come to paſs under Clement X, "time will ſhew." I could name a man (19), who was greatly vexed, when the public was informed, that while he was declaiming furiouſly againſt Lewis XIV, he wrote letters to a Duke and Peer full of flattery towards that Monarch.

[H] He wandered a long time in England, France, and the Eaſt.] I have juſt found ſeveral pieces of this Fanatic printed at London at his expence, ſome in 1681, and others in 1682. The firſt of theſe pieces, dated at London June the 24th 1681, is dedicated to Lewis XIV, with this familiar inſcription, Salve, Ludovice XIV, Rex Liligere, ſalve. The author exhorts that Prince to aſſert the Regale, which was ſo much ſpoken of at that time, and informed him, that Drabicius had promiſed him the city of Rome (20). We find in this collection a letter, which he wrote from Lubeck to Father Kircher in February 1676, de Sapientia infuſa Adamæa, Salomonæaque; and a piece, which he addreſſed to Mahomet IV, de Converſione Turcarum. It is dated at Conſtantinople Auguſt the 1ſt, 1678, The author ſet his myſtical ſeal to it at London May the 1ſt 1681, and ſignified to the Sultan, that the comet, which had appeared the preceding winter, preſaged the converſion of all nations; and he congratulated his Highneſs upon his having appointed a faſt one day throughout his Empire. Aſpexiſti ante aliquot covy October the 3d 1689, on account of ſome predictions which were actually ſeditious (x). I cannot tell whether he cauſed a medal to be ſtruck of him, as other modern Prophets have done; but the ſame book informs me, that there was a picture of him, under which ſo many titles were given him [I], that I believe the Monarchs of the Eaſt never aſſumed more. If it ſhould be thought that I ſpeak of him too ſeriouſly and too long, I would have the reader know that there is a ſerious air upon ſuch ſubjects as theſe, which is ten times worſe than raillery; and that it is proper that the world ſhould be informed of the prodigious variety of fanaticiſm. It is an evil more contagious than is imagined. The reading of Drabicius compleated the ruin of Kuhlman [K]. Thoſe who have not the Prodromus of the latter, have occaſion to read only three or four pages of Morhof's Polyhiſtor (y), in which they will ſee the magnificent promiſes and vaſt deſigns of this Fanatic.

For the reſt, he was not one of thoſe inſpired men, who value themſelves upon their continence; he married more than once, if we may call a marriage, and not concubinage, that commerce between a man and woman, which wants the formalities, which the Canon and Civil Law have preſcribed. He underſtood likewiſe the art of getting money from people, and there were ſome, to whom he wrote in a magiſterial and prophetic ſtyle, that it was neceſſary for the advancement of the new Kingdom of God, that they ſhould raiſe ſuch and ſuch a ſum, in failure of which he threatened them with the moſt dreadful judgments from the vengeance of the moſt High. Van Helmont was one of thoſe who received ſuch letters, but he was not ſo ſimple as to be terrified by them, or to pay any regard to them (z).

(z) I have been informed of this by ſome perſons who knew Kuhlman.

Some months after he dedicated to the Sieur Van Dam the myſtery of the 21 weeks of Kotterus, in which he declares, that the Houſe of Auſtria was about to loſe the Imperial Crown. By the piece De magnalibus naturæ ultimo ævo reſervatis, which he addreſſed ad adeptos magoſque orbis terrarum, at Geneva January the 30th 1682, it appears, that he went to the Holy Land. His Arcanum microcoſmicum is dated at Paris November the 1ſt 1681.

A little before it is ſaid, that he was ſometimes called LUDOVICUS LUDOVICI. The catalogue of his writings, ſuch as Mr. Witte gives it, does not contain the Epiſtolæ Theoſophicæ Leidenſes; but in compenſation for this it contains nine letters to Father Kircher; beſides Epiſtolarum Londinenſium Catholica ad Wickleſio-Waldenſes, Huſſitas, Zwinglianos, Lutheranos; beſides in High Dutch, de cœleſti oſculo amoris, ſive Cogitationes Poeticæ ex Cantico Canticorum. Diſcurſus ſacri & profani de pulcherrimis virtutum floſculis. Mortalitas immortalis, ſive centum Epitaphia. Caduceator Hiſtoricus. Neo-Behmius illuſtratus, &c.

[K] The reading of Drabicius compleated the ruin of Kuhlman.] Kuhlman had found in the prophecies of Drabicius two paſſages, which he applied to himſelf (23). The firſt contains theſe words (24: Qui legit, intelligat! cum numerabitur quinque finem accipient Filii contumaciæ, conſpecto me poteſtatem habere in cœlos, terram, mare. i. e. " Let him, who reads, underſtand! " when FIVE ſhall be numbered, the ſons of obſtina- " cy ſhall receive their end, it being perceived, that " I have power over Heaven, Earth, and Sea." Here is the other paſſage (25): Abundantia benedictionis te (Drabicium) parata expectat Wratiſlaviæ, ac ſi oculis videas tuis. i. e. " The abundance of bleſſing waits " thee (Drabicius) at Breſlaw, as if you ſaw with your " own eyes." Let us add to theſe two paſſages that which he took from the Aſtrologico-Prophetic Prognoſtic written by Paul Felgenhaver in 1647, and publiſhed in 1665, Quantus error ſit pacis ſpes illud nobis duplicatus QUINARIUS demonſtrabit, cum venerit poſt paucos dies. i. e. " How great an error it is to hope for " peace, the double QUINARY will ſhew, when it " ſhall come after a few days." He imagined, that he was that double Quinarius, which Felgenhaver had promiſed: two reaſons convinced him of this: one was, that his name was Quirinus; the other, that in 1674 it was five years ſince he had received an infuſed knowledge (25). He believed therefore, that the time promiſed by Drabicius, cum numerabitur quinque finem accipient filii contumaciæ, was come; ſo that he hoped to overthrow Antichriſt and Babylon with his pen in a ſhort time. Let us hear the Hallelujah which he thundered out beforehand: Corruet Antichriſtus proprio ſuo judicio, & Babylon excidium ſuum properabit cum admiratione populorum. Hallel. Quem Cæſares armis potentibus non debellavere, juvenis inermis debellavit in virtute Jeſu Chriſti prælians. Hall. Stant Mercatores Antichriſti horrore procul trementes, deflent interitum ſuum inſperatum ab inſperato timore futurorum. Hall. (27). i. e. " Antichriſt ſhall fall " by his own judgment, and Babylon ſhall haſten his " deſtruction to the admiration of all people. Hall. " He whom the Emperors have not ſubdued by pow- " erful arms, ſhall be ſubdued by an unarmed youth " fighting in the might of Chriſt Jeſus. Hall. The " merchants of Babylon ſtand trembling afar off, and " lament their unexpected deſtruction through the un- " expected fear of what ſhall come to paſs. Hall." If I had not ſeen with my own eyes all that I have tranſcribed, I could ſcarce have thought, that the extravagance of Fanaticiſm could have proceeded ſo far.

☞KUSTER (LUDOLF), a very learned writer [A] in the beginning of the 18th Century, was born in February 1670 at Blomberg, a little town in the county of Lippe in Weſtphalia, and was ſon of Ludolf Kuſter, Magiſtrate of that place. His elder brother, who was an excellent ſcholar, inſpired him very early with a love to learning, and took a particular care of his education. This brother taught polite learning at Berlin in the College of Joachim, called ſo from the Elector, who founded it. Ludolf Kuſter was

[A] A very learned writer.] This appears from his works, the catalogue of which is as follows. I. Hiſtoria Critica Homeri. Francfort 1696 in 8vo, This book ſhews a great extent of reading; but our author did not value it much afterwards, when he had made a greater progreſs in learning. He thought that he had begun too early to appear in the world under the character of an author. In this tract he took upon him the name of Neocorus, which in Greek ſignifies a ſexton, as Kuſter does in High Dutch. The following book appeared under the ſame name; II. Bibliotheca Librorum collecta a L. Neocoro. Utrecht five tomes in 8vo. This work was continued from the month of April 1697 to the end of the year 1699. Mr. Kuſter was at firſt employed alone in this journal; but being afterwards engaged in ſome other works, he took into his aſſiſtance Mr. Henry Sike, who was afterwards Profeſſor of Hebrew in the Univerſity of Cambridge. They wrote in conjunction till June 1699, when Mr. Kuſter left this work to Mr. Sike, who continued it no longer than the laſt ſix months of that year. III. Jamblichi de Vitâ Pythagoræ Liber, Græcè & Latinè cum novâ Verſione, Emendationibus, & Notis L. Kuſteri. Accedit Porphyrius de Vitâ Pythagoræ cum Notis L. Holſtenii & C. Ritterſhuſii; itemque Anonymus apud Photium de Vitâ Pythagoræ. Amſterdam 1707 in 4to. Dr. Kuſter's notes are merely critical, in which he reſtores a prodigious number of paſſages in his authors. IV. *Suidæ Lexicon Græcè & Latinè. In this edition Mr. Kuſter has collated the text of Suidas with three manuſcripts in the King of France's library in the Louvre, and marked the various readings of other manuſcripts. By this means he has corrected the text in a prodigious number of places. He has likewiſe corrected Æmilius Portus's tranſlation. His notes are ſhort, and in them he gives the reaſons of his corrections, whether taken from manuſcripts, or made by conjecture. He frequently points out the authors, whoſe words are quoted by Suidas without mentioning their names. He has likewiſe inſerted the obſervations of Dr. John Pearſon, Biſhop of Cheſter, written with his own hand in the margin of a copy of Suidas. Theſe Remarks are diſtinguiſhed from the reſt by the Biſhop's name. The author of a Latin letter dated at Oxford January 13, 1706 under the name of C. Veratius Philellen to M. Lucilius Profuturus, publiſhed by Mr. Le Clerc (1), obſerves, that though he had great expectations from Dr. Kuſter, yet this edition much ſurpaſſed it. Et ſi multa a V. Textûs Novi Fœderis ad noſtra uſque tempora Hiſtoriâ. Studio & Labore Joannis Millii S. T. P. Collectionem Millianam recenſuit, meliori ordine diſpoſuit, noviſque acceſſionibus locupletavit Ludolphus Kuſterus. Rotterdam 1710 in fol. Dr. Kuſter in his Preface having highly applauded Dr. Mill's work, obſerves, that thoſe, who would explode the uſe of Criticiſm upon the ſacred writings, as unprofitable and pernicious, labour under a great miſtake. For they cannot deny that there are various readings; and they dare not aſſert, that Robert Stephens or any other editor of the new teſtament were inſpired in ſuch a manner, as never to miſtake the true text of the ſacred writers, eſpecially conſidering the difference, which there is between the Manuſcripts, which they had in their hands. Thoſe different readings either are of ſome importance, or they are not. If the former, why ſhould thoſe valuable monuments of Antiquity be ſuppreſſed, by the aſſiſtance of which, we are enabled to diſcover the true reading of the ſacred text? If the latter, why ſhould not they be publiſhed, ſince they are ſo far from being any prejudice to religion, that they may be of the greateſt ſervice to it, by ſhewing the wonderful conformity between the vaſt number of manuſcripts, editions, verſions, and quotations of the ſcriptures, in every thing, even of the ſlighteſt nature? This will eaſily appear by comparing all the various readings collected with ſo much care by Dr. Mill; for except a ſmall number, all thoſe different readings are of no importance. However this does not diminiſh the value of that learned man's work, but on the contrary advances it; ſince the conſequence which may be drawn from it is this, that we have the ſacred text as perfect as is neceſſary to make it the foundation of our faith. Dr. Kuſter afterwards explains the nature and different ſorts of the various readings. It muſt neceſſarily be laid down as a principle, that of all the various readings of one and the ſame text there can be but one true. So that when we have the characters, by which we may know the true one, all the reſt are not to paſs for various readings, but for corruptions of the text, whatever may be the cauſe of them. Thus if we had the originals of the apoſtles now extant, there would be no various readings. But becauſe we have them not, and there is frequently reaſon to doubt which of all the various readings is the trueſt, we ought to take all the corruptions of the text for various readings, at leaſt they muſt be looked upon as ſuch till the true reading be certainly diſcovered by the principles of ſolid criticiſm. After this explication Dr. Kuſter divides the various readings into four kinds. I. Thoſe, which are improperly called ſo. II. Thoſe, which are ambiguous. III. True ones, but not very important. IV. Thoſe which are of conſiderable moment. Upon all theſe various readings he makes uſeful and judicious reflections: he obſerves, for inſtance, that the different manner of ſpelling of the ſame word among writers muſt not be taken for ſo many different readings, the orthography of the Greek Language not being the ſame at all times, nor in all places. Some authors write ἰφνίη, others ἰμφίνη; ſome ἀντῖ; others ἀντὶ, &c. There are ſeveral readings of this ſort in Dr. Mill's collection. As to thoſe, which are ambiguous, we are to place in this rank all thoſe collected from the quotations of the fathers, when it is uncertain whether they were ſo in their copies, or whether quoting them by memory they have not forgot the proper terms of the original. It is neceſſary was admitted there very young, and ſoon made a conſiderable progreſs in his ſtudies. Upon the recommendation of Baron Spanheim he was appointed tutor to the two ſons of the Count de Schwerin, Prime Miniſter of the King of Pruſſia, who, upon our author's quitting that ſtation, procured him from that Prince a penſion of four hundred livres. He had likewiſe a promiſe of a Profeſſorſhip of polite learning in the College of Joachim. Till this ſhould be vacant, Kuſter, who was then but between twenty five and twenty ſix years of age, reſolved to travel into Germany, France, England, and Holland. He went firſt to Francfort upon the Oder, where he ſtudied the Civil Law for ſome time, and thence to Antwerp, Leyden, and Utrecht, where he ſtaid a conſiderable time, and wrote there ſeveral works. Having collected ſome money by this means, and by reading Lectures upon the public Law to the German Noblemen, he left Utrecht in 1699; and took a voyage to England, from whence he went to France in the beginning of the year following. His chief employment there was to collate Suidas with three manuſcripts in the King's Library, which furniſhed him with a great many fragments, which had never been publiſhed. About the end of the year 1700 he returned to England, and in four years finiſhed his edition of Suidas, in which he laboured day and night. He related himſelf, that being one night awaked by thunder and lightning, he was ſeized with a dreadful apprehenſion on account of this work, ſo that he roſe immediately, and carried it to bed with him, with all the affection of a father for an only ſon. He was honoured with the degree of Doctor by the Univerſity of Cambridge, which made him ſeveral advantageous offers to continue there, but he was obliged to wave them, being recalled to Berlin, where he was inſtalled in the Profeſſorſhip which had been promiſed him. The firſt Profeſſor of the College of Joachim dying, our author imagined, that the date of his appointment, which he carried as high as the moment of his departure, and his new title of Library-keeper to the King, gave him a claim to that poſt of honour. But a Profeſſor, who was prior to him in the exerciſe of his function, obtaining that place, he extremely reſented it. At the end of the year the Treaſurer, who paid the Profeſſors, demanding a fee out of his ſtipend, Kuſter refuſed to allow it; and exclaiming the ſecond time againſt it as an injuſtice, propoſed at laſt to reſign his places for a ſum of money. The Treaſurer taking him at his word, he received ten thouſand livres, and returned to Holland, and went to Amſterdam, where he boarded for ſome time, and afterwards took an houſe. He had gained ſome money by his edition of Suidas, and was aſſiſted by ſome of his relations. But the expence of living at Amſterdam being great, he removed to Rotterdam, where he hoped to live cheaper; though he found himſelf miſtaken. He went ſome time after to Antwerp to confer with the Jeſuits with regard to his doubts about Religion; and being brought over by them to the Roman Catholic Religion, he abjured that of the Proteſtants on the 25th of July 1713 in the Church of the Noviciate belonging to the Jeſuits. The King of France rewarded him with a penſion of two thouſand livres, and as a mark of diſtinction ordered him to be admitted ſupernumerary Aſſociate of the Academy of Inſcriptions. But he did not enjoy this new ſettlement long; for he died on the 12th of October 1716 of an abceſs in the Pancreas, being forty ſix years of age. He was of an eaſy and quiet diſpoſition. He was a great maſter of the Latin tongue, and wrote well in it; but his chief excellence was his ſkill in the Greek language, to which he almoſt entirely devoted himſelf. He conſidered the hiſtory and chronology of Greek words (theſe were his uſual expreſſions) as the moſt ſolid entertainment of a man of letters.

ceſſary to proceed with caution in that caſe. In the mean time if the manner, in which a paſſage is quoted in the works of a father, does not appear in an antient manuſcript or verſion, nor in any other father of the Church, it is to be ſuppoſed, that the reading is falſe, and that the ſame is owing only to the forgetfulneſs of him, who makes the quotation. But if it be confirmed by the authority of one or two fathers of the Church, and not to be found in any manuſcript or verſion, the ſame ought to be ranked among theſe, which are doubtful. With reſpect to the various readings, which are of ſome importance, Dr. Kuſter makes ſome remarks omitted by Dr. Mill, and corrects ſome in which he believes that learned Divine to have been miſtaken. Dr. Mill, for inſtance, has ſet down a various reading from Suidas relating to a paſſage, which he thought that author had quoted from Luke XVI. 3. whereas it was really a quotation from Ariſtophanes. But as Dr. Kuſter has taken notice of ſome errors of Dr. Mill, on the other hand he ſometimes vindicates him againſt ſuch criticks, who have cenſured him without cauſe. He has compared the text with twelve MSS. which Dr. Mill never ſaw. Of theſe twelve there were nine in the King of France's library; but except one, which has all the books of the new teſtament, all the reſt contain no more than the four Goſpels. The tenth MS. belonged to Mr. Carpzovius, a Miniſter at Leipſic, and contains the four Goſpels. The 11th was brought from Greece by Mr. Seidel of Berlin; but it has not the four Goſpels. The laſt, which was one of thoſe, that Dr. Kuſter eſteemed moſt, was communicated to him by Mr. Bornier, who bought it at the public ſale of the library of Mr. Francius, Profeſſor of Rhetoric at Amſterdam. After the preface of Dr. Kuſter there follows a letter of Monſieur Le Clerc, concerning Dr. Mill's work, XI. *Epiſtola, in quâ Præfatio quam V. C. J. Upon this account he deſpiſed all other parts of learning; and Mr. Themiſeul relates in his Letters, that this zealous Grammarian meeting one day with Monſieur Bayle's Commentaire Philoſophique in a Bookſeller's ſhop, he threw it down, and ſaid, "This "is nothing but a book of reaſoning: non ſic itur ad Aſtra (a)." Since the writing of this, we have received a letter from the very learned Mr. Joſeph Waſſe [B], Rector

[B] A letter from the very learned Mr. Joſeph Waſſe . . . containing ſeveral curious particulars concerning our author.] Mr. Waſſe writes as follows. "Dr. Kuſter, "a tall, thin, pale man, ſeemingly unable to bear fa- "tigue, was nevertheleſs indefatigable and of an un- "common application to letters. He formed himſelf "under Grævius. I was acquainted with him from "1700 to 1714. Upon my collecting the Remains of "Anacreon for Mr. Barnes about 1702, he intro- "duced me to Dr. Bentley. You muſt be known, ſays "he, to that Gentleman, whom I look upon, not only as "the firſt ſcholar in Europe, but as the beſt of friends. "I only hinted to him the difficulty I lay under in rela- "tion to the officers of the cuſtoms, and preſently after he "accommodated that troubleſome affair to my intire ſatis- "faction, without ſo much as once letting me know he "had any hand in it till near a year after: unde ſatis "compertum mihi Bentleium eſſe re officioſum, non "verbis. Many an excellent emendation upon Suidas "have I received from him. I the rather mention "this, continues Mr. Waſſe, becauſe when that Lexi- "con was in the preſs, Kuſter with indignation ſhew- "ed me an anonymous letter in Latin addreſſed "to him, wherein he was adviſed not to treat the "Doctor with that diſtinction, if he intended his "book ſhould make its way in the learned world. "But to proceed, when he came to write upon Sui- "das, he found himſelf under a neceſſity of making "Indices of all the authors mentioned by the anti- "ents, Euſtathius particularly, and 19 Volumes of "commentaries upon Ariſtotle &c. of the hiſtory, "Geography, and chronological characters occaſional- "ly mentioned. Dr. Bentley prevailed upon me to "give him ſome aſſiſtance. Thoſe that fell to my "lot were chiefly Euſtathius on the Odyſſea, ſeven "or eight ſcholiaſts, Plutarch, Galen. You may "judge of Kuſter's diſpatch and application, when I "tell you, I could by no means keep pace with him, "though I began the laſt author Jan. 9. 1703, and "finiſhed him March 8th of the ſame year, and in "proportion too the remainder. Though I corrected "all the ſheets of the firſt volume, yet I never per- "ceived he had omitted ſome leſs material words, "nor ever knew the true reaſon. I have heard him "blamed too for not mentioning the names of one or "two perſons, who ſent him a few notes. But this was "occaſioned, I am confident, by the hurry he was "always in, and the great number of letters, memo- "randums, and other papers he had about him. As "I remember he tranſlated de novo in a manner five "or ſix ſheets a week, and remarked upon them; ſo "that the work was haſtily executed, and would have "been infinitely more perfect, had he allowed him- "ſelf time. Some people thought they aſſiſted "him, when they did not. A perſon of figure took him "into his cloſet after dinner, and told him he would "communicate ſomething of mighty importance, a "κειμήλιον, which in all difficulties had been many "years his oracle. In an ill hour I met Kuſter "tranſported with delight. We found it was Budæus's "Lexicon, large paper, with only the names of the "authors he quotes writ in the margin, without one "ſingle remark or addition. Kuſter, the beſt na- "tured man alive, was terribly put to it how to treat "one, that meant well, and continually enquired "what ſervice it did him, and triumphed that he "was able to contribute ſo largely to the worthy editor "of Suidas. Towards the cloſe of the work, Kuſter "grew very uneaſy, emaciated to the laſt degree, "cold as a ſtatue, and juſt as much alive as a "man three parts dead. Sure I was to hear eve- "ry time I called upon him, O utinam illuceſ- "cat iſte Dies, quo huic Operi manum ultimam "imponam! It may now be proper to acquaint "you in what manner this Gentleman uſed to relax "and forget his labours over a bottle (for even Scipio "and Lælius were not ſuch fools as to be wiſe always); "and that was generally in the Poetical way, or in "converſations, that turned upon antiquities, coins, "inſcriptions, and obſcure paſſages of the antients. "Sometimes he performed on the ſpinet at our muſic "club, and was by the connoiſſeurs accounted a maſter. "His chief companions were Dr. Sike, famous in "Oriental Learning, Davies, and Needham; Mr. "Oddy, who writ Greek pretty well, and has left "notes upon Dio, and a verſion of Apollonius Rho- "dius, which are repoſited in Lord Oxford's Library; "he is the perſon whoſe conjectures upon Avienus were "printed by Dr. Hudſon at the end of his Geogra- "phers; and Mr. Barnes the Greek Profeſſor; con- "cerning whom I beg leave to inſert a few particu- "lars known to none beſides myſelf. His mother "that was afterwards, was carried to Church to be "buried; but the nails of the coffin being ob- "ſerved to make her bleed, they immediately gave "her air, and ſhe recovered. Sir Eraſmus Smith of "Eſſex, aged near 60, and not intending to marry, "reſolved to adopt one of the ſcholars of Chriſt's "Hoſpital. Barnes was recommended by the maſter, "and approved of by the Knight, who offered to ſettle "an eſtate of two thouſand pounds a year upon him, "provided he would change his name. The mother, "a woman of ſenſe, was for it; but his father would "by no means interpoſe, and left it entirely to his "ſon to act as he pleaſed; and poverty was his option "and fate. The Knight afterward married, and had "iſſue, and often invited Joſhua to his houſe. I have "the ſame opinion of dreams that Petronius "had; however I cannot help relating one, that he "ſpoke often of. Two or three years before the in- "tended adoption, when he knew not what a verſe "was, he thought himſelf aſſaulted by a ragged boy, "who called himſelf Poverty. They fought a long "time, and Barnes at laſt killed him near a Church- "Door; upon which his father appeared in the ha- "bit of a genius, and congratulated him in words that "ended thus;

"He proteſted to me, that he told this next morn- "ing to his ſchool-fellows, and they acquainted him "with the ſenſe and meaſure. The event was, that "he got rid of poverty by marrying an old rich widow, "that knew nothing of Greek, but admired and loved "the ſound of it. His Eſther was thought to exceed "any thing of Duport's on Rhodomannus, and "pleaſed the Univerſity ſo much, that he ventured to "appear for the Profeſſorſhip, but was not well uſed "by the Electors. One of them (Dr. Montagu) told "me that the candidates examined each other "publicly; that Barnes challenged Mich. Paine to "ſpeak or write; both which he wiſely declin- "ed; then they opened Ariſtophanes, in which Barnes "appeared vaſtly ſuperior. However the Doctor "voted, but with reluctancy, for one of his own Col- "lege. This repulſe in a thing he had ſet his heart "upon, quite turned his head, inſomuch that he could "hardly bear the ſight of a Greek book for a long "time. At laſt he turned himſelf to Engliſh Hiſtory, "which made him known to numbers of Gentlemen, "whoſe regimen was too warm for a man of letters; "ſo that when I knew him, he ſeemed to be nil niſi "magni nominis umbra. When ſome of us pointed "out any of his miſtakes in Euripides, Ye little Smatte- "rers, ſays he, I have forgot more Greek than any of "you ever knew. Kuſter often amuſed himſelf in "challenging Barnes, though more than his match "in compoſition. Both ſpoke the language, but "neither readily. Both wrote in ſeveral meaſures; "Kuſter after much premeditation, Barnes generally in "eight or ten minutes. Kuſter's talent lay in the "Iambic and Hendecaſyllabon; the other was equally "ready in any kind of verſe; but when he corrected "any thing, it was for the worſe. In many trials I

Every body whispered (he " was a little deaf) This must nonplus him; but he " overheard them, and wrote on without being any " way disconcerted; Silence; τῆλυτον is the proper term: " See Leo Imperator's Tactics, & Simocatta. I am sen- " sible how frigid these trifles will appear to a reader, " who has time to criticise and invent; whereas they " appeared otherwise to those, who were in re præsenti. " One gave, Nocte pluit notâ &c: Barnes immediately " cries.

" Upon publication of Suidas, Kuster in a little time " grew very fat, and returning into Prussia found his " patrons retired from Court, and his salary precа- " rious. What was more, his principles, which in- " clined to what is now called Arianism, rendered " him not very acceptable to some persons. In a " little time measures were taken to make him un- " easy, and he retired to Amsterdam. It seems the " people of Berlin were of a different opinion from " an old Gentlewoman, who thought herself some- " body. She boarded in the same house with Kuster, " and heard him often speak of Pearson's manuscript " Suidas. Is Mr. Kuster within, Madam? said a " Gentleman. I think he is; you are a young man; " I am glad you keep such company. You intend, I hear, " to give him a degree: I am sure he gives you a good " example. He is a devout Christian: he will go to " Heaven be sure, for he reads blessed Bishop Pearson " day and night.—Pray Madam, shorten your sermon; " I am in haste.—Ah these scholars, they love nothing " that's good.—Mary, call the Professor. At Amsterdam " Kuster reprinted Dr. Mills's New Testament, and " published Aristophanes, and some additional remarks " upon Suidas under Mr. Le Clerc's cover. But his " banker failing, he was reduced to extreme poverty; " and happening at that very juncture to be invited " to Paris by his old friend l'Abbe Bignon, was unfor- " tunately prevailed on to join himself to the Galli- " can Church. He desired me to write to him as " usual, but never on the article of religion; de- " claring at the same time, how he had not been " obliged to make a formal recantation, or condemn " the Reformed by any express act of his; but merely " to conform. How far this is true, I know not; " what is certain is only, that he was promised all " the favour and distinction any convert could ex- " pect. He was presently admitted a Member of " the Royal Academy of Inscriptions, and in 1714 " in return for a paper of verses I sent him, made me " a present of his book De vero usu verborum media- " rum; χρύσια χαλκείων. The last I had from Kuster " contained only Queries upon Hesychius, on whom, " before he left England, he had made about five " thousand emendations. His Queries were not over " difficult; and from thence I guessed his health much " impaired; and it proved so indeed, for we heard " soon after, that he had been blooded five or six " times for a fever, and that upon opening his body, " there was found a cake of sand along the lower re- " gion of the belly. This, I take it, was occasioned " by his sitting in e manner double, and writing on " a very low table, surrounded with three or four " circles of books placed on the ground; which was " the situation we usually found him in. He had a " clear head, cool, and proper for debate; he be- " haved in a very inoffensive manner, and I am per- " suaded the last error of his life was almost the only " one, and will by charitable persons be placed in " good measure to the account of his deplorable cir- " cumstances; for if oppression, which only affects " a part, will, why shall not the loss of all one's for- " tunes, purchased with so much labour, make a wise " man mad? Let those only censure him, who in " plentiful circumstances have the spirit to serve their " country without place or title." We shall subjoin here the following letters of Dr. Kuster to Mr. Wasse.

KYRIANDER (WILLIAM), a German Civilian, having begun his ſtudies of Civil Law in Germany, continued them in France and at Padua; and went afterwards to Venice, in order to join the practice to the theory by frequenting the bar (a). He undertook there a tranſlation of a work of Leander Alberti [A], which was printed at Cologne in 1567. You will find in Moreri, that he was Syndic of Treves, and that he publiſhed the Annals of that City [B]; but you will find there that he changed his Religion; and that his work was greatly decried on that account by the Jeſuits [C].

[A] He . . . undertook a tranſlation of a work of Leander Alberti.] This work contains a Deſcription of Italy, and has not been deſpiſed by learned men. Read Voſſius, Ch. XII. lib. 3. de Hiſtoricis Latinis (1), and la Popeliniere, pag. 414. of the Hiſtory of Hiſtories. Kyriander made uſe of three Italian editions of the work, which he tranſlated into Latin; but I am ſurprized that he ſays nothing of the edition, which was enlarged with the Deſcription of the Iſlands near Italy. This edition was printed at Venice appreſſo Ludovico de gli Avanzi in 1561 in 4to. The Tranſlator was greatly in the wrong not to have followed this, and not to have added to his work this Deſcription of the Iſlands.

(1) Pag. m. 680.

[B] He publiſhed the Annals of that City.] It is a work in folio, and was printed at Deuxponts in 1603. Michael Hertzius does not mention this edition; he only takes notice of that of 1625, and pretends, that theſe Annals begin in the year of the world 966 (2). This is carrying them up above ſeven hundred years before the deluge. Zeiller (3) might have informed him, that he ſhould have ſaid 1966, and not 966. In the ſecond edition of Moreri printed in Holland it is 1066. This is carrying it back near ſix hundred years before Noah.

LABE (LOYSA or LOUISA) a curtezan of Lyons, has been ranked among the French authors by la Croix du Maine, and du Verdier-Vau-Privas. She flouriſhed at Lyons under Henry II in the year 1555 (a), and her works were printed there the ſame year [A]. She did not act like curtezans in all reſpects; for if ſhe, on one hand, was of their turn of mind, in that ſhe would be well paid for her favours; on the other hand ſhe ſhewed a certain regard for men of learning which women of that character have not, ſhe indulging them the favour on free coſt. Her character will be better known by the paſſage cited below [B].

(a) La Croix du Maine, pag. 291.

[A] Her works were printed at Lyons in 1555.] They conſiſt of a dialogue in French proſe intitled, Le Debat de Folie & d'Honneur; i. e. "The Conteſt "between Folly and Honour," and ſeveral Poems of her writing (1), as alſo Encomiums written by ſeveral Poets in her honour, in Greek, Latin, Italian, and French (2).

(2) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bib. Françoiſe, p. 822.

[B] Her character will be better known by the paſſage cited below.] I make no alteration in du Verdier's words. "Louiſa Labbe, ſays he (3), a curtezan of "Lyons, (otherwiſe called the beautiful rope-maker's "wife, her huſband being of that trade) was a very "ſkilful rider; for which reaſon the Gentlemen who "had acceſs to her, uſed to call her Captain Lewis. "She was a woman of wit, but not very beautiful. "She entertained at her houſe in the moſt obliging "manner, Lords, Gentlemen, and other perſons of "merit, with converſation, with muſic both vocal and "inſtrumental, in which ſhe was excellently well "ſkilled, with the reading of good Latin, Italian, "and Spaniſh authors, with which her cloſet was a-"bundantly ſtocked; and with the moſt delicious "ſweetmeats. In a word, ſhe uſed to communicate "to them the moſt ſecret things ſhe had; and, to ſay "all in word, was free of her body to ſuch as would "pay for it; however, not to all, and upon no ac-"count to mechanicks and perſons in a low way of "life, though they would have given her ever ſo "much. She was particularly fond of learned men, "who were ſo much in her good graces, that thoſe of "her acquaintance were preferred before any Noble-"man though of the higheſt diſtinction; and ſhe would "rather have indulged a favour to the one gratis, "than to the other for a great number of crowns, "which is contrary to the practice of women of her "profeſſion." This paſſage has been quoted in the continuation of the general critique of Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm (4), and the following remark is added to it (5). "Demoſthenes would have been glad "had Lais the curtezan reſembled this; he would not "have made a voyage to Corinth to no purpoſe; nor "found by experience,

This female honoured and diſhonoured learning at the ſame time; ſhe diſhonoured it, by her leading the life of a proſtitute at the ſame time that ſhe was an authoreſs; and ſhe honoured it, becauſe the Literati were more favourably received by her gratis, than ignorant people, though they offered her a conſiderable ſum.

☞This being a curious article, and very imperfect in Bayle, becauſe he had not the materials for it, we ſhall endeavour to ſupply what is wanting in it.

[A] Writers are divided with regard to the true Orthography of her name.] LABE (1) is her true name, and not Labbé, L'Abbe, or Labe, as Bayle calls her. Our authoreſs, on account of her charms, was called the beautiful rope-maker's wife, becauſe her husband was of that trade; or rather, as father Colonia believes with probability enough, becauſe he traded in cordage and cables; a name ſhe left to the city in Lyons where ſhe lived, and which it retains to this day, it being called Ruë Belle-Codiere.

(1) From the remarks to the Paris edit. 1734, of Bayle's Dictionary, tom. 3. pag. 896. This author thinks her name was Labbé. See alſo Niceron, Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 23. pag. 242, 243. Paris 1703, 12mo.

[B] Her contemporaries laviſhed every kind of applauſe on her.] La Croix du Maine calls her a very learned woman, who wrote finely both in proſe and verſe, and adds that ſhe had the following words for her anagram, Belle à ſoy. Paradin, who was at Lyons in her time, and very probably was acquainted with her, beſtows an extravagant elogium on her, and applauds particularly her virtue and chaſtity. "Louiſa Labé (ſays "he) had a face, which reſembled more that of an "angel than of a human creature; but this was no-"thing in compariſon of the beauties of her mind, "which was ſo chaſt, ſo virtuous, ſo poetical, and "filled with ſuch excellent knowledge, that ſhe ſeem-"ed to have been created by Heaven, to be admired as "a ſhining miracle among men. For ſhe was not only "ſkilled in the Latin tongue, in ſuch a manner as is a-"bove the capacity of her ſex, but ſhe likewiſe excelled "ſurpriſingly in the poeſy of the vulgar tongues, "of which the works ſhe has left to poſterity are a "proof (2)." James Pollelier, a phyſician, mathematician and poet, wrote an ode in her praiſe, where-in he highly applauds her learning and merit. Others alſo wrote verſes in her commendation, and ſome of theſe are annexed to her works. Beſides her knowledge in languages and her talent at compoſition, ſhe played finely on the lute, and was a very ſkilful rider; a proof of her having been well educated, and that ſhe was not ſo meanly deſcended as the profeſſion of a rope-maker, which du Verdier aſcribes to her huſband, might make it to be ſuppoſed (3). The author from whom I now borrow, goes on to obſerve, that all the fine qualities which were admired in her, were depraved by a licentiouſneſs, which though more refined, than that of Lais or Phryne's, was not therefore leſs blame-worthy (4).

[C] We ſhall here give an account of her works.] All the compoſitions ſhe left are compriſed in a book which is exremely ſcarce, and entitled Ouvres de Louize Labé, Lionnoiſe. Lion. Jean de Tournes 1556, in 16mo, pag. 176 not figured. However du Verdier dates it 1555; but I nevertheleſs am of opinion that there was an edition before that of 1556. He perhaps put that year, becauſe the dedication is dated the 24th of July 1555, and the book was publiſhed at the cloſe of that year. Louiſa Labé inſcribed this dedication to A. M. C. D. B. L. that is, A Mademoiſelle Clemence de Bourges, Lionnoiſe, who alſo was conſpicuous for her merit and learning. I find by Mr. de la Monnoye's manuſcript additions to the Bibliotheques Françoiſes of la Croix du Maine and du Verdier, that John Garou printed a ſecond edition of them in Roan the ſame year 1556 in 16° (5). in this collection are as follow: Debat de Folie & d'Amour; i. e. "Conteſt of Love and Folly." This is a very ingenious dialogue in proſe, the ſubject of which is as follows. Jupiter had invited all the Gods to a banquet. Love and Folly happened to come, at the ſame time, to the gate of the palace of that God, in order to be one of his gueſts; but the gate was ſhut, and only the wicket open. Folly ſeeing Love juſt going to ſtep one foot in, advanced in order to get before him, Love being thruſt upon, fell into a paſſion, but folly inſiſted that ſhe ought to have the precedency: upon this they fell a quarelling about their reſpective prerogatives: love finding he could not gain his point by reaſon and argument, bends his bow, and lets fly an arrow at folly, who baffles all his attempts by becoming inviſible; and a moment after ſatiates her vengeance on love by tearing out his eyes, and covering the place with a bandage, which could not be taken off. Venus complains to Jupiter againſt folly, and the God is determined to hear their cauſe. Apollo is council for love, and Mercury for folly; when Jupiter after hearing the debates and conſulting the reſt of the Gods, pronounced ſentence as follows: On account of the difficulty and importance of your diſputes, and the diverſity of your opinions, we have ſuſpended your conteſt from this day to three times ſeven times nine centuries. In the mean time we command you to live amicably together, without injuring one another. Folly ſhall lead love, and take him whitherſoever he pleaſes; and when reſtored to his ſight, (after conſulting the fates) Sentence ſhall be pronounced (6). This charming fiction has ſince been exhibited in a variety of lights, ſeveral Poets having laid claim to it.

(6) Ibid. pag. 249.

[D] Her elegies, of which we will give a ſpecimen.] There are three elegies, part of the third of which we ſhall tranſcribe, becauſe it relates to our Louiſa Labé. Her lines are as follow:

Quand vous lirez, O Dames Lionnoiſes,
Ces miens écrits pleins d'amoureuſes noiſes;
Quand mes regrets, ennuis, depits & larmes
M'orrez chanter en pitoyables Carmes,
Ne veuillez point condamner ma ſimpleſſe,
Et jeune erreur de ma fole jeuneſſe,
Si c'eſt erreur: mais qui deſſous les Cieux
Se peut vanter de n'être vicieux?
L'un n'eſt content de ſa ſorte de vie,
Et toujours porte a ſes voiſins envie.
L'un forcenant de voir la paix en terre,
Par tous moyens tâche y mettre la guerre.
L'autre croyant pauvreté être vice,
A autre Dieu qu'Or ne fait ſacrifice.
L'autre ſa foy a parjure il emploira
A decevoir quelqu'un qui le croira.
L'un en mentant de ſa langue lezarde
Mille brocards ſur l'un & l'autre darde.
Je ne ſuis point ſous ces planetes née,
Qui m'euſſent pu tant faire infortunée.
Oncques ne fut mon oeil marri, de voir
Chez mon voiſin mieux que chez moi pleuvoir.
Onc ne mis noiſe ou diſcord entre amis;
A faire gain jamais ne me ſoumis;
Mentir, tromper, & abuſer autrui,
Tant m'a déplû que medire de lui.
Mais ſi en moi rien y a d'imparfait,
Qu'on blame amour, c'eſt lui ſeul qui l'a fait,
Sur mon verd âge en ſes laqs il me prit,
Lors qu'exercois mon corps & mon eſprit,
En mille & mille euvres ingenieuſes,
Qu'en peu de temps me rendit ennuieuſes,
Pour bien ſavoir avec l'aiguille peindre,
J'euſſe entrepis la renommée eſtreindre
De celle là, qui plus docte que ſage,
Avec Pallas comparoit ſon Ouvrage,
Qui m'eût vû lors en armes fiere aller,
Porter la lance & bois faire voler
Le devoir faire en l'eſtour furieux,
Piquer, volter, le Cheval glorieux,
Pour Bradamante, où la haute Marphiſe,
Soeur de Roger, il m'euſt, poſſible, priſe.
Mais quoi? Amour ne put longuement voir
Mon coeur n'aimant que Mars & le ſavoir,
Et me voulant donner autre ſouci,
En ſouriant, il me diſoit ainſi:
Tu penſes donq, o Lionnoiſe Dame,
Pouvoir fuir par ce moyen ma flame:
Mais non feras; j'ai ſubjugué les Dieux
Es bas Enfers, en la Mer & es Cieux:
Et penſes tu que n'aye tel pouvoir
Sur les Humains, de leur faire ſavoir
Qu'il n'y a rien qui de ma main échape?
Plus fort ſe penſe, & plus tôt je le frape.
De me blamer, quelquefois tu n'as honte,
En te fiant en Mars, dont tu fais conte:
Mais maintenant, voy ſi pour perſiſter
En le ſuivant me pourras reſiſter.
Ainſi parloit, & tout echaufé d'ire,
Hors de ſa trouſſe une ſagette il tire,
Et decochant de ſon extrême force,
Droit la tira contre ma tendre ecorce;
Foible harnois, pour bien couvrir le coeur,
Contre l'Archer, qui toujours eſt vanqueur.
La Breche faite, entre Amour en la place,
Dont le repos premierement il chaſſe;
Et le travail qu'il me donne ſans ceſſe.
Boire, manger, & dormir ne me laiſſe,
Il ne me chaut de Soleil ne d'ombrage:
Je n'ai qu'Amour & feu en mon courage,
Qui me deguiſe & fait autre paroître,
Tant que ne peus moi même me connoître.
Je n'avois vû encore ſeize Hivers,
Lorque j'entrai en ces ennuis divers;
Et jà voici le troizieme Eté,
Que mon coeur fut par amour arrêté.
Le temps met fin aux hautes Pyramides,
Le temps met fin aux fontaines humides,
Il ne pardonne aux braves Coliſées,
Il met à fin les Villes plus priſées;
Finir auſſi il a acoutumé
Le feu d'Amour, tant ſoit-il allumé.
Mais, las! en moi il ſemble qu'il augmente
Avec le temps, & que plus me tourmente.
Paris aima Oenone ardemment,
Mais ſon amour ne dura longuement.
Medée fut aymée de Jaſon,
Qui tôt après la mit hors ſa maiſon.
Si meritoient elles être eſtimées,
Et pour aimer leurs Amis, être aimées.
S'étant aimé, on peut amour laiſſer,
N'eſt il raiſon, ne l'étant, ſe laſſer?
N'eſt il raiſon te prier de permettre,
Amour, que puiſſe à mes tourmens fin mettre?
Ne permets point que de Mort faſſe épreuve,
Et plus que toi pitoyable la treuve:
Mais ſi tu veux que j'aime juſqu'au bout,
Fais que celui que j'eſtime mon tout,
Qui ſeul me peut faire plorer & rire,
Et pour le quel ſi ſouvent je ſoupire,
Sente en ſes os, en ſon ſang, en ſon ame,
Ou plus ardente, ou plus égale flâme.
Alors ton faix plus aiſé me ſera,
Quand avec moi quelqu'un te portera (7).

" Ye Ladies of Lyons, when you ſhall read theſe compoſitions of mine filled with amorous conteſts; when you ſhall hear me ſing in doleful ſtrains, my uneaſineſſes, vexations, woes and tears, condemn not my ſimplicity, and the error of my ſilly youth, if it be an error; but what mortal under the cope of Heaven can boaſt perfection in all reſpects? One is not contented with his condition of life, and is eternally envying his neighbour. A ſecond, enraged to ſee the earth bleſſed with peace, ſets every engine at work to light up a war on it. Another imagining poverty to be a vice, offers ſacrifice to no other Deity but gold. A fourth employs his perjured faith, to deceive any perſon, who ſhall truſt in him. And a fifth lying with his venomous tongue, darts out a thouſand taunts and ſcoffs one upon another. Now I was not born under one of thoſe inauſpicious planets, which ſhould make me ſo unhappy in myſelf. My eye was never pained to ſee my neighbour more favoured with the ſmiles of fortune than myſelf. I never created ſtrife or diſcord among friends; and never was venal enough to hunt after profit; to lie, deceive and impoſe on ano-

She alſo wrote twenty four ſonnets [E], the firſt of which is in Italian. To the writings of our authoreſs are annexed Verſes of various Poets in her praiſe. Theſe conſiſt of twenty four pieces in different kinds of Poetry, one whereof is in Latin, four in Italian, and the reſt in French; but there are none in Greek, notwithſtanding the aſſertion of du Verdier. The laſt copy of verſes is of a very great length (20 pages) ſome particulars whereof being of uſe, ſhewing eſpecially her great bravery, we ſhall tranſcribe them below [F]. By them we find that ſhe was born about the year 1526 (a). La Croix du Maine has committed two errors, 1ſt in calling our authoreſs Louiſa L'Abé, inſtead of Labé; and 2dly, in giving her Dialogue the title of the Conteſt of Folly and Honour, inſtead of Folly and Love (b).

But now ſee whether, by conti- " nuing to follow his ſtandards, thou canſt be able to " reſiſt me.* Saying theſe words, and inflamed with " anger, he drew a ſhaft from his quiver, and letting " fly with all his might, levelled directly at my frail " body; too weak an armour to defend my heart from " the ever-victorious archer. Cupid had no ſooner " made a breach, but he marches into the place, " whence he firſt drives away quiet; and the inceſſant " toils, which he obliges me to undergo, will not ſuffer " me to eat, drink, or ſleep. The ſun or the ſhade " are equally indifferent to me; I have nothing " but love and fire in my courage, which diſ- " guiſes me to ſuch a degree, that I do not know " myſelf. I was not ſixteen years old, when I was " ſubjected to theſe various cares; and thirteen ſum- " mers are now paſt ſince my heart was firſt captivated " by love... Time deſtroys the moſt lofty pyramids, " dries up the moſt copious ſprings; does not ſpare " the moſt magnificent amphitheatres, nor the moſt re- " nowned cities. He alſo uſed to extinguiſh the fire of " love, how ſtrongly ſoever it might blaze; but alas; " time ſeems to encreaſe its ardors in me, and to " torture me ſtill more. Paris was fired with a ſtrong " paſſion for Oenone, but then his paſſion was not laſt- " ing. Medea was beloved by Jaſon, who ſoon after " turned her out of doors. Nevertheleſs they merited " eſteem; and love ought to have been repaid with " love... If a perſon may leave an object to whom " he is dear; is it not reaſonable that one who loves " and is not loved again ſhould grow tired? Is it not " reaſonable, O Cupid, for me to beſeech thee to per- " mit me to end my torments? Suffer me not to fall a " victim to death, and to find it more compaſſionate " than thou. But if thou wilt have my paſſion to be " laſting, cauſe the dear man, whom I eſteem as my " only treaſure; who alone has the power to make " me laugh or weep, and for whom I ſo often ſigh; " cauſe him, I ſay, to feel in his bones, in his blood, " in his ſoul, a more ardent, or at leaſt an equal flame. " Thy burthen will then be lighter, when another ſhall " aſſiſt me in ſupporting it."

[E] She alſo wrote twenty four ſonnets.] Our Louiſa declares her real ſentiments with regard to love, when ſhe ſays at the end of the eighteenth:

Permets m'Amour penſer quelque folie:
Toujours ſuis mal, vivant diſcretement;
Et ne me puis donner contentement
Si hors de moi ne fais quelque ſaillie.

The ſenſe is,

Perpignan was beſieged in 1542. Louiſa Labé was preſent at it, in a man's habit, when but a Pucelle, as the author cited by me ſtiles her, and before ſhe knew what love was; and conſequently at fifteen or ſixteen years of age; ſince according to the elegy quoted above (9), her breaſt began to be fired by love, and occaſioned her to quit a military life, before ſhe was ſixteen. But it was preſently after this ſiege, that ſhe laid aſide the ſword, as is manifeſt from the third elegy in queſtion, where ſhe ſays that thirteen ſummers are now paſt, ſince my heart was firſt captivated by love. For as this elegy was writ, the lateſt, in 1555, when our Louiſa wrote the dedication to her compoſitions; ſubſtracting 13 from that number gives us 1542, which was the very year of the ſiege of Perpignan. From all this it follows that Louiſa Labé was about twenty nine years of age in 1555, and conſequently was born about the year 1526 (10).

Cicero killed two birds with one ſtone: He laughed at Laberius, and the great number of newly created Senators, whoſe number had been greatly augmented by Cæſar; ſimul & illum reſpuens, & in novum Senatum jocatus, cujus numerum Cæſar ſupra fas auxerat (9). But the anſwer accuſed him of trimming (10), i. e. of not being the true friend either of Cæſar or Pompey: Cicero male audiebat, tanquam nec Pompeio certus amicus, nec Cæſari, ſed utriuſque adulator (11). [F] Moreri has committed ſome errors.] I. Laberius's prænomen is not Decius but Decimus. II. He lived ſo ſhort a time after Julius Cæſar, that it was not neceſſary to ſay he lived in Auguſtus's time. III. He never received preſents from Auguſtus. IV; nor does Macrobius ſay ſo. V. It is a falſity to aſſert that Cæſar made him a Roman Knight. Laberius delivers himſelf as follows in the prologue to the farce, which he played out of complaiſance to that Emperor.

Ergo bis tricenis annis actis ſine nota,
Eques Romanus Lare egreſſus meo
Domum revertar mimus (16).

"I who ſpent thirty years twice told, with Fame;
"Who left my houſe, a Roman Knight, ſhall now
"Return a Farcer."

(16) Macrobius, Saturn. lib. 2. cap. 7. pag. 343.

This is an indiſputable proof, that he was a Roman Knight independently of Cæſar. The circumſtance which miſled Moreri and many other writers (17) is, that Cæſar, at the end of the games, gave a ring to this farce player, as Macrobius informs us; but it is eaſy to find in this very place a proof of the juſtice of my cenſure. Here follows the whole paſſage. Deinde cum Laberius in fine ludorum annulo honoratus a Cæſare e veſtigio in quatuordecim ad ſpectandum tranſiit, violato ordine, & cum detrectatus eſt EQUES Romanus, & cum mimus remiſſus, ait Cicero prætereunti Laberio & ſedile quærenti, recepiſſem te niſi anguſte ſederem (18). i. e. "Afterwards when Laberius, being honoured "by Cæſar with a ring at the end of the Games, "would have paſt over to the fourteen benches, an af"front being put on the order, by a place being re"fuſed to a Roman Knight, and a Mime ſent back; "Cicero ſaid to him as he was paſſing by, and look"ing about for a ſeat; I am crouded, Laberius, other"wiſe would have made room for you." It is plain Macrobius ſays, that the order of knights was diſhonoured two ways; I, becauſe a Roman Knight was refuſed a ſeat; and II, becauſe a farce player was ſent from the ſtage to that part, where the Roman Knights uſed to ſit. From this we muſt neceſſarily infer, that Laberius was not obliged to Julius Cæſar for the honour of Knighthood. All that can be ſaid is, that he did an action derogatory to his character by playing on the ſtage, but was reſtored to his honour by Julius Cæſar. The ring, which he received from that prince, might be conſidered as a freſh patent of nobility, but this does not excuſe Moreri. Seneca confirms what was juſt now ſaid. Divus Julius ludis ſuis mimum produxit (Laberium) deinde equeſtri illum ordini redditum juſſit ire ſeſſum in equeſtrio: omnes ita ſe coactaverunt ut venientem non reciperent (19).

[A] It is ſaid he had been Count Charles of Mansfeld's barber.] Bongarſius affirms this, in a letter written to Camerarius the 6th of Auguſt 1596, in which he ſent him advices with regard to the ſiege of Hulſt. Some, ſays he (1), write that Labourlotte has been killed there (2); that man ſo renowned for his intrepidity and courage. He had formerly been barber to that Count Charles of Mansfeld who died in Hungary. The cardinal made uſe chiefly of this Labourlotte's intrepidity, and de Rone's counſel (3). The author, who publiſhed in 1693 the hiſtory of Archduke Albert, does not own that Labourlotte had been a barber, but he does not ſay any thing that can prove the contrary. His birth, ſays he (4), reſembles that of great men, which is frequently doubtful, Lorrain claims this honour, and Burgundy does the ſame. The name Claude favours the Burgundians. Whatever country he may have been born in, he certainly is well deſcended. The great numbers of enemies he has had, are a manifeſt proof of his extraordinary merit. The thunder of envy paſſes over buſhes, and ſtrikes lofty trees. They ſay that he was of mean extraction, and that he had handled the razor and lancet, before he wielded the ſword and pike; but thoſe who are exempt from prejudice ſpeak otherwiſe. They ſay that he indeed knew how to cure wounds; but that he had been prompted to this ſtudy, not from neceſſity, but out of curioſity and charity. When d'Aubigne (5) relates that Labourlotte was killed at a ſkirmiſh in the counterſcarp of fort Iſabella, which he recruited and furniſhed with freſh proviſions, he adds, that he was bewailed by the Archduke and his ſuperiors; but not by his companions, who burſting with envy, could not bear to think that merit ſhould have raiſed a country barber to the poſt of colonel.

The action indeed would be a very vile one, whatever pleaſure it might have given the Count. The reaſon why I ſay, that this writer's incredulity might be ill grounded is, that Grotius has hinted at this action; a plain indication that he did not believe that the report ſpread concerning it was idle. I will cite his words, they deſerving it, and informing us of Labourlotte's merit, with ſome circumſtances which are well expreſſed. Huc (7) quoque ſe Claudius Burlota tranſtulerat, bonamque & extremam navavit operam, trajectus globo vir nobilis audaciæ, Lotharingus ortu, curandis olim vulneribus vitam

[D] He was wounded on ſeveral occaſions.] At the ſiege of Noion in 1593, that of Andres in the year 1596, that of Hulſt the ſame year, and at the battle of Newport in the year 1600. See Father Galucci (11). I fancy he is miſtaken as to the laſt wound. I do not find any other Hiſtorian who mentions this; and beſides, they all ſay that Labourlotte, a few days after the battle, led a conſiderable ſuccour to Newport, which contributed greatly to the raiſing of the ſiege that Prince Maurice had laid to that place. As to the wound at Hulſt, it was not mortal as Bongarſius pretended. What I cited from him in the firſt remark, was wrote the 6th of Auguſt 1596; he was not undeceived twenty days after; for he affirmed, in his letter dated the 27th of Auguſt of the ſame year, that Labourlotte was dead of his wounds; Burlotta poſt Roſnium ex vulneribus obiit (12). In this manner the miniſters themſelves of Princes are ſubject to publiſh falſe advices, and not to know quickly, that they are falſe. They ought to be more circumſpect on this article, than the perſon I am ſpeaking of was, whoſe abilities otherwiſe deſerve great elogiums. But when we examine him attentively, we cannot forbear ſaying that he too lightly believed agreeable news, and communicated it in too haſty a manner to his friends. Here follows a proof of this, taken from the ſame letter, wherein he affirmed that Labourlotte was dead:

At that time all advices, which were diſadvantageous to Spain, were believed as eaſily as thoſe now (14) are, which are of diſadvantage to France.

[E] He was killed... the 24th of July 1600.] The author of the Hiſtory of Archduke Albert ſays, pag. 138. that it was the 25th of July in 264. he gives Labourlotte's epitaph, which ſays the twenty fourth of that month. This epitaph is of ſervice in the hiſtory of that brave man, and therefore deſerves to be copied here. "He lies buried at Lopogne, in a monument "whereon is the following epitaph. Here lies the "noble and illuſtrious Lord, Meſſire Claude Labour"lotte Knight, a Counſellor of War to the King, Co"lonel of twelve Companies of Luxemburghers, Lord "of Bernſtein, Boncour, la Vallée, Lopogne and "Baſi. He was killed at Fort Iſabella near Oſtend "the 24th of July in the year 1600 (15)." I do not think that this author copied accurately; for, to give an epitaph faithfully, the leaſt letter ought not to be changed in it; the barbariſms and ſoleciſms in it muſt be retained, unleſs the copyiſt gives only the ſubſtance of it. Here follows the epitaph as given by le Baron le Roi, which I fancy differs very little from the original. Here lies the noble and illuſtrious Lord Meſſire Claude de Labourlotte, Knight, and of the council of war; Colonel of twelve companies of Luxemberghers, Lord of Berleſtein, Lord of Boncourt, La Vallée, Loppoigne, Baſy, who was killed near Oſtend in his Majeſty's ſervice the 24th of July 1600. Pray to God for for his ſoul.

Athenæus (13) relates that Lacydes and another Philoſopher named Timon were invited for two days together to a feaſt; and that, in compliance with the humour of the company, they quaffed luſtily. Lacydes gave it over the firſt day, and withdrew the inſtant he found he had enough. Timon ſeeing him quit the field cried out victory, but the next day he yielded firſt. He could not drink off the goblet that was carried to him. Lacydes was even with him. This is vaſtly unſeemly. Philoſophers ought never to diſpute for ſuch a victory. It is not only a fault to gain it, but alſo to ſtrive for it; and though the ignominy of the victor is greater than that of the perſon vanquiſhed, yet the latter deſerves to be ſtrongly cenſured. [F] The particulars which Numenius relates concerning him, have all the air of a pleaſant fiction.] Here follows the ſubſtance of his relation (14). Lacydes was vaſtly penurious in his houſe-keeping. He never truſted his ſervants with any thing; the place where the victuals was lodged was inacceſſible to them. He himſelf put in, and took out, whatever he wanted, and he never left it open; but to prevent his being troubled with the key, he laid it in a hole (16) which he ſealed; after which he uſed to let fall his ſeal into the pantry (17), through the key-hole. His ſervants diſcovering this cheated him whenever they pleaſed. They eaſily got the key; put it into the place whence they had taken it, and ſealed the hole. They drank, they eat, they plundered whatever they thought proper, laughing at him at the ſame time. Lacydes ſoon found that his wine and proviſions dwindled away; and not knowing whom to accuſe, he remembered to have heard, that Arceſilas taught that neither our ſenſes nor our reaſon comprehend any thing; and aſcribed the emptineſs of his bottles and baſkets to that incomprehenſibility. Such are the auſpices, under which he began to philoſophize in Arceſilas's ſchool, againſt the certainty of human knowledge. He even made uſe of that domeſtic experiment to prove that he was in the right to ſuſpend his judgment in all things. I do not, ſaid he one day gravely to a friend, tell you a hearſay; I myſelf know by experience, what I am going to tell you, and can ſpeak of it without the leaſt doubt. Upon this he told him the whole ſtory of his pantry. What could Zeno, added he, ſay againſt ſo powerful an argument, which has plainly ſhewn me the acatalepſia? Have I not reaſon to miſtruſt all things, ſince though I myſelf ſhut, ſealed, unſealed, and opened my pantry with my own hands, I do not find, in my pantry, the proviſions I had left in it? I find nothing but my ſeal, a circumſtance that will not let me think I am robbed. Here his friend could hold no longer. He laughed ſo loud and ſo long that the Philoſopher perceived his miſtake, and reſolved to take more care of his ſeal. However, his ſervants did not mind this; and whether they had learnt from the Stoics or other Philoſophers to diſpute againſt him, they unſealed his key, without minding to put his ſeal on it again; they would make uſe of another ſeal, and ſometimes of none at all. Lacydes would be in a paſſion when he found out their roguery; but they affirmed that they had not broke up any ſeals, and that he had forgot to uſe his ſeal. He then would hold forth in a long diſcourſe, to prove to them that he remembred perfectly well his having applied his ſeal, and would even ſwear it. They uſed to anſwer; you only joke, and mean to laugh at our ſimplicity. A Philoſopher, ſuch as you are, has neither opinion nor memory; for you yourſelf maintained the other day before us, that memory is an opinion. He would refute them by arguments different from thoſe of the Academics; but they addreſſed a Stoic, who taught them how to anſwer their maſter, and to elude all his proofs by the doctrine of incomprehenſibility, on which occaſion they would throw out a great many pleaſant jeſts. The worſt of it was, they continued to plunder the proviſions, and Lacydes ſaw his goods vaniſh away daily. He was ſtrangely puzzled: his principles inſtead of being favourable to him, were the very contrary; and he was obliged to behave like the vulgar. The whole neighbourhood ecchoed with his clamours and complaints; he proteſting by all the Gods and Goddeſſes that he was robbed. Πιστὸν εἰς ταμιήχανον, τὸν γείτονας ἐκεκράγει, καὶ τοὺς Θεούς. καὶ ἰοὺ ἰού, καὶ φεῦ φεῦ, καὶ νὴ τοὺς Θεούς, καὶ νὴ τὰς Θεάς, ἄλλας τε ὁσαι ἐν ἀπιστίᾳ ὀμνυόμεναι εἰσὶν ἀλλόκοτοι πίστεις, ταῦτα καὶ ἄλλα ἐλέγετο βοῶν καὶ ἀξιοπιστούμενος. *Inops conſilii vicinos inclamare, appellare Deos: ſæpe hei mihi, proh facinus indignum, per Deos Deaſque omnes ingeminare, ac cætera id genus argumenta, quæ homini gravioribus in querelis, ubi fidem non impetrat, ſine arte natura ſuppeditat. errors [G]. The difference which Father Rapin found between Arcesilas and Lacydes is mere chimera. Philosophy, says he (g), grew restless under the former, and contradicting under the latter: now it is certain that it never was more contradicting than under Arcesilas.

cellæ suæ foribus assidebat (19). What did he get by disputing with his servants? He employed the method of the Stoics against them, and they answered him according to the manner of the Academics; they beat him with his own weapons. The affair ended at last thus. Lacydes being determined to rid himself once for all from the intolerable perplexity he was under, he plainly and frankly told his servants, we dispute one way in the schools, and live in a different manner in our families. Οὐδὲν δὲ πρὸς ἐκεῖνον ὀφελῶν, ὑπεδύετο· εἰ τὸ σοφὸν αὐτῷ ἤρχεται, ἀπεκαλύψατο. Ἄλλως, ἔφη, ταῦτα, ὦ παῖδες, ἐν ταῖς διαλήψεσι λέγεται ἡμῖν, ἄλλως δὲ ζῶμεν. Verum ubi nihil agit, secum ipse cogitans, quo sua sibi versutia recideret: tandem animi sensum palam ac sine fuco aperiens, nimirum, inquit, famuli, aliter hæc in schola disputamus, aliter vivimus (20). This is a pretty tale, and Mr. de la Fontaine could work it up in a very jocose manner; but who does not perceive that it was forged by a pious fraud of the Stoics? This method is employed in all ages and countries. Men have always endeavoured, and they still endeavour, to ridicule the doctrine and person of their adversaries; and to effect this, they invent unnumbred fictions, if the least pretence can be found, to strain maliciously the consequences of their opinions. This passion or prejudice has been so blindly followed against the sceptics, that not only sincerity but even probability have been given up; for they never denied that, in the common conduct of life, men must govern themselves by the testimony of the senses. They only denied the certainty, that the absolute nature of objects is just as it appears. It is to be observed that Diogenes Laertius says no farther, than that our Lacydes, having sealed his pantry door, used to throw his key into it; and that his servants made use of that seal to steal provisions undiscovered by him.

(19) Idem, ibid. I approve of that translation more than that of Kuhnius, (who makes a friend watch on this occasion) in his notes on Diogenes Laertius, pag. 523. Semper amicum cellæ penuariæ custodem domi reliquit.

[G] Moreri has committed some very egregious errors.] I. Instead of saying that Lacydes's father was born in Cyrene, he should have said that Lacydes himself was born there. II. He ought not to have given into the error of Diogenes Laertius, with regard to his founding an Academy. III. He should not have fixed his death to the fourth year of the 36th Olympiad. This is not an error of the press; he adding, that it was the 113th of Rome. Had the Printers omitted something in the first calculation, they could not have mistook so exactly in the second. One may therefore be assured that they copied the manuscript exactly. Now what can be more absurd, than to imagine that Arcesilas lived in the 120th Olympiad, and that Lacydes his disciple died the last year of the 34th Olympiad (32)? IV. Though his death had been fixed to the fourth year of the 134th Olympiad, it nevertheless would have been an error; he not dying till about the second year of the 141st. This I prove as follows. Diogenes Laertius observes that Lacydes, who, began to be Principal or Head of the Academy, the 4th year of 134th Olympiad, died after he had taught Philosophy twenty six years. Ἐτελεύτησε δὲ σχολαρχῶν ἀρξάμενος τῷ τετάρτῳ ἔτει τῆς τετάρτης καὶ τριακοστῆς καὶ ἑκατοστῆς Ὀλυμπιάδος, τῆς σχολῆς ἀφηγησάμενος ἓξ καὶ εἴκοσιν ἔτη. Obiit autem cum scholam administrare cœpisset quarto anno centesimæ trigesimæ quartæ Olympiadis, viginti sex annis in schola consumptis (23). V. It is an absurdity to find in the above words, that Lacydes began to be in reputation... after he had taught twenty six years (24). VI. It would not be very just to say this of any Professor whatsoever; for if such a one should teach twenty five years without gaining any fame, he would run the hazard, generally speaking, to die without reputation.

(22) Moreri says so under Arcesilas.

(23) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 61.

(24) Moreri cites only Diogenes Laertius.

I am to observe that Father Hardouin is mistaken with regard to the time in which Lacydes the Philosopher died. Obiisse dicitur, says he (25), anno 4 Olymp. CXXX. He cites the 120th page of the London edition 1664, in folio, of Diogenes Laertius. But besides that we there find (26) the hundred and thirty fourth Olympiad, and not the hundred and thirtieth; it is certain that it relates to Lacydes's entrance into his Professorship, and not to his death. Father Labbe has committed but one of these two mistakes; he says (27), citing Diogenes, that the Philosopher Lacydes died the last year of the 134th Olympiad. Some one will perhaps ask me, if it can be proved that he did not die at that time? I answer that two proofs of it can be given. The 1st is, that he was not Head of the Academic School till after Arcesilas's death (28); and we know that Arcesilas was contemporary with Eumenes Prince of Pergamus (29), who did not succeed Philetærus till the 129th Olympiad. Father Labbe says so (30); for in order that this Philosopher should correspond with Eumenes, it was necessary that he should have lived till the 130th Olympiad. This being so, it cannot be said that his successor died the fourth year of the 134th Olympiad, for he taught twenty six years. My 2d proof is drawn from this, viz. that Attalus King of Pergamus caused to be made the garden of the Academy in which Lacydes taught, and that he sent for this Philosopher to his Court. It is hardly probable that these two particulars relate to the first year of his reign, that is, to the 3d year of the 134th Olympiad (31). Let us therefore say, that Lacydes did not die the year following; and let us remember, that if he had taught but a very few months in that garden, it would be absurd to suppose he had no other school but that, and even to observe, that it took its name from him. He therefore must have taught several years there; and consequently that he did not die a year after Attalus's accession to the throne. Seth Calvisius (32) has committed the same error as Father Labbe.

LACISIUS (PAUL) a Regular Canon of the Congregation of Lateran in the sixteenth Century, was born at Verona (a). He taught the Latin tongue in the Priory of St. Fridianus, when Peter Martyr was Prior there (b), and as he approved the opinions of the Protestants, he accompanied him into Germany, where they both declared themselves Protestants in the year 1541. They continued some time at Zurich, and then at Basil (c), and going thence to Strasburg, they were detained there by Martin Bucer, who procured a Chair of Divinity Professor for Peter Martyr, and the Professorship of the Greek Tongue to Paul Lacisius (d), who died at Strasburg I know not when (e). Læſtrygonia or the City of Lamus (b); it was becauſe Lamus King of the Læſtrygones and ſon of Neptune had built it (c). His dominions were pretty large (d). Antiphates, who reigned in that country when Ulyſſes landed there, was a very cruel man, who would have devoured all Ulyſſes's Deputies [B], had they not made their eſcape, after they had been witneſſes to the diſmal fate of one of their number (e). It is certain that the Læſtrygones have paſſed for men-eaters [C]. Moreri, inſtead of obſerving this, tells us that they uſed to eat raw fleſh. It is not known whether they paſſed from Sicily into Italy, or from Italy into Sicily; but that they had been ſettled in Sicily cannot be queſtioned; ſince the fields about the City of Leontium were called Campi Læſtrygonii [D]. Ovid ſuppoſes them to have been deſcended from Greek anceſtors (f). It is certain that Homer compares them with giants: but yet Bozius ought not to have inferred from thence, that according to the fables of the ancients, they waged war againſt the Gods; that Hercules fought againſt them, that they were deſtroyed by thunder-bolts, that for this reaſon the fields ſituated between Mount Veſuvius and Puteoli were called Phlegræi Campi, and that the flames of the Veſuvius come from thoſe which burn the Læſtrygones in hell. He pretends that Homer, Pindar, Polybius in his 2d book, and Strabo in his 5th book aſſert thoſe particulars (g); but he is miſtaken. The Læſtrygones did not till the ground, but they had cattle (h). Homer betrayed a great ignorance in Coſmography, when he ſuppoſed them ſituated in a climate, where the nights were very ſhort (i). It is not true that Thucydides imagined, the Læſtrygones were a fabulous Nation (k): he obſerves only, that it had been related, the moſt ancient inhabitants of Sicily were the Læſtrygones and the Cyclops, but that he has nothing to ſay of their origin, and that he does not know whence they came or what was become of them (l).

Hence it came, that this barbarous Læſtrygonian uſed to be mentioned as an inſtance of cruelty and want of hoſpitality. Quis non Antiphaten Læſtrygona devovet? Who does not curſe Antiphates the Læſtrygonian? ſays Ovid, in the ninth elegy of the ſecond book de Ponto. LÆVIUS, a Latin Poet. It is not well known when he lived, but he was, very probably, more ancient than Cicero. He had made a Poem intitled, Erotopægnia, that is to ſay, Love Games. Aulus Gellius (a) quotes two lines from it. Apuleius (b) quotes ſix

[A] I ſhall take notice of ſome miſtakes.] Since Voſſius (1) was acquainted with the two quotations, I have ſet down, it is very ſurprizing that he ſhould have placed Lævius amongſt thoſe poets, of whom we know only that they lived before Charles the Great. But this is a trifling miſtake, if compared with the blunder of an author (2), who corrects Lævius into Livius in Aulus Gellius, and pretends that this writer quoted Livius Andronicus. How could he quote from that Livius a paſſage in which a law is mentioned (3), which was made in the year 656 after the building of Rome; how I ſay, could Livius Andronicus be quoted for this, who was already a grown man in the year 514 after the building of Rome? For one of his plays was acted that year (4). The author whom I refute pretends that Nævius and Pacuvius flouriſhed after Livius Andronicus. But did he not obſerve a particular in Aulus Gellius, which proves that this Livius could not have the leaſt knowledge of the Licinian Law. For Aulus Gellius tells us (5), that Nævius had his plays acted in the year 519 of Rome, and that he bore arms in the firſt Punic war.

LAIS a famous curtezan was born at Hyccara a City of Sicily [A]. She was carried into Greece, when her native place had been plundered by Nicias General of the Athenians. She ſettled at Corinth, which was the moſt proper City in the world for women of her trade [B]; and ſhe gained ſuch a reputation there, that there was never a curtezan who enticed more people to her than ſhe did [C]. She had been informed in a kind of

[A] She was born at Hyccara a City of Sicily.] Plutarch acquaints us with this in the account he gives us of the taking of that City (1). The inhabitants of it were ſold, and Lais met with the ſame fate. She was carried into Peloponneſus; and was ſtill a virgin then (2). Some moderns aſſert that ſhe was ſold at Corinth (3); but they did not conſult Pauſanias nor his tranſlator, from whom they might have known that ſhe was firſt ſold at Hyccara; and then carried to Corinth. Pauſanias agrees in every particular with Plutarch. He aſſerts, like the latter, that ſhe was ſtill a young maiden (4). Solinus obſerves only that ſhe was born in Sicily (5), without telling us exactly in what City: but Athenæus, in his thirteenth book, page 588, quotes three authors (6), who aſſert expreſly, that ſhe was of Hyccara in Sicily. One of theſe three writers obſerves, that ſhe was a ſlave when ſhe went to Corinth. Ἀφ' ἧς αἰχμαλώτου γενομένη ἦκεν εἰς Κόρινθον. From which (City of Hecara) ſhe went to Corinth being a captive (7). This refutes the moderns whom I have mentioned. Stephanus Byzantinus (8) alſo aſſerts that ſhe was of Hyccara, and he quotes (9) Syneſius, who called her ὑκκαρικὸν ἀνδράποδον, The Hyccarian ſlave. But on the other hand he quotes (10) Neanthes, who wrote the lives of Illuſtrious Perſons, and who aſſerts that ſhe was born at Craſtus a City in Sicily. He quotes even Timæus as ſaying that ſhe was born at Eucarpia in the ſame Iſland. And yet we have ſeen juſt now, that Timæus, as quoted by Athenæus, makes her a native of Hyccara. And as there is not one author, that mentions a City in Sicily named Eucarpia, I think that Berkelius's (11) conjecture is very probable, namely that Stephanus Byzantinus made uſe of a copy of Timæus, in which the tranſcriber wrote εὐκαρπία inſtead of ὑκκαρα. Caſaubon obſerves (12) that Lais's native place, like that of Homer and of ſome other illuſtrious perſons, has not been exactly known; and he quotes Solinus, who ſays, Lais eligere patriam maluit quam fateri (13). i. e. "Lais "would rather chooſe a country for her own, than "declare which was her native ſoil." Caſaubon adds that ſome ſuppoſe ſhe was born at Pancarpia in Phrygia (14). But his memory deceived him here; he remembered in ſome meaſure to have read that ſome ſay ſhe was born at Eucarpia in Sicily, a place which Stephanus Byzantinus mentions in the article of Eucarpia in Phrygia: hereupon his notions mingled together in his head; he imagined he had read that Pancarpia in Phrygia was the native place of Lais, according to ſome writers. The Sieur Pinedo goes infinitely farther than Caſaubon, in his Parallel of Homer with this Courtezan; he pretends that ſeveral Cities claimed the glory of being Lais's native place. Celebres meretrices urbes etiam ſi Diis placet illuſtrant: de qua (Laïde) decertabant quædam civitates haud ſecus ac de Homero (15). i. e. "Even Curtezans, forſooth, illuſ- "trate their native places; ſeveral cities claimed the "glory of having produced Lais, as others did with "regard to Homer."

[B] Corinth .... was the moſt proper City in the world for women of her trade.] You ought not however to believe all that Lotichius relates of it. He aſſerts that the Corinthians in their ſolemn devotions prayed to the Gods to increaſe the number of the Curtezans (16): Whereupon he quotes Athenæus, who ſays nothing like it. But Lotichius was perhaps miſled by giving too much credit to the following words of Eraſmus. Tantus Corinthi honos habebatur meretricibus, ut quemadmodum ex autoribus docet Athenæus, illic in templo Veneris proſtarent, atque in ſolemnibus precibus illud addi ſoleat, ut Dii augerent meretricum numerum. Quin & illud refert meretrices facto ſacro Veneri, Civitatem extremo periculo laborantem ſervaſſe placata Venere (17). i. e. "Curtezans were ſo much honoured "at Corinth, that they ſtood to be hired in the Tem- "ple of Venus, and in the publick prayers it was "added, that the Gods would be pleaſed to encreaſe "the number of curtezans, as Athenæus relates from "other authors; he tells us alſo, that the curtezans, "having appeaſed Venus by a ſacrifice offered to her, "delivered the City of an imminent danger." Eraſmus exaggerates here: Athenæus ſays only, that there was an ancient Law at Corinth, by which it was enacted, that when the City ſhould make public ſupplications to Venus for ſome important affair, they ſhould gather together as many curtezans as could be found, that they might aſſiſt at the proceſſion, pray to that Goddeſs, and continue the laſt in her temple (18). The reſt of Eraſmus's account is very accurate; for it is certain that Athenæus relates, that it was thought the Curtezans of Corinth had very much contributed to the preſervation of Greece, by the prayers they offered up to Venus at the time of Xerxes's invaſion: He adds that the Citizens of Corinth uſed to promiſe a certain number of thoſe creatures to Venus, if ſhe granted them the favours they prayed for; and that Xenophon the Corinthian made ſuch a promiſe to her, in caſe he ſhould be conqueror at the Olympick Games. Having gained the victory, he performed his promiſe very punctually; he conſecrated twenty five maidens to the ſervice of Venus, and offered them to the Goddeſs during the Ceremony of the ſacrifice, which he made to her after his return from the Olympick Games. Theſe twenty five maidens began even the Hymn, which was ſung whilſt they were ſacrificing the victim. Concerning this whoredom of the Corinthians, ſee Eraſmus's proverbs (19), where he quotes a remarkable paſſage from Strabo (20)

This is ſufficient to prove the aſſertion in my text, and at the ſame time to ſhew that the heathens could not pretend, that the abominable actions which they aſcribed to their Gods, were only poetical ſtories: for we have here a moſt flouriſhing City, the very laws and worſhip of which ſhew it was believed there, that the Curtezans did a very acceptable ſervice to Venus by proſtituting themſelves, and that their interceſſion with her was greatly effectual to divert public misfortunes: which ſhews that they believed the ſtories that were reported concerning the adulteries of this Goddeſs.

[D] She dreamt once that Venus appeared to her to acquaint her with the arrival of ſome very rich cuſtomers.] It was Venus ſurnamed Melænis or the Black, who appeared to her. She had under that name a temple conſecrated to her in one of the ſuburbs of Corinth (26). The reaſon of that ſurname was thought to be this, namely that men generally ſpeaking apply themſelves to the multiplication of their ſpecies in the night time (27), and not in the day time like brutes (28). If this be the true reaſon of the ſurname of Melænis, one cannot ſee why Venus the Black ſhould appear in a dream to young Lais, who was not uſed to be ſo nice as to make any diſtinction between the day and the night with regard to the pleaſures of love. However it be, there was an Orator, who mentioned that dream in one of his pleas. Read only the following paſſage from Athenæus. Ἡ καὶ Ἀφροδίτη ἡ ἐν Κορίνθῳ ἡ Μελαινὶς καλουμένη, νυκτὸς ἐπιφαινομένη ἐμηνύσε ἑταιρῶν ἔφοδον πολυταλάντων· ἃ Ὑπερίδης μνημονεύει ἐν τῷ κατὰ Ἀριστογόραν δευτέρῳ (29). i. e. Aulus Gellius relates it as follows (31). *Lais Corinthia ob elegantiam venuſtatemque formæ grandem pecuniam demerebat: conventuſque ad eam ditiorum hominum ex omni Græcia celebres erant: neque admittebatur, niſi qui dabat, quod poposcerat. Ariſtippus was the moſt eaſy man in the world with regard to his miſtreſſes: he was not in the leaſt jealous of them; nor did he care whether or not they beſtowed upon others the ſame favours they granted him. This he declared to Diogenes, who had told him (3), you lie with a common whore; either forſake her, or be a Cynic like me. Do you think it is impertinent, anſwered Ariſtippus, *to lodge at a houſe, where there have been ſeveral other lodgers, or to embark on board a ſhip, which has carried ſeveral other paſſengers? Here follows a very diverting deſcription of the dreſs, in which theſe two Philoſophers uſed to ramble about Lais's houſe, if we may believe Taſſoni. Ma che bel vedere Diogene Cinico col Mantello di romagnuolo ſquarciato, e rappezzato, la barba ſqualida, ſenza camicia, e lordo, e pidocchioſo far dell' innamorato, paſſeggiando lungo la porta della famoſa Laide, e dall' altra parte comparire il ſuo rivale Ariſtippo, tutto profumato, e attilato, ſputando zibetto, e mirarlo di torto, e levargli il muro; e la Signora ſtarſi alla geloſia, pigliandoſi guſto di vederli paſſeggiare al ſereno (35). i. e. with this particular; Amiot did not well underſtand his words, for he ſuppoſes that Ariſtippus anſwered, I love neither wine nor fiſh, though I take ſome pleaſure in uſing them. Here follow the Greek words, which offer no ſuch thought. Ἀρίσιππος τῷ καλήγορεῦντι Λαΐδος πρὸς αὐτὸν ὡς οὐ φιλούσης, ἀποκρινάμενος ὅτι κὴ τὸ οἶνον οἴεται κὴ τὸ ἰχθὺν μὴ φιλεῖν αὐτὸν, ἀλλ' ἡδέως ἐκαλέρῳ χρῆται. i. e. "A perſon repreſenting to "Ariſtippus, that Lais did not love him, do you "think, anſwered he, that the wine or the fiſhes "love me? And yet I uſe both with pleaſure (26)." On another occaſion he made an anſwer, which has been mentioned by ſeveral authors, and which ſhews more evidently ſtill, that though he uſed to go often to Lais, yet he was by no means a ſlave to his paſſion. Cum eſſet objectum habere eum Laida, habeo, inquit, non habeor à Laide (37). i. e. "It being objected to "him, that he was in Lais's power; he anſwered I "keep Lais, but I am not kept by her." The anſwer is ſhorter ſtill in Athenæus (38), ἔχω κὴ οὐκ ἔχομαι. i. e. "I keep, but am not kept." This anſwer is mentioned by ſeveral authors; Diogenes Laertius does not omit it in his Life of Ariſtippus; and Lactantius relates it after the following manner. Ariſtippo Cyrenaicorum magiſtro cum Laide nobili ſcorto fuit conſuetudo, quod flagitium gravis ille philoſophiæ doctor ſic defendebat, ut diceret, multum inter ſe, & cæteros Laidis amatores intereſſe, quòd ipſe haberet Laidem, alii verò à Laide haberentur. In quo tamen ſapientior meretrix fuit, quæ philoſophum habuit pro lenone, ut ad ſe omnis juventus doctoris exemplo, & authoritate corrupta, ſine ullo pudore concurreret (39). i. e. "The founder "of the Cyreniac ſect converſed with Lais the "noted Curtezan, and that grave teacher of Philoſo"phy pretended to vindicate that wickedneſs by ob"ſerving, that there was a great difference between "him and the other lovers of Lais, for that Lais was "in his power, and they in her's. Oh! the noble "wiſdom, proper to be imitated by all good men! "You may give him your children to educate, that "they may learn to keep a whore. Wherein "however the Curtezan ſhewed the greateſt wiſdom, "who made a pimp of a Philoſopher, that the young "ſtudents ſhould not be aſhamed to go to her, being "encouraged thereto by the example of their teacher." This Father of the Church's reflection is not entirely well grounded; Lactantius, it ſeems, did not well underſtand the Philoſopher's thought. His meaning was this. "I go to Lais's houſe; I have a right to do "it; Ἔχειν γυναῖκα Græci dixerunt, ut Latini habere "mulierem, de eo qui ad eam pro ſuo jure cum vole"*bat, ventitabat . . . [H] Others maintain, that . . . . when ſhe was old ſhe proſtituted herſelf for a trifle.] Epicrates wrote ſome verſes, in which he abuſed her moſt cruelly. When ſhe was young, ſaid he (42), ſhe was ſo proud on account of her riches, that it was a more difficult matter to have acceſs to her, than to Pharnabazus. But now ſhe is old it is the eaſieſt thing in the world to have one's will of her. She goes and drinks in any place. She admits to her embraces both the old and the young indifferently. She is become ſo humble and meek, that ſhe even begs for the curteſy. Athæneus relates theſe lines of Epicrates, extracted from a work entitled Anti-Lais. Monſieur Baillet has omitted it in his collection of the books entitled Anti. It is impoſſible to reconcile together the authors who mention Lais. According to Epicrates, ſhe was almoſt inacceſſible when ſhe was young. Another author aſſerts that ſhe was ſurnamed Axine on account of her ſhyneſs, and becauſe ſhe extorted large ſums of money from her lovers. Ὅτι Λαὶς κὴ ἀξίνη ἐκαλεῖτο. ἤλεγχε δὲ αὐτῷ τὸ ἐπώνυμον τοῦτο τῆ ἤθους ἀγριότητα, κὴ ὅτι πολὺ ἐπραίτειτο, κὴ εἴ μᾶλλον παρὰ τῶν ξένων, ἅτε ἀπαλλαττομένων θᾶττον (43). i. e. "Lais was called Axine; which ſurname was "given her to ſignify her ſhy temper, and that ſhe "would get too much money, eſpecially from ſtrangers, "becauſe they were to go away very ſoon." She would demand too much, and gave no quarter in that reſpect. Neque admittebatur niſi qui dabat quod popoſcerat: poſcebat autem illa nimium quantum (44). She was particularly guilty of an exceſſive covetouſneſs with regard to ſtrangers; for as they were ſoon to go back, ſhe knew that they would not have time to bargain with her, and that if ſhe did not receive a large ſum at once from them, ſhe ſhould not meet with another opportunity to get again what ſhe might have bated of her price. See Ælian's Greek words quoted above (45). Athenæus repreſents her of a much eaſier temper. He aſſerts that ſhe made no difference between the poor and the rich, οὐ διακρίνασα πλούσιον ἢ πένητα (46). She took nothing from Diogenes. She acted probably like the charitable Phyſicians, who viſit their poor patients gratis; but ſhe made the rich pay the more for it, as ſeveral Phyſicians do, who accept no money from the poor.

[I] . . . Some pretend that ſhe was only a bawd in her old age.] There was no Deity among the Heathens, that was more faithfully ſerved than Venus; for the women who proſtituted themſelves, uſed to make their proſtitution laſt as long as they could; and when old age made them unfit for the trade, they did not however give over the ſervice, but ſet up for teachers of young maidens, and procured interviews and meetings between lovers. This is what Claudian reproaches Lais with.

E gemino ditata mari, dum ſerta refundit

"Thus the Corinthian Lais, grown rich by the "love of young men, and the ſpoils of two ſeas, "when old age came upon her, when the croud of "lovers forſook her, when ſhe was obliged to lie "alone all night, and there was ſeldom any knock"ing at her door, when ſhe was frightened at her own "face ſeen in the glaſs, yet ſhe would continue her "antient trade; ſhe turned a bawd, and though a "decrepit old woman, ſhe could not leave her beloved "ſtew. Her inclinations were ſtill the ſame, though "ſhe could not gratify them on account of her old "age."

This puts me in mind of thoſe invalids, who have ſometimes been mentioned in our News-Papers. As they are no longer able to bear arms, they are ſent on the ſea-coaſt, to exerciſe the militia there. Or, if you want another compariſon, conſider that mule, of which a Greek Hiſtorian ſpeaks (48). As ſhe had ſerved the Athenians a long time, ſhe was diſcharged from any labour, and was ſuffered to graze wherever ſhe would. But that ſhe might not be entirely uſeleſs, ſhe uſed to walk before the waggons, and encouraged in ſome manner the horſes or oxen that drew them: for which reaſon it was ordered that ſhe ſhould be notwithſtanding the pleaſure ſhe took in diſtinguiſhing herſelf by the great number of perſons who courted her favours, yet ſhe left Corinth, where ſhe had always a crowd of lovers, and went into Theſſaly to meet a young man with whom ſhe was paſſionately in love [K]. The women of that country entertained ſuch a jealouſy againſt this beautiful creature, that they got rid of her in a very cruel manner. They enticed her into the temple of Venus, and ſtoned her to death (c), or, according to others, they knocked her down with the chairs they happened to meet with there. It is not a general opinion amongſt authors, that ſhe died after that manner [L]. I have obſerved in another place (d), that Apelles taught her her trade; and it ſeems indeed, that he got her maidenhead, if we conſider only the authors I have quoted. nouriſhed all her life-time at the expence of the public.

I muſt not omit to obſerve a miſtake of the learned Barthius. He imagined (49) that Syneſius gives us the Hiſtory of Lais in the letter in which he mentions a Curtezan, who was the firſt miſtreſs of a maſter of a ſhip, then of a rhetorician, afterwards of a footman, then a public proſtitute, and laſtly a bawd. It is certain that Lais is not meant there, but the mother of a rhetorician, who was lately married to Syneſius's niece, which unequal match he very much diſliked. Here follows the whole paſſage. Πλὴν εἰ μή τι λέγουσιν ὅσοι κὴ τὸν νυμφίον ἡμῖν μητρόθεν ἀποσεμνύουσι γενεαλογοῦντες αὐτὸν ἀπὸ τῆς ἐν φήμῃ Λαΐδος. ἡ γὰρ Λαὶς ἔφη τις ἤδη λογογράφος, ἀνδράποδον, ἢν Ὑκκαρικὸν ὠὴ Σικελίας ἐωνημένον, ὅθεν ἡ καλλίπαις ἡ τεκοῦσα τὸν περιβόητον. κὴ αὐτὴ πάλαι μὲν ἐπαλλακεύετο ναυκλήρῳ δεσπότῃ. ἔπειτα μέν τοι ῥήτορι, κὴ τοῦτῳ δεσπότῃ. τρίτῳ μετ' ἐκείνους ὁμοδούλῳ κὴ λάθρᾳ τῇ πόλει. ἔπειτα λαμπρᾶς τῇ πολεῖ, κὴ φειδὼ τῆς τέχνης, ἧς ἐπειδὴ τὴν ἐργασίαν ὑπὸ χαλαρᾷ ῥυπῇ καθέλυσε, τὰς ἐν ἡλικίᾳ παιδοτρίβει, κὴ τοῖς ξένοις ἀνθικαθίστησιν. i. e. "Unleſs it be, that they ſay ſomething to the purpoſe, "who extoll this bridegroom on account of his mother's family, making him deſcend from the famous Lais. Who, as a certain Hiſtorian relates, "was a ſlave from Hyccara, bought in Sicily, whence "came alſo this mother of beautiful children, who "brought forth that celebrated man. And ſhe herſelf was "formerly kept by a maſter of a ſhip, who was a freeman, afterwards by a rhetorician, alſo a freeman, "and then by one of her fellow-ſervants; to whom "ſhe proſtituted herſelf in an unknown city, and afterwards became a public harlot, being the chief of her "trade. But when the wrinkles of her face made "her unfit for the ſervice, ſhe inſtructed young girls "in it, whom ſhe offered her cuſtomers inſtead of "herſelf." Here is a perſon of whom it may be well aſſerted that her laſt ſtate was worſe than the firſt; for her proſtitution was leſs pernicious than the trade of a bawd, which ſhe followed at laſt.

[K] She went into Theſſaly to meet a young man, with whom ſhe was paſſionately in love.] What we have juſt now obſerved concerning Lais's poverty and her trade of a bawd, does not agree with Plutarch's account of her; for he aſſerts that when this Curtezan left Corinth ſhe had a whole army of lovers there, and that the women of Theſſaly killed her only out of envy for her great beauty. Ἐκεῖ δὲ αὐτὴν αἱ γυναῖκες ὑπὸ φθόνου κὴ ζήλου διὰ τὸ κάλλος εἰς ἱερὸν Ἀφροδίτης προαγαγοῦσαι κατέλευσαν κὴ διέφθειραν (52). i. e. "The women there, out OF ENVY and jealouſy OF HER "BEAUTY, having conducted her into the Temple "Venus, ſtoned her there to death." The Theſſalian, with whom ſhe fell in love, was named Hippolochus, if we may believe Plutarch; but Athenæus calls him Pauſanias (53). They both agree that the Temple of Venus, in which ſhe was killed, had a ſurname which ſignified that crime. According to Plutarch, it was called the Temple of Venus the Manſlayer, Ἀφροδίτης ἀνδροφόνου, and according to Athenæus the Temple of Venus prophaned, ἀνοσίης Ἀφροδίτης. They built a tomb to Lais on the banks of the river Peneus with this epitaph.

i. e. "Proud Greece, invincible by her courage, has "been vanquiſhed by the heavenly beauty of this "Lais, whom Love begot, and Corinth educated; "here ſhe lies in the celebrated fields of Theſſaly."

By this particular Athenæus refutes thoſe, who aſſerted, that ſhe was buried in the ſuburb of Corinth called Clanion. It is true however that there was a monument erected to her in that ſuburb (55). But there might be one there and another at the ſame time in Theſſaly; for though the Corinthians were not poſſeſſed of her corps, yet they would, no doubt, raiſe a tomb to her, on which they cauſed a lioneſs to be engraved, whoſe forefeet reſted on a ram (56). See Alciat's Emblemata (57). According to Pauſanias, the lover, whom Lais went to meet in Theſſaly was named Hippoſtratus. Let us obſerve here that Geuſius's conjecture does not in the leaſt appear to be well grounded: he imagines that the women of Theſſaly, made Lais fall a ſacrifice to Venus, becauſe ſhe had rendered herſelf odious to that Goddeſs, by her ambition in pretending to be equal to her, or even to excell above her in beauty. He grounds his conjecture on their carrying her into the Temple of Venus, though they might very eaſily have killed her any where elſe. Veriſimile eſt, ſays he (38), *quod hæc Lais ab invidis & furioſis iſtis fœminis non ſimpliciter necata, ſed tanquam piacularis victima Deæ Veneri in ejus templo immolata fuerit; quia forma ſua & pulchritudine Veneris ipſius gloriam affectaſſe, imo obſcuraſſe, & ita indignationem & iram ejus in ſe excitaſſe videbatur. Nam quare ipſam non in alio loco, in foro, platea, vel ædibus occiderunt? For why did they not kill her in any other "place, in the market-place, for inſtance, in the ſtreet, "or in an houſe? Why did they kill her by throwing ſtones and benches at her in the very Temple of "Venus, if it were not to make Lais the rival of "Venus fall a ſacrifice in the preſence of Venus herſelf?"

Others pretend ſhe died in the venereal act. Οὐχὶ Λαὶς μὲν τελευτῶσ' ἀπέθανε βινομένη. i. e. "Lais was not yet dead, ſhe "died in the venereal act." This was a glorious death for a perſon who had conſecrated herſelf to the ſervice of the Goddeſs Venus; it was dying in the bed of honour, and when ſhe was giving ſignal proofs of her loyalty. It is as when a warrior is killed in battle. It has been ſaid, that an Emperor ought to die ſtanding. But according to the principles of the Heathens, a Curteſan ought to be in a quite different poſture to die glorioufly. Lais in her profeſſion did what Veſpaſian required from the Emperors.

[M] There are reaſons to queſtion this ſtory.] Let us remember that Lais was born the fourth year of the 89th Olympiad; and that Apelles being at ſea was by ſtreſs of weather forced to put into the harbour of Alexandria under the reign of Ptolomy the ſon of Lagus (61), and that the reign of that King could not begin before the 114th Olympiad. The moſt favourable that there have been two curtezans named Lais [N], is grounded on this obſervation, namely, that the applying all that is ſaid of Lais to one and the ſame woman, is inconſiſtent with Chronology. It is not at all probable that ſhe was Alcibiades's daughter (f), nor that ſhe wrote books [O]. There is a very pretty epigram in Auſonius concerning this vourable ſuppoſition, which the authors of that ſtory could make, would be to ſay, that Apelles was but twenty years of age, and Lais twenty five at the time they ſpeak of, and that he arrived at Alexandria the firſt year of Ptolomy's reign; whence it would follow that he was born the firſt year of the ninety firſt Olympiad. But according to this ſuppoſition, would he not have been near fourſcore and fifteen, when Ptolomy the ſon of Lagus begun his reign? And is it probable, that at ſuch an age, he had been able to undergo the fatigues of the ſea, and to perform what he is ſuppoſed to have done at the Court of Egypt? Would none of the authors who are extant, have mentioned his great age? Theſe difficulties cannot be removed, but by making Lais's virginity laſt longer; that is to ſay, by ſuppoſing that this painter being twenty years old, ſent for her to the entertainment, when ſhe was already forty or at leaſt thirty five years old. Now theſe ſuppoſitions are not in the leaſt probable, and are inconſiſtent with the accounts we meet with in the ancient authors. It would be much more reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that Apelles was twice as old as Lais; it is infinitely probable that this Lady begun her wicked trade very ſoon, and therefore that it was not Apelles who debauched her firſt. Obſerve that the fountain of Pyrene, whence it is ſuppoſed ſhe was returning when her beauty ſtruck him, was at Corinth. Wherefore if this ſtory were true, it would follow from thence, that he continued ſome time in that city, and I do not believe that any author ever aſſerted it poſitively.

[N] It is conjectured that there have been two courtezans named Lais.] She, who is the ſubject of this article was carried to Corinth, when Nicias commanded the army of the Athenians in Sicily; that is to ſay, the ſecond year of the 91ſt Olympiad. She was then ſeven years old, if we may believe the Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes (62). Now ſince Demoſthenes did not dare to go to Corinth but ſecretly, in order to enjoy Lais, it follows that he was not a young ſcholar then, but a man who had already gained a great reputation. We ought therefore to ſuppoſe that he was at leaſt thirty; ſo that Lais would have been then threeſcore and ſeven years old (63). There is not therefore the leaſt probability, that Demoſthenes would have cared to ſee her, nor that ſhe would have aſked him a large ſum of money. It was therefore another Lais who aſked the Orator that ſum; whence it follows that there have been two courtezans named Lais. The difficulty will be very great ſtill, though it were ſuppoſed, that Demoſthenes took a journey to Corinth at the age of about twenty years; for our Lais would have been then about threeſcore. I find that ſeveral authors ground their opinion, that there have been two Lais's, on a paſſage in Athenæus, where it is aſſerted that Alcibiades always had two concubines with him, namely, Damaſandra the mother of Lais the younger (64), and Theodota who took care of his funeral when he had been killed in a town of Phrygia. There is ſome ſtrength in that paſſage of Athenæus, for it ſuppoſes that there had been one Lais before her who was Damaſandra's daughter. But it is ſtill liable to a great many difficulties. In the 1ſt place, Athenæus, who relates ſo many particulars concerning Lais, does never make the leaſt diſtinction; he goes on throughout his whole diſcourſe, as though there had never been but one Lais? Does an author expreſs himſelf after ſuch a manner, when he is perſuaded that there have been two perſons of that name, and when he would acquaint his readers with it? II. Plutarch, ſpeaking of Lais the daughter of Alcibiades's concubine, aſſerts poſitively, that ſhe was born at Hyccara in Sicily, and that ſhe was carried from thence a ſlave. Ταύ̃ης λέγεσι θυγατέρα γενέσθαι Λαΐδα, τὴν Κορινθίαν μὲν προσαγορευθεῖσαν, ἐκ δὲ Ὑκκάρων Σικελικῆ̃ πολίσματος αἰχμάλωτον γενομένην (65). i. e. "They ſay, that her "daughter was Lais, who was called the Corinthian, "though ſhe was born at Hyccara a town in Sicily, "whence ſhe was carried away a ſlave." So that according to Plutarch, the ſame Lais, whom Athenæus calls the younger, is ſhe who was born in Sicily before the 91ſt Olympiad; ſo that if the courtezan who demanded a large ſum of money from Demoſthenes differ from this, it will follow from thence, that there have been three Lais's; for ſhe, who would be the firſt according to Athenæus, would be anterior to the Sicilian, who was ſold at Hyccara the ſecond year of the 91ſt Olympiad, and would have been leſs capable ſtill than the ſecond of Athenæus, to have received a viſit from Demoſthenes. In the 3d place, the large ſum of money demanded from that Orator, does evidently ſuppoſe that the courtezan who aſked it, was ſtill very young. A woman does not put ſo high a price upon her favours, when ſhe is paſt thirty five. Now as it is very probable that Alcibiades's concubine had been already delivered of Lais, when that General died in the 1ſt year of the 94th Olympiad, it would follow from thence, that Lais was at leaſt twenty five years older than Demoſthenes. If therefore that Orator at the age of thirty had taken a journey to Corinth with a deſign to enjoy Lais, he would have loved a woman of fifty, who aſked about four thouſand livres for one night's lodging with her. Λαΐδος μυρίας δραχμὰς πέλαντον poposcit, hoc facit nummi noſtratis denarium decem millia (66). For my part, inſtead of ſuppoſing two Lais's, I ſhould rather think that the authors, who were very inaccurate with regard to Chronology (67), applied to a courtezan of that name a ſtory of Demoſthenes, which related to another Lady of pleaſure. Obſerve that Athenæus aſſerts in another place, that Alcibiades being General of the Army had two concubines with him, Timandra the mother of Lais the Corinthian, and Theodota the Athenian (68). This is hinting plainly enough that Timandra was then already mother of Lais; and it is certain, that the ſame Lais, who was born in Sicily, has been ſurnamed the Corinthian. Plutarch aſſerts it poſitively (69). Obſerve alſo that Athenæus calls the mother of Lais ſometimes Damaſandra, and ſometimes Timandra, and that he aſcribes to Theodota the care of Alcibiades's funerals. But Plutarch aſſerts, both that Timandra was Lais's mother, and that ſhe buried Alcibiades (70).

[O] It is not at all probable . . . that ſhe wrote books.] Pliny (71) relates two particulars, which he had read in the works of a woman named Lais. He quotes her the firſt time with Elephantis, and the ſecond with Salpe, and ſoon after he mentions a midwife called Sotira. It is well known that Elephantis had compoſed ſome books which abounded with obſcenities. See the remark [P] of the article HELENA, and Suetonius, in the forty third chapter of the life of Tiberius, and the forty third Epigram of the twelfth book of Martial. Galen aſſerts (72) that Elephantis wrote a treatiſe of Coſmeticks. I have explained the ſenſe of that word in another place (73). Salpe was of the Iſle of Leſbos (74), and had compoſed a work of Jeſts, of jokes and pleaſantry, but it is not probable that Pliny quoted her with regard to this work. Lais & Salpe, ſays he (75), canum rabioſorum morſus, & tertianas quartanaſque febres, menſtruo in lana arietis nigri, argenteo bracchiali incluſo. i. e. according to du Pinet's French tranſlation; Lais and Salpe, both of them famous Curtezans, aſſert that if the menſtrual blood be wrapped up in the wool of a black Ram, and put in a ſilver bracelet, it ſerves to cure the bite of a mad dog, as alſo the tertian and quartan ague. i. e. hinting very plainly, that both theſe women wrote books of preſcriptions. Father Hardouin aſſerts that Salpe wrote de remediis muliebribus (76), of remedies proper for women. The ſecond paſſage in Pliny, where Lais and Elephantis are mentioned together, hints the ſame thing. Quæ Lais & Elephantis inter ſe contraria prodidere de abortivis, carbone e radice braſſicæ, vel myrti, vel tamaricis in eo ſanguine exſtincto: item aſinas non concipere tot annis, quot grana hordei contacta ederint, quæque alia nuncupavere monſtrifica, aut inter ipſas pugnantia, cum hæc fecunditatem fieri iiſdem modis, quibus illa ſterilitatem, prænunciaret, melius eſt non credere (77).

this courtezan's looking-glaſs [P]. I forgot to obſerve that ſhe was ſo paſſionately in love with Eubates, that ſhe obliged him to promiſe her marriage [Q], but he found means to evade his promiſe. Notwithſtanding her great beauty, it was impoſſible for her to conquer

That is to ſay, according to du Pinet's tranſlation; As for what the Courtezan Lais (*) and the Poeteſs § Elephantis aſſert, of the menſtrual blood, that it is proper to make the fœtus melt away in the mother's womb, and of a coal of the root of a Cabbage, or of a Myrtle tree, or of a Tamarisk extinguiſhed in the ſame blood, we ought not to believe it, for they abſolutely contradict each other. We ſay the ſame of what they obſerve farther, namely, that a ſhe-aſs will continue as many years without conceiving, as ſhe has eat grains of oats tainted with menſtrual blood. Nay theſe two Courtezans relate monſtrous things upon this ſubject, which ought by no means to be believed; for what the one preſcribes as proper to get children, the other preſcribes as proper to prevent conception. This tranſlator (Du Pinet) has took upon him to determine a particular, which Pliny does not mention. He aſſerts boldly that the Courtezan Lais is hinted at here, and he means undoubtedly the ſame, who is the ſubject of this article. If he had determined it only in a marginal note, it would not have been ſo great a raſhneſs; but he aſſerts it as though it were a true tranſlation of his original: Which is an inexcuſable boldneſs. Father Hardouin has been infinitely more modeſt. He confeſſes, that he does not know whether Pliny quoted one of the two Courtezans, who were called Lais, and he ſtiles her, whom Pliny quoted, a Midwife, Obſtetrix (78). If I did not meet in Pliny's words with preſcriptions for tertian and quartan agues; if they contained only remedies againſt barrenneſs, and preſcriptions for miſcarriages, I could eaſier believe, that he quoted a work written by our Lais, or aſcribed to ſome famous Courtezan: for few perſons are better acquainted with the means to facilitate or prevent conception, and to make a fœtus vaniſh away, than women of Lais's trade; a trade which includes the wicked art of being ſerviceable to thoſe, who dread a publick diſgrace; in a word, a trade which ends in this art, to which alone it is at laſt reduced, when age does not ſuffer a woman to perform any longer the other functions of it. But upon the whole, I do not think it probable that our Lais wrote books. I would not however deny, that thoſe which Pliny quotes, and which he oppoſes to thoſe of another wicked woman, named Elephantis, have been aſcribed to our Lais. I queſtion, whether an honeſt matron, well ſkilled in the uſe of ſecrets, and a midwife by trade, would have been pleaſed with being named together with Lais: For that name as well as thoſe of Chryſis, and Thais, and ſuch others, was uſed to be particularly applied to bad characters in the works of the poets. And it was, no doubt, this cuſtom which was followed in a book printed in France towards the beginning of the ſixteenth Century with this title; Dialogue de l'Aretin, où ſont deduites les Vies, Moeurs et déportemens de Lais & Lamia Courtiſanes de Rome. i. e. "A Dialogue of Aretini, containing an "account of the lives, manners and behaviour of Lais "and Lamia, Courtezans of Rome." Ariſtænetus gives his ſweetheart the name of Lais (79), underſtanding by that name, not only his miſtreſs, a girl, he loved (80), but alſo a girl, who loved him, and granted him all favours without exception; for he obſerves that her bones were almoſt flexible, and ſo ſoft that the impreſſion of his embraces remained upon them almoſt as upon the fleſh that covered him. Οὕτω μέν τοι σύμμετρα καὶ τρυφερὰ τῆς Λαΐδος τὰ μέλη, ὡς ὑγροφυῶς αὐτῆς λογίζεσθαι τὰ ὀστᾶ τῷ περιλυπουμένῳ δικεῖν τοιγαρῶν ταῦτα μικρῆ γε ὁμοίως ἀϊ ἀπαλότητα συναπομαλάττεται τῇ σαρκὶ, καὶ ταῖς ἐρωτικαῖς ἀϊσκάλαις ὑπείκει. Lais's members are ſo ſoft and delicate, that if you preſs them a little cloſe, her very bones ſeem to be tender and flexible. For by their tenderneſs they receive impreſſions almoſt like the fleſh, and yield to the lover's embraces (81).

[P] There is an Epigram in Auſonius concerning this Courtezan's looking glaſs.] Auſonius only tranſlated an epigram of Plato, which is in the anthologia; but he ſucceeded very well in his tranſlation.

Laïs anus Veneri ſpeculum dico: dignum habeat ſe
Æterna æternum forma miniſterium,
At mihi nullus in hoc uſus, quia cernere talem
Qualis ſum nolo; qualis eram nequeo (82).

i. e. "I Lais, being now an old woman, conſecrate "my looking-glaſs to Venus. Let her, whoſe beauty "is everlaſting, uſe it for ever, it is worthy of her: "I have no longer any occaſion for it; ſince I do not "care to ſee myſelf in it as I am now, and I cannot ſee my ſelf as I was formerly."

This ſuppoſes that Lais outlived her beauty, ſo that her looking glaſs became an uſeleſs and even diſagreable furniture to her. This agrees with the authors I have mentioned in the remarks [H] and [I], but not with Plutarch. See the remark [K].

You will meet, in the commentaries on Alciat's emblems, with ſome Latin verſes, in which Lais's mournful complaints are very prettily deſcribed. They were grounded on two reaſons; the firſt was, that ſhe found herſelf quite ugly, when ſhe looked in her glaſs; the ſecond, that ſhe ſtill felt the fire of luſt burn within her breaſt. She complained that ſhe had all the warm deſires of youth in a body almoſt decrepit. This was a ſad thing indeed.

Et tamen idem animus ſtimulos ſub pectore eoſdem

The truth of the matter, is, that an old Courtezan of Venice was repreſented under Lais's name. Accepi pridem a Viris Italici ſoli, id ſcriptum fuiſſe in quandam meretricem Venetam, quæ ætatis lapſo ſeu decuſſo flore, quoties ſe in ſpeculo conſpiceret, fronte jam rugis obſita, miſere contabeſcebat, et nihilo ſegnius ardore tentiginis premebatur (84). i. e. This hint is borrowed from Horace.

]Q] She was ſo paſſionately in love with Eubates, that ſhe obliged him to promiſe her marriage.) Her paſſion muſt have been exceedingly ſtrong, ſince ſhe would ſubmit to the laws of wedlock (86), under which ſhe would not have been at liberty to continue her trade. She communicated to Eubates the deſign ſhe had to marry him: he ſeemed to conſent to it; for he was afraid ſhe would ſerve him ſome ill turn; but he did not lie with her: he put that affair off, till the games were over, in which he was to contend for the prize. He gained it; and never thought of performing his promiſe of marriage. He returned to Cyrene, his native place, taking only Lais's picture with him. He imagined that by doing this he acquitted himſelf of his promiſe. The wife he had at Cyrene thought herſelf under quer the Philoſopher Xenocrates's continency [R]. She defended herſelf once very artfully againſt Euripides, who reproved her juſtly [S]. Tatian has cenſured the heathens for the monument which they erected to this diſſolute woman (g). He mentions Turnus the Sculptor who had made it, whence we may infer that he was a famous maſter in his art; and yet neither Pliny nor any other writer mention him in the leaſt. I ſhall take notice in one ſingle remark of Moreri's error, and of thoſe that occur in ſome other Dictionaries [T]. There never was a more extravagant boldneſs than that of Anthony de under an obligation to reward ſo noble an inſtance of continence; wherefore ſhe cauſed a beautiful ſtatue to be erected to her huſband. I am apt to think, that Ælian, who relates this ſtory (87), ſpoiled and enervated it entirely. Clemens Alexandrinus tells it in fewer Words (88), but he calls Ariſtotle the perſon, whom Ælian names Eubates, and he quotes the Book of Iſter περὶ ἰδιότητος ἠθῶν. Concerning the nature of exerciſes. He does not agree with Ælian in every particular.

[R] It was impoſſible for her to conquer the Philoſopher Xenocrates's continency.] She had laid a wager that ſhe would oblige this Philoſopher to divert himſelf with her at the ſport of love. She feigned to be frightened, and with this pretence ſhe took ſanctuary in his houſe, and continued there all night, but he did not touch her. When ſhe was called upon to pay the wager, ſhe anſwered that ſhe did not pretend to lay a wager about a mere block, but about a man. Thus an ancient interpreter of Horace (89) relates this fact. Diogenes Laertius aſcribes this to the Courtezan Phryne, and does not mention the wager. He tells us (90) that ſhe took ſhelter in Xenocrates's houſe, pretending ſhe was purſued, and as there was but one bed in the houſe, ſhe deſired the Philoſopher to let her have half of his, to which he conſented. Afterwards ſhe propoſed ſome other queſtions to him, but to no purpoſe. So that when ſhe was aſked, how things went between them, ſhe anſwered, that ſhe had lain with a block and not with a man. Some aſſerted that Xenocrates's Diſciples put Lais once into his bed, and that he was ſo fully determined to keep his continency, that he ſuffered ſeveral times his privities to be cut and even burnt. Ἔνιοι δὲ Λαΐδα φασὶ παραχαλκῆναι αὐτῷ τὰς μαθήτας, τὴν δὲ ὕστως εἶναι ἐγκρατῆ, ὥστε καὶ τομὰς καὶ καύσεις πολλάκις ὑπομεῖναι περὶ τὸ αἰδοῖον. The Latin tranſlation is as follows, Quidam vero diſcipulos Laidem illi injeciſſe in lectulum tradunt, illumque adeò fuiſſe continentem, ut cùm ſe ad libidinem incitari præſenſiſſet, & ſecare & urere verenda ſæpè pateretur (91). We have reaſons to complain here both of the Greek Author, and of his tranſlator. The latter adds of his own accord, that Xenocrates perceived the rebellion of luſt was coming upon him (92); and as for Diogenes Laertius, he does not tell us what became of Lais; he puts her into the Philoſopher's bed, without relating what ſhe did there, nor how ſhe got out of it again, and inſtead of compleating his account of this particular ſtory, he falls upon diſcourſing on a general fact, namely the means which Xenocrates had ſeveral times made uſe of to be proof againſt love.

[S] She defended herſelf once very artfully againſt Euripides, who reproved her juſtly.] Euripides with a pen in his hand was ready to compoſe ſomething in a garden. Lais obſerving him in that ſituation went to him, and aſked him; Τί βουλόμενος ἔγραψας σὺ τραγῳδίᾳ Ἔρρ' αἰσχροποιὲ (93); i. e. "What do you "mean by theſe words in your tragedy; Go and be "hanged, you that commit obſcene actions?" what he meant by certain expreſſions which he made uſe of in one of his tragedies (94), to repreſent in the general a man committing obſcene actions. He was amazed at ſuch an impudent queſtion, and anſwered to Lais, you are yourſelf one of thoſe I hinted at. Σὺ γὰρ εἶναι τὶς ἔφη δοκεῖς Αἰσχροποιός. (95). i. e. "You, ſays he, ſeem to be one of thoſe who commit obſcene ac"tions." She fell a laughing, and quoted a line to him (96), in which he aſſerted, that no action was obſcene, unleſs the perſon that committed it thought it obſcene: Τί δ' αἰσχρὸν εἰ μὴ τοῖσι χρωμένοις δοκεῖ; "Is "there any thing obſcene, but what ſeems ſo to thoſe "who commit it (97)? We are not told whether Euripides was ſilenced by this argument ad hominem, or whether he made any reply; but it is certain that Lais could not get off more wittily, and more artfully puzzle her cenſurer. This maxim would extend the Philoſophical ſin as far as is poſſible, and would be of the moſt dangerous conſequence. Wherefore the Philoſopher Antiſthenes (98) corrected it after this manner, Αἰσχρὸν τόγ' αἰσχρὸν κἂν δοκῇ κἂν μὴ δοκῇ. i. e. "What "is obſcene, is ſo whether or not it ſeem obſcene to "the perſon who commits it." Stobœus aſcribes this correction to Diogenes the Cynick (99), and not to Antiſthenes as Plutarch does (100).

There are reaſons to queſtion the truth of this converſation; for ſince Euripides died in the 93d Olympiad (101), when Lais could be but about fifteen or ſixteen years old, it is not in the leaſt probable that this Poet diſcourſed with this courtezan either upon that ſubject or upon any other. The Reader will be the better convinced of this, if he conſider that Euripides paſſed the latter part of his life at the court of Archelaus, whither it is not obſerved by any Author that Lais ever went. Though it be never ſo much ſuppoſed, that there have been two Courtezans of that name, this will not remove the difficulty. For the firſt muſt be ſhe, who was ſold when Hyccara was plundered by Nicias. But, according to the Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes, ſhe was then but ſeven years old. From this Chronological account that Scholiaſt urges a very good objection from the mention, that is made of Lais in Ariſtophanes's Plutus, a Play that was acted at a time when Lais could not yet be famous. Docte et acutè dubium movet, aitque Ariſtophanem dicere ea, quæ rationi temporum nequeunt convenire; quippe cum eo tempore quo Plutum fabulam dabat, non potuerit Lais eſſe valde celebris, quippe quæ a Nicia imperatore capta fit in Sicilia ſeptennis (102). i. e. "He does with "learning and judgment ſtart a difficulty, obſerving "that what Ariſtophanes ſays is inconſiſtent with Chro"nology. For Lais could not yet be very famous, "when his Plutus was acted, ſince ſhe was but ſeven "years old, when ſhe was taken in Sicily by the ge"neral Nicias." The objection vaniſhes away, if it be ſuppoſed, that we muſt read Nais inſtead of Lais in that Poet's Plutus. You will meet with that correction in Athenæus (103). It is certain that there has been a Courtezan named Nais, and ſeveral Authors have probably miſtook her for Lais. It was perhaps with Nais, that Euripides had the converſation we have mentioned.

[T] I ſhall take notice in one ſingle remark of Moreri's errors, and of thoſe of . . . . ſome other Dictionaries.] Moreri's firſt blunder is his aſſerting that Lais lived in the year 420 ſince the building of Rome. According to this ſuppoſition ſhe muſt have lived towards the end of the 111th Olympiad. Judge whether this can be ſaid of a perſon, who was carried from Sicily to Corinth the ſecond year of the 91ſt Olympiad. We cannot have recourſe here to the ſuppoſition of two Lais's; ſince Moreri mentions but one, and obſerves alſo expreſsly, that he means Lais born in a little Town in Sicily, called Hyccara. This Lais is evidently the ſame who was ſeven years old when Hyccara, her native place, was taken, the ſecond year of the 91ſt Olympiad. Secondly, it is not true that Plutarch aſſerts, ſhe was thought to be the daughter of Alcibiades. Moreri could not clear himſelf by charging Amiot with this falſity, for it is plain that in this phraſe, l'on dit que Lais . . . . etoit ſa fille (104), i. e. "it is ſaid, "that Lais . . . . was her daughter," the word Sa (her) relates to Timandra, Alcibiades's concubine, and not to Alcibiades. The Greek words (105) leave not the leaſt room for an equivocation. How could Alcibiades be Lais's father, ſince he did not go into Sicily but with Nicias? Was not Lais then already ſix or ſeven years old. Thirdly; it is not true that Lais went to Alexander's Camp. She had been dead a long while before Alexander was born. This blunder was occaſioned by Amiot: for as he did not underſtand a paſſage in Plutarch (106), in which there are ſome words wanting, he took it into his Head to tranſlate

Charles Stephens is miſtaken, when he aſſerts, that Lais went from Sicily to Corinth, that ſhe might get more money by proſtituting herſelf. She was not ſeven years old when ſhe went to Corinth; nor did ſhe go thither of her own accord: ſhe had been bought at Hyccara by a man, who took her with him into Greece as a ſlave. Neither Lloyd nor Hofman have corrected this blunder. I can hardly believe that Charles Stephens borrowed from credible Authors what he relates; I. that Lais being gone into Theſſaly was ſo much beloved there by the young men of that country, that they uſed to pour wine before her door. II. That the Theſſalian women out of envy ſtabbed her, whilſt a divine Service was performing in the Temple of Venus, at which the men were not ſuffered to be preſent. III. That for this action the country of Theſſaly was viſited with the Plague, which did not diſcontinue, till they had built a Temple to Venus ἀλλοσίᾳ (107). Lloyd and Hofman have tranſcribed theſe three blunders.

[U] Anthony de Guevara ... has related a thouſand ridiculous falſities concerning Lais]. I ſhall not loſe my time in refuting them; and ſhall even tranſcribe but a few of them. He aſſerts (108) that ſhe was of the Iſle of Bithrite, in the Confines of Greece, and, according to what the Chroniclers wrote of her, ſhe was the daughter of an High-Prieſt of Apollo's Temple, who lived at Delphos, a man highly ſkilled in the magical art, by which knowledge he foretold the ruin of his daughter. Now this laſcivious Lais was in her prime under the reign of the celebrated King Pyrrhus ... who being a young man of ſixteen or ſeventeen, went into Italy, to wage war againſt the Romans ... This laſcivious Lais continued a long while in King Pyrrhus's Camp, ſhe went with him into Italy, and returned with him from the war .... She retired into the City of Corinth, with a deſign to ſettle there, and was there waited upon and courted by ſeveral Kings, Lords and Princes. He relates afterwards the ſtory of Demoſthenes, and finiſhes his account with obſerving, that Lais died at Corinth at the age of three ſcore and twelve. How can a man be ſo bold as to publiſh ſo many falſities? There was above an hundred and thirty years between the birth of Lais, and Pyrrhus's expedition againſt the Romans, and above forty between the death of Demoſthenes and that ſame expedition. And yet ſuch an Impoſtor has miſled ſome men of wit: for it is from him Brantome relates a great many fabulous ſtories concerning Flora (109): not to mention Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who aſſerts, that Lais continued a long time in Pyrrhus's Camp in Italy (110). He had read this in Guevara, and he took it for current money.

[X] The ſtory of Myron the ſtatuary.] It is one of the ridiculous ſtories of a gray-haired lover. Myron, a man venerable by his hoarineſs, went to Lais, and aſked to lie one night with her. He was ſent back without hardly any hearing. He imagined he gueſſed at the true cauſe of his being thus ſlighted. He flattered himſelf, that if he did but preſent himſelf with brown hairs, he would certainly enjoy his love. He altered therefore the colour of his head, and returned to Lais; you fool, ſaid ſhe to him, you aſk me a favour, which I have already refuſed to your father. Auſonius relates this very prettily (111).

(111) Auſon. Epigram. 17. pag. m. 17.

Canus rogabat Laïdis noctem Myron:
Tulit repulſam protinus.
Cauſamque ſenſit: & caput fuligine

Idemque vultu, crine non idem Myron,
Orabat oratum prius.
Sed illa formam cum capillo comparans,

Coſtar has made a collection of witty ſayings, which are aſcribed to different perſons, and has put this anſwer of Lais amongſt them. "Spartian, ſays he (112) "relates, that an old man, whoſe hair was quite grey, "to whom the Emperor Hadrian had refuſed ſome fa- "vour, went ſome days after to aſk it again, having "painted his hair with the fineſt black he could meet "with. The Prince diſcovering the artifice, anſwered "him wittily, The favour you aſk me, I have al- "ready denied your father. Yet according to Auſo- "nius, it was the Courtezan Lais that made ſo inge- "nious an anſwer, though it be not mentioned by Athe- "næus, who took ſo much care to tranſmit to us all "the witty ſayings of this beautiful Lady." If the conjecture of ſome moderns be well grounded, we ought not to wonder at Athenæus's ſilence with regard to this witty ſtroke of Lais. For they pretend that Auſonius invented it (113). I mean that having read the Emperor Hadrian's anſwer, he feigned that Lais made it, and turned it into an epigram. I am apt to think, that this anſwer comes from a woman rather than from the Emperor Hadrian; for one cannot eaſily imagine plauſible reaſons why an old man after a refuſal, ſhould take it into his head, that if he appeared as a man without grey hairs, he would obtain from that Prince the favour he deſired. But one can eaſily underſtand why he ſhould entertain ſuch hopes, if he had made his addreſſes to a Lady. It may therefore, in my opinion, be ſaid that the writers of Hadrian's life, men of an indifferent taſte, and very inaccurate, miſtook for his own jeſts thoſe which he only related. He had read ſomewhere what Lais is ſuppoſed to have anſwered to Myron; or perhaps he had read, that this anſwer was made to ſome other old lover by ſome other Courtezan; he told the ſtory to his friends, which being told over and over again, loſt its moſt material circumſtances; ſo that at laſt Hadrian paſſed himſelf for the inventor. Joca ejus plurima extant. Nam fuit etiam dicaculus. Unde illud quoque innotuit, quod quum cuidam caneſcenti quiddam negaſſet, eidem iterum petenti, ſed infecto capite, reſpondit, Jam hoc patri tuo negavi (114). i. e. I muſt not cloſe this remark without obſerving that Monſieur Coſtar does too much commend that witty ſaying of Lais. I confeſs that this anſwer does not want ſprightlineſs, and that it was very proper to mortify the lover, and to afford the Courtezan the pleaſure of ridiculing the good old man. But after all ſhe argued very wrong, and againſt the rules of her own trade. I have refuſed the ſon, how much more ought I to refuſe the father? This is the principle of a Courtezan, this the ground of all her arguments; but ſhe on the contrary ſuppoſes, that becauſe ſhe denies the father, a decrepit old man, ſhe ought alſo to deny the ſon a ſtrong and vigorous young fellow. This is renouncing her own principle, and acting againſt the fundamental rules of her trade.

Let us obſerve that Myron muſt not have been young, when Lais was in her prime. He flouriſhed in the 87th Olympiad (115) ſeven or eight years before ſhe was born.

LAMBECIUS (PETER) one of the moſt learned men of his time was born at Hamburg in the year 1628. He went very young to ſtudy in foreign countries, at the expence of his uncle the learned Luc Holſtenius. He made ſuch a conſiderable progreſs, that at the age of nineteen he publiſhed a work (a), which was extremely applauded. He continued eight months at Toulouſe at the houſe of the Archbiſhop Charles de Monchal, Monchal, and two years at Rome at Cardinal Barberini's. He was choſen Profeſſor of Hiſtory at Hamburg January the 13th 1652, and appointed Rector or Principal of the College of that ſame City January the 12th 1660. He had taken his degree of Doctor of Law in France ſome years before. He ſuffered a thouſand vexations in his own country, both becauſe the ſcholars would not obey him, and becauſe his enemies charged him with heterodoxy, and even atheiſm, and cenſured bitterly his labours and writings. An unhappy marriage, which he contracted [A] in the year 1662, compleated his misfortunes; ſo that he willingly hearkened to the hints which the Queen of Sweden gave him, who adviſed him to retire to another place. He left therefore his wife and his native place, and took a journey to Vienna, and having had the honour to pay his reſpects to his Imperial Majeſty he went to Rome, and publickly profeſſed there the Roman Catholic Religion: it was long before this he had abjured Lutheraniſm [B]; but he had continued nevertheleſs to profeſs it outwardly. He returned to Vienna towards the end of the year 1662, and was very kindly received by the Emperor, who appointed him immediately his Sub-Library-Keeper, and afterwards his Library-Keeper in Chief, with the title of his Counſellor and Hiſtoriographer. *D. 27 Novemb. 1662, Præfectura Biblioth. [A] An unhappy marriage which he contracted.] One may ſay of ſeveral learned men, that they behave themſelves with regard to matrimony, as Pomponius Atticus did with regard to Poetry. Attigit quoque poeticen: credimus ne ejus expers eſſet ſuavitatis (1). They will taſte it, that they may not be quite ſtrangers to the ſweets of it. But I do not think that Lambecius had ſuch a deſign; for he married an old woman, and as ſhe was very rich, it is probable that the only pleaſure he expected from his marriage, was that of having a large eſtate. But he was very much diſappointed in his hopes. The old Lady was ſo covetous, that ſhe would not ſuffer her huſband to make uſe of any of her riches. She declared her mind ſo ſoon upon this ſubject, that it was not yet a fortnight after the nuptials had been celebrated, when Lambecius being diſguſted and tired with his condition, left his houſe and his native country, never to return thither any more. Here is my voucher. *Ad hæc adverſa poſtquam tædium Conjugii, inauſpicato A. 1662. cum Vetula divite, ſed parca, atque avara (A. 1690. He endeavoured to perſuade his new convert to enter amongſt the Jeſuits, but he could not prevail with him. I shall say nothing of the Orations he published in the year 1660, nor of some other books of his which are extant. I come now to that voluminous work, which he compiled at Vienna, and of which the reader will get a true notion by the following words of Monsieur Baillet. "Tho' the catalogue of the manuscripts of "the Emperor's library at Vienna be divided into eight "volumes in folio, yet it is not compleat; the author's "untimely death deprived us of so curious and im- "portant a work. Lambecius undertook to give us "in this large work an account of the manuscripts "which are lodged in that library, and he has done "it in a critical and historical manner; for he de- "signed to exert all his skill and learning in that ca- "talogue; whereby he has very much distinguished "himself from all the other compilers of catalogues, "whom we have mentioned. It must be confessed "that there are a great many very remarkable and "curious particulars in that prolix and noble com- "mentary. But the author might have brought the "substance of the long discourses contained in so "many volumes, within a much narrower compass, "if he had considered the means and leisure of private "persons, rather than the magnificence and majesty of "his Prince (7)."

[D] He was surprized with death in April 1680.] I keep to that date, because I believe that Nesselius (8) deserves in this respect more credit, than they, who suppose (9) that Lambecius died in September 1679. Meibomius might perhaps be easily reconciled with Nesselius with regard to the day; for the 24th of March according to the old stile, belongs to the month of April according to the new stile. But these two authors differ widely with regard to the distemper of which Lambecius died. The one says it was the plague, the other a dropsy. *Henr. LAMBERT, Bishop of Liege, or rather, of Maestricht. It is a pretty general opinion, as I have observed in another place (a), that he was killed by Pepin's order, at the instigation of Alpaide: but the fact is not very certain. We shall examine it below [A]. So many authors have wrote his Life, that the account of it is become exceedingly

(a) In the article of ALPAIDE.

[A] We shall examine it here below.] We shall make use of the arguments, which the Baron Le Roy urges in one of his books. His opinion is that neither Pepin nor Alpaide were concerned in St. Lambert's murther. He grounds his opinion (1) I. On the silence of Godescalcus a contemporary writer. Here then we have a reasoning grounded on the negative argument, of which Dr. John de Launoi knew so well how to make an advantage. This Godescalcus ascribes the massacre committed on the body of St. Lambert to no other cause, but to the murther of two brothers, who were related to Dodon. These two brothers had abused Lambert, for which reason they were killed by two of this prelate's relations. Dodon a powerful Lord, who had great credit with Pepin, would not suffer this murther to go unpunished, nor would he revenge himself only on mean and inconsiderable persons: he resolved therefore to get rid of St. Lambert, for whose sake his two cousins had been killed. This, according to Godescalcus, is the true cause of that Bishop's death: he does not say the least thing of Pepin nor of Alpaide. II. Monsieur le Roi (2) observes, that the first who charged Pepin with this murther, was a Canon of Liege named Anselmus, who lived in the eleventh Century. This Canon observes, as well as his predecessors, that Dodon caused St. Lambert to be murthered, in order to be revenged of the death of his two relations: but he gives us also an account of Alpaide's resentment against that prelate, as though this too had been a tradition. III. It is observed (3) that Sigebertus (4) suppressed the antient cause, which all the authors had mentioned, and spoke only of the new cause, which Anselmus had begun to publish. Let us see how errors get ground and encrease successively and by degrees. The authors, who wrote after Sigebertus, have not in the least mentioned the ancient cause, or they have blended it together with the new one, and added to the latter a thousand circumstances unknown to the former historians (5). Monsieur Le Roi quotes very grave authors, who intirely explode the new tradition, and who answer the arguments that are offered against the proof grounded on Godescalcus's silence. It is pretended that he suppressed the true cause of St. Lambert's Martyrdom, for fear of exasperating Pepin's successors. Father Mabillon answered to this, that since men did not scruple to publish that Charles Martel was damned, why would they not have been bold enough to assert, that this Prince's Father caused a Bishop to be put to death? Ut hæc ratio valuerit in Godescalco, inquit Mabillon, cur eam causam dissimulavit Stephanus, qui sub extremis Carolinæ stirpis regibus vivebat? Sane longe atrocior erat fabula de Caroli Martelli damnatione, quam tamen Hincmarus Remorum Archiepiscopus, Adrevaldus, aliique auctores imperante Carolo Calvo Martelli abnepote in vulgus jactare non debuerunt. Unde omnino incertum videtur, an Landebertus ob increpitum de pellicatu Pipinum cæsus sit, at vero alienum omnino videtur a tanti Principis bonitate & clementia, ut cædis illius fuerit auctor (6). i. e. "Though this rea- "son might have prevailed with Godescalcus, says "Mabillon, yet why should Stephanus omit that "cause, who lived under the last Kings of the Ca- "roline family? The story which is told of Charles "Martel's damnation is more shocking still, and yet "Hincmarus, Archbishop of Rheims, Adrevaldus, "and other authors, who lived under Charles the "Bald, the grandson of Martel's grand-child, did not "scruple to publish it. It is therefore very uncertain, "that Lambert was killed for reproving Pepin on "account of his concubine; and such a murther seems "to be quite inconsistent with that Prince's good na- "ture and mild temper." Father Jourdan, quoted by Monsieur Le Roy, does not question but Pepin married Alpaide in due form, after he had divorced Plectrude. Such marriages, indeed, and such divorces were prohibited by the Christian law, but yet, they were still permitted by the human laws in those times, even amongst Christians. These second marriages had nothing disgraceful nor infamous in them, in the eyes of the world (7). That historian observes (8), that Pepin and Alpaide had been parted long ago, when Lambert was murthered in the year 708. Alpaide, adds he, was not concerned in that murther, since she had been parted from Pepin in the very beginning of that Century, and was retired into a Monastery. . . . Ado, was the first who, after 180 years time, charged Pepin and Alpaide with the murther of that Saint. Hadrian Valesius quoted by the same Monsieur le Roi, observes, that notwithstanding the Canons of the Church, men used to take a second wife during the life of the first, from whom they were divorced, and that Pepin followed that custom. He asserts however that others maintained, that Pepin was never divorced from Plectrude, and that he never married Alpaide, and that Bede favours that opinion. He is in the right to add, that when the Historians supposed that ceedingly perplexed [B]. I have read only that which was printed at Liege in the year 1657, written by the Sieur de Boſe de Montandre. It is intitled, Le Courtiſan Chretien immollé en Victime d'Etat à la paſſion de la Cour : ou St. Lambert Eveque de Tongres & Martyr, ſacrifié pour les intérets de l'honneur conjugal. i. e. that Pepin married Alpaide, it was probably with a deſign to flatter the defendants of that Prince, who reigned in France (9), leſt Charles would be thought to have been a baſtard, which had been a diſgrace to the Royal Family. Certe haud parum ſimile veri eſt, finxiſſe hoc in Principum ſuorum gratiam Auctores, qui dominantibus Pipini poſteris, ſcripſere, & Alpaidem, quæ viva Plectrude juſta et legitima Pipini conjux eſſe non poterat, uxorem Pipini poſteriorem vocaviſſe, ne Carolus ex pellice ſuſceptus crederetur, ceu regio generi aliqua inde nota inureretur (9).

We meet in the ſupplement to Moreri's dictionary, with Monſieur Godeau's arguments againſt thoſe, who in this particular follow Sigebertus's Chronicle. But theſe arguments do only perplex the matter. One thing ſeems certain to me, namely, that it is to no purpoſe, with regard to the true cauſe of St. Lambert's murther, to know whether Alpaide was married in due form, or whether ſhe continued to be Pepin's concubine. For ſince the Church condemned ſeverely thoſe marriages which were contracted after a divorce, Biſhop Lambert might ſtill call Pepin's commerce with Alpaide a concubinage, though Pepin had married her. So that even the ſuppoſing of a marriage does not render improbable the opinion of thoſe, who aſſert that Pepin was reproved. And as the miſtreſs of a Prince has generally more power with him than a lawful ſpouſe, one may eaſily underſtand that Alpaide might prevail upon Pepin to put the cenſorious Biſhop to death, without ſuppoſing that Pepin had married her with all the neceſſary formalities. Father Jourdan's chronological obſervation is, in my opinion, the ſtrongeſt argument that can be urged againſt Sigebertus.

[B] So many authors have wrote his life, that the account of it is become exceedingly perplexed.] This is father Mabillon's obſervation. Monſieur le Roy has furniſhed me with it. Sanctus Landebertus .... plures habuit vitæ ſuæ ſcriptores, Godeſcalcum Diaconum Leodienſem ſupparem. Stephanum Epiſcopum Leodienſem ineunte ſæculo x. Anſelmum ejuſdem Eccleſiæ Canonicum medio ſæculo xi. Nicolaum itidem Canonicum, & Reinerum Monachum ſæculo xii. Denique Ægidium Aureæ Vallis Cœnobitam medio ſæculo xiii. *Felicior certe futurus, ſi vel unicum eumque diligentem habuiſſet. "Several authors have "written St. Lambert's life, as Godeſcalcus a Deacon "of Liege, who was almoſt his contemporary ; Ste"phanus Biſhop of Liege in the beginning of the "tenth Century ; Anſelmus a Canon of the ſame "Church in the middle of the eleventh Century ; "Nicholas alſo a Canon, and Reinerus a Monk in "the twelfth Century ; and laſtly Ægidius a Monk "of Orval in the middle of the thirteenth Century. "It had been happier for him, if he had had but "one hiſtorian, but a careful and accurate one. But "he met with the ſame fate as many other ſaints. "Whilſt ſeveral authors one after another pretend to "ſet off their actions, by commending or extolling "them, they do on the contrary diſguiſe and perplex "them by uncertain and fabulous accounts, and ſpoil "them entirely by falſe circumſtances." This is very juſtly obſerved ; it is hinting the true cauſe, and real ſpring of ſo many impertinent and falſe ſtories, with which the lives of the ſaints abound. The multiplying of panegyricks and lives will always produce that effect. No writer is fully ſatisfied with the wonders, which they, who went before him, have related ; he muſt add new ones to them ; and that much more for the ſake of the book and of its author, than of the Hero whoſe actions are deſcribed.

Except, however, the writers of Legends ; for very often they are much more concerned for the reputation of the Saint, than for any thing elſe ; but it is becauſe the greater the Saint's Reputation is, the more it is capable to encreaſe the number of his Votaries, and conſequently of alms given out of devotion. Let us tranſcribe here a beautiful paſſage of Lewis Vives, in which the Reader will ſee that falſe zeal condemned, which makes the lives of the Saints abound with ſo many idle and fabulous ſtories. Quæ de iis ſunt ſcripta, præter pauca quædam, multis ſunt commentis fœdata, dum qui ſcribit affectui ſuo indulget, & non quæ egit divus, ſed quæ ille egiſſe eum vellet, exponit : ut vitam dictet animus ſcribentis, non veritas. Fuere qui magnæ pietatis loco ducerent mendaciola pro religione confingere : quod & periculoſum eſt, ne veris adimatur fides propter falſa, & minimè neceſſarium : quoniam pro pietate noſtra tam multa ſunt vera, ut falſa tanquàm ignavi milites atque inutiles oneri ſint magis, quàm auxilio (11). i. e. "What has been written concerning them, a "few particulars only excepted, is entirely ſpoiled with "fictitious ſtories, whilſt the Author, indulging his "own zeal, relates, not what the Saint has really done, "but what he wiſhed he had done. So that it is the "paſſion of the writer, and not the truth that dic"tates the ſtory. Some have imagined that it was a "great piece of piety, to tell lies for the ſake of Re"ligion : which is not only needleſs, but even dan"gerous, leſt the falſe accounts diſcredit thoſe that are "true : and our Religion is ſupported by ſo many "true facts, that thoſe which are falſe ought to be "exploded, as ſo many lazy and uſeleſs Soldiers, "which are a burthen rather than a help."

LAMBERT (FRANCIS) a Franciſcan Friar born at Avignon, was one of the firſt in France, who left his Convents to embrace the Lutheran Religion. He arrived at Wittemberg in January 1523 (a). He taught Divinity, and ſet out with explaining the Prophecy of Hoſea. The Commentary he wrote on that Prophet was printed at Straſburg in the year 1525 in 8vo. He dedicated it to Frederic Duke of Saxony, and inſerted in it in his Dedication an account of the martyrdom of John Caſtellanus, who had been burnt at Mentz becauſe he followed the Reformed Religion. He added to his Commentary on the fourth chapter of Hoſea a treatiſe De Arbitrio hominis vere captivo contra impios liberi arbitrii aſſertores. i. e. "Of man's will being really enſlaved, "againſt the impious aſſertors of free-will." He had publiſhed in the year 1524 his Commentary on Solomon's Song ; and he obſerves in his dedication to Francis I, that he had already ſent to that Prince his treatiſe on marriage De ſacro & fidei Conjugio ; and that he had inſerted there a letter, in which he gave that Prince an account of the reaſons why he renounced Popery, and married a wife (b). De integritate viri nulla eſt dubitatio: teſtes ſunt apud nos, qui illum & in Francia & in Baſilea audierunt, tum Baſileenſis ſuffraganeus ille Tripolitanus, cum Pellicano, dant illi pulchrum teſtimonium. Et quanquam nos abundemus Lectoribus optimis, tamen, ſi quid poterit, non abjiciemus: mihi per omnia placet vir, & ſatis ſpectatus mihi eſt, quantum homo ſpectari poteſt, ut dignus ſit, quem in exilio paululum foramus & juvemus. Sed tu meam noſti facultatem, ut non ſit opis meæ illum alere, qui ipſe alienis vivo: videretur mihi Principi perſuadendum, ut jam non perdat, ſed in charitate Chriſto fœneret viginti aut triginta florenos, in eum collocandos, donec vel a ſuis tribulibus, vel proprio ſtipendio ſeſe ſuſtentet de labore ſuo* (5). i. e. "John Serranus, or, as his true "name is, Francis Lambert, is with me, a man of "a noble family; who continued twelve years amongſt "the Franciſcans, and has been there General of the "Order (or perhaps rather Superior of a Monaſtery) "but being now perſecuted and baniſhed, he is in "want. The man's honeſty cannot be queſtioned. "We have witneſſes to it here, who have heard him "both in France and at Baſil, and the ſuffragan "Biſhop of Tripoli at Baſil, with Pellicanus give "him a very good Character. And though we have "here a great many very good Readers, yet if he "can do any thing, we ſhall not neglect him. I like "him very well in every reſpect, and I am perſuaded, "as much as a man can be perſuaded with regard to "another, that he deſerves to be a little ſupported "and aſſiſted in his baniſhment. But you know my "eſtate is ſuch, that I cannot aſſiſt him, ſince I my-"ſelf live by other people's charity. I think we "ought to perſuade the Prince to grant him twenty "or thirty gilders, till he be aſſiſted by his own "countrymen, or till he can get a livelihood by his "own works: which will not be ſquandering the "money away, but rather lending it charitably to "Chriſt himſelf, and at an intereſt." We find by this paſſage, that our Lambert took the fictitious name of John Serranus, that he was of a noble family, that he had been a Franciſcan during twenty years, that he had been preferred to ſome employment in that order, that he had made ſome ſtay at Baſil, whence he had a good certificate of his morals. Luther (6) wrote a Preface to the Book which this Ex-monk of Avignon publiſhed concerning the Inſtitutes of the Franciſcans. It appears from another Letter of Luther that this Proſelyte making himſelf ready to go to Zurich, that he might be nearer to France, ſome perſons endeavoured to get him ſome money from the Elector to pay the expence of his journey (7). If that Letter of Luther had been written to Spalatinus in Auguſt (8) 1523, we ſhould infer from thence that Lambert altered his mind, becauſe they gave him ſome employment in the Univerſity; ſo that what Seckendorf adds, namely, that he had nevertheleſs compoſed at Wittenberg, and dedicated to the Elector his Expoſitions of ſome Prophets, of Solomon's Song, and of St. Luke's Goſpel (9), would not be referred to its proper times and there would be a tamen (nevertheleſs) pretty ill-placed. But it is probable, that Luther wrote that letter in Auguſt 1526, whence we muſt infer that the tamen is right, and that the journey to Zurich was not undertaken, becauſe Lambert was called into the Country of Heſſe, as I ſhall relate in the following remark.

He was ſent therefore to the Synod that was held at Hamburg, October the 21ſt 1526. Lambert offered there to a publick diſputation 150 Lutheran propoſitions, and defended them in a victorious manner againſt all the objections of the ſuperior of the Franciſcans of Marpurg. The Landgrave gave every one leave to enter the liſts, and ordered his Chancellor to tranſlate Lambert's Theſes into German, whenever any perſon deſired it. After the diſputation he commanded the Monks and Nuns to leave their Convents, and applied their income towards ſupporting the Univerſity and Hoſpitals of Marpurg: he eſtabliſhed Lutheran miniſters in the churches, and cauſed all the images to be pulled down. Lambert was appointed Divinity profeſſor in the Univerſity founded at Marpurg in the year 1527 (10).

LAMECH, deſcended from Cain in a direct line, was in the ſeventh generation, reckoning from Adam. It is obſerved in the holy Scripture (a) that he had two wives, the one named Ada and the other Zilla; it is imagined that there is ſome hidden myſtery in this obſervation, and that it is deſigned to ſhew us whence Polygamy had its firſt riſe. It did not begin amongſt the deſcendants of Seth, who feared God, but in the wicked wicked and corrupted poſterity of Cain, and that too by ſuch a man as Lamech [A], who himſelf tells his wives that he would kill a man. Such an origin, ſay they, cannot but be diſgraceful. However it be, the marriage of this firſt tranſgreſſor of the Law of Monogamy, eſtabliſhed in Paradiſe, would not appear to have been attended with any mark of reprobation, if we were to judge of it by temporal bleſſings; for there came from it ſome children, who had the ſkill to invent many uſeful things [B]. Now the inventors of arts have been ſo much eſteemed, that moſt of them were placed amongſt the Gods. It was therefore a very great honour, and conſequently a conſiderable temporal advantage to have the wit neceſſary to invent; but it does by no means follow, from thence that God approved Lamech's Polygamy. There are but four children of this man mentioned in Geneſis (b); but Joſephus aſſerts (c) that he had threeſcore and ſeventeen children by his two wives. Lamech's diſcourſe to his wives is a riddle to me [C]; and I confeſs ingenuouſly that it is beyond my capacity. I ſhall kill a man, ſays he to them (d), I being wounded, and a young man I being hurt; for if Cain be avenged ſevenfold, Lamech ſhall be avenged ſeventy ſevenfold. A great many Commentators are of opinion, that Lamech aſſerts here he had killed Cain [D], and Tubal-Cain. For (d) Gen. chap. iv. Mr. Bayle quotes the French tranſlation made at Geneva; and as it differs a little from our Engliſh tranſlation, we thought it proper to follow the French here.

[A] And by ſuch a man as Lamech.] The author of the Polygamia triumphatrix was an odd man indeed, who ſpent his health to eſtabliſh the doctrine of the plurality of wives, though one only had been too much for him (1). He ſtiles the reſolution which Lamech took to marry two an heroic action (2), and he commends him extremely for being the firſt who examined with the utmoſt attention that order of God, Be fruitful and multiply; and who having duly weighed it, put himſelf in a condition to perform it to the utmoſt of his power by marrying two wives (3). None dared to undertake it before him; the memory of Eve's fault and the conſideration of Adam's baniſhment, had filled people's minds with fear. Lamech was the firſt who dared to venture himſelf with an undaunted courage, without minding the difficulties he had conſidered. He made a commentary, not indeed in words, but by his actions, on the text of that univerſal law, Be fruitful and multiply; a law, which is a downright commandment, and not a mere bleſſing only. Ipſe autem inſuper habitis omnibus imminentibus & præconceptis difficultatibus, heroico animo hoc primus auſus, & proprio facto verba legis catholicæ (creſcite & multiplicamini) non benedictoria tantum, ſed ſimul imperatoria, explanare, & bono exemplo omnibus ſuis poſteris præire voluit (4). By this means he paved the way, and gave a good example to thoſe who ſhould come after him. Thus you ſee, how that poor author had prepoſſeſſed himſelf in favour of Polygamy; it was his darling fancy, he imagined that the Scripture mentioned Lamech's two marriages as an admirable deed, whereas Divines maintain very juſtly that the Scripture deſigned thereby to condemn Polygamy in its very infancy.

[B] The ſkill to invent many uſeful things.] Jabal and Jubal the ſons of Adah, Tubal-Cain and Naamah (5) his ſiſter, whoſe mother was Zillah, are Lamech's four children mentioned in the Scripture. Jabal invented the uſe of tents; Jubal invented ſome muſical inſtruments; Tubal-Cain invented ſeveral braſs and iron tools. The Holy Scripture, which acquaints us with theſe particulars, does not aſcribe any invention to Naamah; but if we may believe the Rabbies, ſhe invented the art of working wool, and of making linnen (6).

[C] Lamech's diſcourſe to his wives is a riddle to me.] It is not an eaſy matter to gueſs how the original words of Lamech's diſcourſe ought to be tranſlated. The French tranſlation of Geneva, which I have quoted, renders them in the future tenſe, I ſhall kill, and repreſents Lamech to us as a man who is to receive ſome wound before he kills. But in the vulgar Latin tranſlation it is rendered in the præter tenſe, I have killed; and as for the wound one does not know what to make of it; for this phraſe, occidi virum in vulnus meum, is a barbariſm, which ſignifies nothing in Latin, and which may ſignify any thing, as ſoon as we are got rid of the rules of Grammar. Some interpreters, who are very well ſkilled in the Hebrew tongue (7), tranſlate that paſſage neither in the præter tenſe nor in the future tenſe; but they make a conditional propoſition of the whole. I would kill a man by wounding him, and even a young man with a ſtick or with my fiſt, if they offered to attack me. Now how can we come at the true conſtruction of a period, which may be rendered in the future tenſe as well as in the præter tenſe, in the optative mood, as well as in the indicative? But though we could get over the Grammatical ſenſe, it would ſignify but little, ſince we ſhould ſtill have to examine what Lamech deſigned to ſay to his two wives; now this is no trifling difficulty. Nothing ſeems more improbable to me, than the opinion of thoſe, who imagine that all this is nothing but a rodomontade of Lamech (8). Others take it for a threatning to kill his wives, if they continued to vex him by their clamours and diſputes (9). But others, on the contrary, take it for an interrogation deſigned to comfort them under their fears; they were afraid leſt ſome perſon might kill him; and he encourages them by theſe words; Have I killed a man &c (a)?

* (a) Others take it for an interrogation . . . Have I killed a man?] This is alſo the opinion of the Reverend Mr. Shuckford: and as Lamech's diſcourſe may be a riddle to ſeveral of our readers, as it was to Mr. Bayle, we beg leave to lay here before them the explication of the ingenious Gentleman we have mentioned juſt now. "The deſcendants of Cain, ſays he (*), "lived a long time in ſome fear of the family of "Adam, leſt they ſhould attempt to revenge upon "them Abel's death. It is ſuppoſed (§) that it was "for this reaſon that Cain built a city, that his children might live near together, and be able more "eaſily to joyn and unite for the common ſafety. "Lamech endeavoured to reaſon them out of their "fears, and therefore calling his family together, he "argued with them to this purpoſe: Why ſhould we "make our lives uneaſy with theſe groundleſs ſuſpicions? "We have not killed a man, nor offered any injury to "our brethren of the other family; and ſurely reaſon "muſt teach them, that they can have no right to hurt "us. Cain indeed, our anceſtor, killed Abel; but "God was pleaſed ſo far to forgive his ſin, as to "threaten to take ſevenfold vengeance on any one that "ſhould kill him; if ſo, ſurely they muſt expect a "much greater puniſhment who ſhall preſume to kill "any of us; if Cain ſhall be avenged ſevenfold, ſurely "Lamech or any of his innocent family ſeventy ſeven-"fold. This I take to be the meaning of the ſpeech "of Lamech to his wives, Gen. iv. 23. Moſes has "introduced it without any connection with what "went before or what follows after, ſo that at "firſt ſight it is not eaſy to know what to apply "it to; the expreſſion itſelf is but dark, and the ex-"poſitors have attempted to explain it very imper-"fectly . . . The moſt probable ſenſe of the word is, "I think, that which I have given them in the pa-"raphraſe above. I have ſlain a man, ſhould be "read interrogately, have I ſlain a man? i. e. I have "not ſlain a man, to my wounding, i. e. that I ſhould "be wounded for it; nor a young man to my hurt, "i. e. nor have I killed a young man, that I ſhould "be hurt or puniſhed for it. And this is the ſenſe, "which the Targum of Onkelos moſt excellently gives "the place. I have not killed a man, ſays Onkelos, "that I ſhould bear the ſin of it, nor have I deſtroyed a "young man, that my offspring ſhould be cut off for "it." ADD. [D] A great many commentators are of opinion that

For it is a pretty general tradition, that Lamech, who always loved hunting, continued to take that diverſion, even when he was almoſt blind with age (e). He uſed then to take his ſon Tubal-Cain with him, who not only ſerved him for a guide (f) but alſo gave him notice when and where he was to ſhoot at any beaſt. Now it happened once that as Cain was lying down in a thicket, Lamech's guide obſerving ſomething that moved there, gave him notice of it, whereupon Lamech ſhot his arrow and killed Cain. He was extremely vexed at it, and beat his guide ſo ſeverely, that he left him dead on the ſpot. Thus, ſay they, one may put a reaſonable ſenſe on Lamech's words, which according to the vulgar Latin tranſlation runs thus, Occidi virum in vulnus meum, & adoleſcentulum in livorem meum. i. e. "I have ſlain a man to my wound, and a young "man to my bruiſe." Here is a diſtinction between the manner after which he killed the man, namely by a wound, and the manner after which he killed the boy, by bruiſes which rendered his body black and blew. This ſtory and the circumſtances with which it is attended, abound with abſurdities [E]. Suidas pretends, that Lamech killed two brothers of Enoch, and married their wives (g).

Lamech aſſerts here, he had killed Cain.] A commentator (10), who is otherwiſe very judicious and learned, has been much miſtaken here; for he imagines that to be the moſt probable explication of Lamech's ſpeech. He alledges two arguments for it. Firſt, ſays he, Cain's poſterity continued till the flood; and yet Moſes makes it end at Lamech and his ſons, for which no other reaſon can be given but this, namely that Cain's life ended in the generation of Lamech who killed him. Secondly, ſays he, the only reaſon why Moſes would relate the murther committed by Lamech, was to hint thereby the unhappy death of Cain. I could refute theſe arguments ſeveral ways, but I ſhall only obſerve that Pererius ſuppoſes a fact which is not the leaſt probable, namely, that Moſes deſigned to let the world know that Lamech killed Cain. If ſuch had been his deſign, would he have left ſo great a darkneſs in the fourth chapter of Geneſis with regard to that particular? Was there in Cain's death any thing myſterious, that muſt be wrapped up in ſo many enigmatical expreſſions? Indeed, if it could be proved that Moſes had ſuch a deſign, one might apply to him this verſe of the Goſpel, Never man ſpake like this man (11), and cry out, Tacui, Domine, quia tu feciſti. i. e. "I was "dumb, O Lord, becauſe thou didſt it." One would never pardon this in an uninſpired author. However, I do not pretend to refute, generally ſpeaking, the opinion of thoſe, who take for ſigns of inſpiration in the accounts given us by Moſes, ſome ſingularities, which are of ſuch a nature, that an author would never have made uſe of them, had the direction of his work been left to him alone (12).

[E] This ſtory and the circumſtances with which it is attended, abound with abſurdities.] I. It is a very ill-contrived ſuppoſition to aſſert, that Lamech was almoſt blind (13), through age, whilſt Cain his great-grand-father's father was ſtill living. II. It is abſurd to make him go a hunting in ſuch a decrepit old age, that he could not ſee the game, and wanted a guide to tell him when he was to ſhoot his arrow. III. It is abſurd to ſuppoſe, that the reaſon why he made the ſpeech before us to his two wives, was, that they abuſed him in his old age, either becauſe they could not reſiſt his exceſſive laſciviouſneſs, or on account of his children's ſavage temper. Hanc tradunt hiſtoriam, Lamechum in ſenectute male tractatum eſſe ab uxoribus, vel propter nimiam ejus libidinem atque laſciviam, vel propter truculenta filiorum ejus ingenia (14). What likelihood is there, that at ſuch an age he would have given two wives reaſon to complain of his too frequent careſſes? IV. It is abſurd to ſuppoſe, that when Lamech had committed that double murther, his wives refuſed to lie any more with him, becauſe that Cain's offspring was to periſh according to the oracle, after the ſeventh generation (15): this, I ſay, is abſurd; for it is ſo far from being true that God threatened Cain to make his iſſue fail or periſh after the ſeventh generation, that on the contrary, he had aſſured him, that whoſoever ſhould ſlay Cain, vengeance ſhould be taken on him ſevenfold. V. It is more abſurd ſtill to ſuppoſe (16), that Lamech took his two wives with him to Adam, and deſired him to reprove them for refuſing him their bed: and that when Adam had begun his lecture, he was interrupted in ſuch a manner as loaded him with confuſion. You are a fine man indeed, ſays Lamech's wife to Adam, to reprove us: let your cenſure fall upon yourſelf firſt, you, who after ſo many years have not lain with your wife. I omit obſerving that Lamech's ſuppoſed old age does not agree with the eagerneſs with which he endeavoured to bring his wives to reaſon with regard to conjugal embraces: I do not ſay, that the recrimination had been imagined with a little more probability, if it had been ſuppoſed, that Lamech was cenſured by Adam at the requeſt of his two wives, and upon their complaint; but I aſſert, that ſince according to the fancies of the Rabbies, Adam continued but an hundred and thirty years after Abel's death, without lying with Eve, it is abſurd to ſuppoſe that he was cenſured for it, as though he did not lie with Eve when Cain was killed. Voſſius the younger miſtook here Lamech Noah's father for Lamech who married two wives. Judæorum eſt fabella, ſays he (17), Lamechum de uxoribus conqueſtum eſſe apud Adamum, illum his juſſiſſe ut ad maritum reverterentur ac ſui facerent copiam. Iſtas reſpondiſſe Adamo ut ipſe prius ſuæ ſatisfaceret conjugi, à qua jam per centum & triginta annos propter ſcelus Caini eſſet ſeparatus. Verum quis adeo ſit hebes, ut non videat narratiunculam hanc eſſe ineptiſſimam? Ex ea ſequeretur Lamechum qui à Setho ſeptimus fuit diu fuiſſe antequam Sethus naſceretur. i. e. "The Jews "relate the following ſtory. Lamech, ſay they, com-"plained of his wives to Adam, who commanded "them to return to him, and to ſuffer him to enjoy "them. But they anſwered him, that he ſhould firſt "ſatisfy his own wife, from whom he had been parted "an hundred and thirty years on account of Cain's "crime. But who is ſo blind as not to ſee the filli-"neſs of this ſtory, ſince it ſuppoſes that Lamech, who "was the ſeventh from Seth, exiſted long before Seth "was born?" VI. It is abſurd to ſuppoſe that Tubal-cain being ſtill a boy was killed by his father. How could he have been the inventor of ſeveral braſs tools, as the Scripture ſuppoſes he was? Let us obſerve here that Joſephus does not in the leaſt mention that pretended murther of Lamech; ſo that Toſtatus, who quotes him for that ancient tradition (18), was deceived by his memory.

Iſaac Voſſius (b) complains, that Sigiſmund Gelenius inſerted in the Latin Tranſlation of Joſephus a particular, which is not in the Greek text of that Jewiſh Hiſtorian; namely, that Adam was ſtill living in the time of Lamech: this critic, at the ſame time that he cenſures censures this blunder, commits another himself; for he mistakes Lamech Noah's father, for Lamech descended from Cain, as we have shewed it in the last remark of the foregoing article.

LAMIA, a Roman family. It was a branch of the family of the Ælii [A], and it was probably admitted into it only by adoption; for it was supposed to be descended from LAMUS (a) Neptune's son, and King of the Læstrygones, who lived in a city, which was afterwards called Formiæ. This is Horace's opinion [B]. Such an ancient descent as that, with which the Poet compliments his friend ÆLIUS LAMIA, was doubtless the reason why Juvenal, designing to hint at a Lady of the first quality, describes her in these words, quædam denumero LAMIARUM (b); i. e. "one of "the family of the Lamiæ," that is, of an high descent. It is very probable that the person to whom Horace inscribes the seventeenth Ode of his 3d book, and whom he commends also in several other places, was the father of LUCIUS ÆLIUS LAMIA (c), who died towards the latter end of Tiberius's reign in the year 786 after the building of Rome; he had been Governor of Syria [C], whence he was removed and appointed Governor of Rome. He was honoured with a Censor's funeral (d). From him was perhaps descended ÆLIUS LAMIA, Domitia Longina's husband, whom Domitian took away from him. He put him to death some time after [D]. There was also one LUCIUS ÆLIUS LAMIA, who was banished, because he had taken Cicero's part against Piso with too much zeal. He afterwawas rds an Ædile, and then Prætor after Cæsar's death in the year 711 after the building of Rome. It is imagined that it was he, who being reputed dead, so that the funeral pile on which he was laid was already kindled, recovered his senses by the action of the fire [E]. Consult Streinius's Roman families, and Glandorp's Onomasticon (e).

(a) Homer, Odyss. lib. 10. ver. 18. mentions this Lamus, who lived, says he, in a great city.

(b) Juvenal, Sat. 6. ver. 383.

(c) Glandorp, Onomast. pag. 14. supposes the person mentioned by Horace to be the same who died in the year 786: but this is making him live too long.

(d) See the remark [C] quotation (5).

[A] It was a branch of the family of the Ælii.] The Antonini, Roman Emperors, were descended from this family; it consisted of seven or eight branches, all plebeian; that of the Cati, that of the Tubero's, that of the Galli, that of the Stilo's, that of the Præconini, that of the Sejani, and that of the Lamiæ (1). It is not asserted by any author, that the Ælii were descended from Lamus King of the Læstrygones, but it was said of the Lamiæ; the latter must therefore have been admitted into the family of the others by adoption.

The antient Romans were as silly as men are at present with regard to genealogies. Of how many families was it not said, that they were descended, either from one of Hercules's fellow-travellers, or from some other man famous in the fabulous times? Silius Italicus imagined, that Lamus had reigned at Cajeta (3). See Bochart's Geographia Sacra (4).

LAMIA, a City in Thessaly. It is chiefly remarkable on account of the battle which was fought in its territories between the Athenians assisted by the other Greeks; and Antipater Governor of Macedonia, after the death of Alexander. This battle proved very fatal to the Athenians, and to several other Cities of Greece (a). Suidas is mistaken when he asserts that Antipater lost the victory (b).

This gave riſe, undoubtedly, to the vulgar traditions, which the Poets followed in their Tragedies [B]. There is another particular related of Lamia, or of the LAMIÆ, namely, that they could take and leave their eyes when they pleaſed. They put them by when they were at home, and took them again when they went abroad. This is the emblem of curioſity, and of ſelf-love [C]. Philoſtratus deſcribes them as very laſcivious [D]. I cannot tell whether the firſt LAMIA [E] was thus called on account of what the fables reported of the Lamiæ, or whether the latter borrowed their name from that fiſh. Moreri's blunders are not conſiderable [F].

[D] Philoſtratus deſcribes them as very laſcivious.] He obſerves (9), that out of laſciviouſneſs they inticed the men they had a mind to devour at a proper time and place; and that they chiefly delighted to eat beautiful boys, when they were become very fat and plump. It was not, I think, an eaſy matter to grow fat in the ſervice of thoſe lewd creatures. Philoſtratus ought to have taken notice of this objection. One might perhaps apply here the explication which has been given of the fable of Diomedes King of France, who made his mares feed upon the fleſh of his gueſts. This ſignifies, according to ſome perſons, that he obliged them to gratify the luſt of his daughters, till theſe men were nothing but ſkin and bones. Diomedes Thraciæ Rex, cùm aliquot haberet filias ſalaciſſimas, cogebat hoſpites ut earum libidinem ſatiarent; dictus ob id equas humanis carnibus paſcere: equa enim & mulier ſolæ animalium appetunt marem etiam prægnantes; unde equiendi vocabulum, ut ait Ariſtoteles (*), trahitur malediclo in fœminas procaces: comedunt verò carnes humanas, cùm viros exſugunt, & cœitu emaciatos ad tabem perducunt; ut rectè Solomon (†) à mulierum conſuetudine revocet adoleſcentes, ne fruſtrà gemere incipiant, poſteaquàm carnes ſuas conſumpſerint (10). i. e. However the twenty ninth book ought to have been quoted and not the forty ninth, for his Antiquæ Lectiones contain but thirty books. VI. Pliny ought not to have been cited, ſince he ſays nothing of the fiſh called Lamia (13). And yet Moreri wanted an author who conſidered the Lamias as an extraordinary fiſh. This calls to my mind a falſe quotation, which I have obſerved in Calepin. He quotes Pliny, lib. 29, cap. 24. immediately after theſe words. Lamia item piſcis eſt (unde & Lamiarum ſtrigum nomen, quod ut Lamiæ ſunt voraciſſimæ, à λαιμὸς *guttur) tanto oris rictu, tantæque voracitatis, ut & loricatum hominem devoraſſe compertum ſit. He loaded her with ſo many favours, that ſhe was able to live in a very magnificent manner [D]. She excelled in witty ſayings

" was at firſt eſteemed for her art, for ſhe played " pretty well upon the flute: afterwards ſhe became " famous in the trade of a Courtezan (1)." When the art of ſinging, or dancing, or playing upon muſical inſtruments, is practiſed by one of the fair ſex with a deſign to be commended, I mean, when ſhe makes a trade of it, and performs on the ſtage, it ſoon leads her to a downwright proſtitution. Do not wonder therefore that our Lamia from a Player on the flute turned a Courtezan. The deſcent is very ſteep and ſlippery from the one to the other.

[B] She pleaſed Demetrius very well, though ſhe began to be in a declining age] I ſhould have made uſe of ſome expreſſions more proper to repreſent her as an old woman, if I had conſulted Plutarch alone: But having read in Athenæus, that ſhe had a daughter by Demetrius (2). I thought I was obliged to ſoften my expreſſions. Here follows what Plutarch tells us. Τότε γᾶν ἤδη λέγουσα τῆς ὥρας, καὶ πολὺ νεώτερον ἑαυτῆς λαβοῦσα τὸν Δημήτριον, ἐκράτησε τῇ χάριτι καὶ καλέχεν· ὥστε ἐκείνης εἶναι μόνης ἐρᾶσθαι τῶν δὲ ἄλλων γυναικῶν ἐρᾶσθαι. i. e. " Lamia, whoſe beauty began to de- " cline, inſpired Demetrius with love, though he was " much younger than ſhe; and ſhe gained him ſo " well by her engaging ways, that he was a lover " to her alone, though he were beloved by the other " women (3)." I ſhall quote below (4) another paſſage, which is not leſs to the purpoſe. It is generally ſaid, that in families friendſhip deſcends much more than it aſcends: Fathers love their children much more than children love their fathers. One may ſay the ſame with regard to the love of men towards women. They are generally older than the women they love. But this rule is liable to a great many exceptions; even in royal families; witneſs the Dauphin who was in love with an old widow under the reign of Francis I. I mention it in the Article of Diana of POITIERS. And here we ſee a young King, who ſuffers himſelf to be captivated by a woman, who was much older than her. It is no great wonder: for old Courtezans with ſome remains of beauty, ſupported by a great deal of craft and artifice, are capable to make a young man go a great length. However it be, if Demetrius met with great charms in Lamia the firſt time he ſaw her, he found her not leſs charming in his greateſt intimacy with her. Φησὶ δὲ τὴν Δαμίαν τὸν βασιλέα εὐμειλίως κεκνῆσαι ὑπερσαινεθῆναι θ'. Idem ait Demetrium ab incubante Lamia concinne ſuaviterque ſubagitatum fuiſſe, & idcirco eam laudaſſe (5). It was not only her agility, that enchanted Demetrius ſo much. She uſed alſo to bite him amorouſly (6) at which that Prince was perhaps as much pleaſed, as his friends were diſpleaſed with his paſſion for that woman. They could not conceal their diſpleaſure; for when his Embaſſadors had ſeen the ſcars which Lyſimachus ſhewed on his thighs and arms, they anſwered him, that the King their maſter had alſo ſcars on his neck, occaſioned by the teeth of that cruel beaſt Lamia, You muſt know that Lyſimachus had fought with a Lyon, and ſhewed the Embaſſadors the marks of the wounds he had received in that fight. The words in the original are more elegant than the ſummary account I have given of them. Ἀφικνεῖτο γάν τινες παρ' αὐτῷ καλὰ πρεσβείαν πρὸς Λυσίμαχον, ὃς ἐκεῖνῳ ἄγων σχολὴν ἐπέδειξεν ἐν τοῖς μηροῖς καὶ τοῖς βραχίοσιν ὠτειλὰς βαθείας ὀνύχων λεοντείων. καὶ διηγεῖτο τὴν γενομένην αὐτῷ μάχην πρὸς τὸ θηρίον, ὑπὸ Ἀλεξάνδρῳ συγκαθειρχθέντι τῇ βασιλέως. οἱ δὲ, γελάσαντες ἔφασαν, καὶ τὸν αὐτῶν βασιλέα δεινῇ θηρίᾳ δήγματα φέρειν ἐν τῷ τραχήλῳ Δαμίας. i. e. At which the Embaſſadors anſwered with " a ſmile, that their King had alſo been ſeverely bit " in the neck by a wild beaſt called Lamia (7)."

" Men wondered, that he who was " diſguſted with Philla as ſoon as ſhe began to decline, " was thus conquered by Lamia, and loved her ſo " much even when ſhe began to grow old (8)." He aſked Demo once what ſhhe thought of Lamia, who was playing on the flute whilſt they were at table. She is an old woman, anſwered Demo. When the Deſert was brought, Do you ſee, ſaid he to Demo, how many things Lamia ſends me. My mother, replied Demo, would ſend you a great many more, if you would alſo lie with her (9). Obſerve that this was a Courtezan, who had been the Concubine of Antigonus Demetrius's father, and whom Demetrius himſelf loved afterwards (10). Plutarch aſſerts that ſhe was ſurnamed Mania; but Athenæus (11) ſpeaks of Demo and of Mania as of two Courtezans. There aroſe a violent hatred between Lyſimachus and Demetrius; which was the reaſon why Lyſimachus caſt very ſevere jokes on Demetrius on account of his love for Lamia. She is the firſt Courtezan, ſaid he, I ever ſaw, who came from the play-houſe. Demetrius anſwered, I will have him to know, that my Whore is more honeſt than his Penelope. Σωφρονεστέραν εἶναι τὴν ἑαυτῷ πόρνην τῆς ἐκείνου Πηνελόπης. i. e. " That his own whore was more mo- " deſt, than the other's Penelope." James Amiot did not underſtand this paſſage in Plutarch; he makes Lyſimachus ſay, I had never ſeen before a Courtezan who acted in a Tragedy. Plutarch's words do not ſignify this. Λυσίμαχος λοιδορῶν εἰς τὸν ἔρωτα τῆς Λαμίας ἔλεγε νῦν πρῶτον ἑωρακέναι πόρνην προερχομένην ἐκ τραγικῆς σκηνῆς. Lyſimachus inſectans eum ob Lamiæ amores, dictitabat nunc primum ſcortum ſe ex tragica prodiens (13) ſcena vidiſſe. i. e. " Lyſimachus ridiculing him on " account of his love for Lamia, ſaid, this is the " firſt proſtitute I ever ſaw coming from the tragic " Theatre." The beſt tranſlation in the world would not explain that thought, if we did not know a particular, with which Athenæus acquaints us (14); and which is this; Demetrius had ſaid that Lyſimachus's court was like a Comic Theatre; no perſon came from it, but whoſe name was of two ſyllables. Thus he ridiculed ſuch men as Bithes, Paris, and ſome others whoſe names were not longer, and who were Lyſimachus's greateſt favourites: when Lyſimachus was acquainted with this raillery, he only ſaid, that he never ſaw at his court a proſtitute who came from the tragic Theatre. He hinted at Lamia's trade, who played on the flute (15), which was uſed to be practiſed in the acting of Tragedies.

There was a book written upon this Subject. sayings and smart repartees [E]. And as the Athenians carried their adulations with regard to Demetrius to the most extravagant impieties, they built a temple to this courtezan under the name of VENUS LAMIA [F], though on some occasions they had been very angry to see that their money was designed for this woman [G]. The Thebans committed the same impiety (c). The story which we read in Athenæus concerning Demetrius and Lamia is such, that it is not proper to tell it in English [H]. I question whether Ælian has been accurate in the account he gives us of these two persons [I]. Plutarch relates Lamia's censure of a sentence given in a love-affair [K]. What I have observed against Anthony de Guevara with regard to Lais, I repeat it here with regard to Lamia. He has related as many falsities of the one as of the other. Brantome has been misled by him [L]. As Moreri's account of this Lamia contains but three lines, tarch had mentioned just before, the large sums of money which Demetrius had forced the Athenians to give to Lamia (19); and he adds here, that this woman on her part, and over and above these sums, obliged several persons to give her money for the entertainment, which she was preparing for Demetrius.

[F] The Athenians .... built a temple to this Courtezan under the name of VENUS LAMIA.] They built another to Leæna, the same Demetrius's concubine (21), and they paid the same respect to that Prince's favorites; you may be sure that neither Altars, nor Libations, nor Hymns were wanting in these temples. Demetrius himself was so much surprized at it, that he publickly declared there was then not one Citizen at Athens, who had any courage. His reflexion has been wretchedly spoiled by the Translator of Athenæus. He makes Demetrius say, that there would not be one courageous Citizen of Athens amongst the shades below. Admirante ipso Demetrio quæ tum fierent, palamque dicente, apud inferos nullum unquam futurum magni excelsique animi civem Athenienſem. One letter being put instead of two others (22) has occasioned the prodigious alteration of that reflexion. Here follow the Greek words as they are in Athenæus. Ὥστε καὶ αὐτὸν Δημήτριον θαυμάζειν ἐπὶ τοῖς γινομένοις, καὶ λέγειν ὅτι ᾔδεις ἐπ' αὐτῇ Ἀθηναίων γέγονε μόνας καὶ ἀνδρὸς τὴν ψυχήν. This reflexion of Demetrius calls to my mind an exclamation of Tiberius. Memoriæ proditur Tiberium, quotiens curia egrederetur, Græcis verbis in hunc modum eloqui ſolitum, ô homines ad servitutem paratos! ſcilicet etiam illum, qui libertatem publicam nollet, tam projectæ ſervientium patientiæ tædebat (23). i. e. (25) We meet with this marginal note in Amiot's French translation of Plutarch. As for the Lamia's, all th soap and all the water in the world would not be sufficient to clean and wash those, who gave so many talents extorted from the people, to make Lands and Lordships everlasting memorials of the lasciviousness of such prostitutes, the execrable plagues of public States, and the eternal infamy of those, who trifled their time away with them; such women are proper instruments to rob both the great and the meaner sort of their money.

[G] Though .... they had been angry to see that their money was designed for this woman.] Amongst the several oppressions, which the Athenians suffered from Demetrius, nothing vexed them more than the order he gave them to find him immediately two hundred and fifty talents. They raised that money with a great deal of severity and haste; and when it was ready, he commanded them to send it to Lamia, and to the other Courtezans, who waited upon her; it is for their Soap, said he. These words and that use of the money grieved the Athenians more than the loss of their money. Ἰδὼν ἠθροισμένον τὸ ἀργύριον, ἐκέλευσε Λαμίᾳ καὶ ταῖς περὶ αὐτὴν ἑταίραις εἰς σμῆγμα δοθῆναι· ἡ γὰρ αἰσχύνη, τῆς ζημίας, καὶ τὸ ῥῆμα τῷ πράγματι. μᾶλλον ἠνώχλησε τοὺς ἀνθρώπους. *Ubi coactum argentum vidit, Lamiæ juſſit id, cæteriſque meretricibus quæ circa eam erant, ad ſmegma præberi. [I] . . I question whether Ælianus has been accurate in the account he gives us of these two persons.] Demetrius, says he (27), who reigned over so many nations, used to go often ready armed and with his diadem on his head to the Courtezan Lamia. He would have disgraced himself very much had he sent for her; but he went very carefully to her house. I have a less value for that Prince than for Theodore the player on the flute, who refused to hearken to Lamia's prayers, when she desired him to go and see her. Such is that Author's story; but I question the truth of it: For Demetrius did not see Lamia before she had been presented to him after the naval battle, in which he gained the victory over the King of Egypt. Lamia did no longer follow the trade of a common prostitute, she was a King's mistress. If it be urged, that even since she was Demetrius's mistress, she had a house to herself, and that therefore it was very possible that Demetrius was seen going to her house; I answer, that he did not go to her as to a common prostitute, but as to a mistress, whom he imagined he enjoyed alone, and to whom he had given means to be stately lodged. So that Ælian's censure falls to the ground; for when a Prince once indulges himself in the crime of a publick concubinage, it is the same thing whether he goes to his mistress's house, or sends for her. It is even a more scandalous thing to see her lodged in the royal palace, than to see her live in a house by herself. I am fully persuaded that Lamia lodged in Demetrius's palace, or at least, that Demetrius did not go to her as to a Courtezan who admitted any one's visits. And yet this is what Ælian supposes, and on which he grounds the moral of his chapter.

[K] Lamia censured a sentence given in a love-affair.] The story is as follows: Thonis (28), an Ægyptian Courtezan, had demanded a large sum of money of a young man, who was in love with her; whereupon the bargain was broke off; and the lover retired without doing any thing. He dreamt in the night that he enjoyed that woman, which cured him of his passion. Thonis hearing of this, pretended that the young man was obliged to pay her, and summoned him before the Judges. Bocchoris sentenced the defendant to put into a purse the sum he had been asked, and to move it to and fro, so as to make the shadow of it fall upon Thonis. The judge hinted thereby, that opinion is nothing but the shadow of truth, and that the enjoyment in a dream was but the shadow of a real enjoyment. Lamia, who was a competent judge in those matters, said one day, that that sentence was unjust, because the shadow of the purse did not cure the Courtezan of her longing to get that money, whereas that young man's dream had cured him of his love (29).

[M] As Moreri's account of this Lamia contains but three lines, I have not many errors . . . to charge him with.] I. This expreſſion, The Thebans conſecrated the Temple of Venus Lamia to her, is equivocal, it may make us think, that the Thebans had already a Temple of Venus Lamia, which they conſecrated to Demetrius's miſtreſs. To prevent all equivocations, Moreri ought to have ſaid, that the Thebans built a Temple to this miſtreſs, and called it the Temple of Venus Lamia. II, It is not true that Plutarch mentions this; Athenæus ſhould have been quoted for it. Moreri borrowed that falſe quotation from Charles Stephens (33).

(33) Lloyd ſuppreſſed the quotation of Plutarch. Hofman has done the ſame.

[N] I am ſurpriſed at a doubt of Monſieur Menage.] He queſtions whether the Courtezan Lamia was the ſame Athenian Lady, whom Demetrius Phalereus kept. An eadem eſt ac illa nobilis fœmina quam amabat Phalereus (34). When he ſtiles her noble, he grounds that expreſſion on theſe words of Diogenes Laertius; Ἀλλὰ ἀξιᾶ καὶ εὐγενεῖ συνώκει Λαμίᾳ τῇ ἑταιρικῇ. i. e. "He enjoyed a noble Athenian woman, called La-"mia, whom he loved." If you diſtinguiſh the ſentence thus, you muſt deny without the leaſt heſitation, that Lamia Demetrius Poliorcetes's miſtreſs was beloved by Demetrius Phalereus; for Demetrius Poliorcetes's miſtreſs was only a player on the flute, and was not, conſequently, of a noble family. Monſieur Menage was in the right to cenſure Dalechamp, who tranſlated the following words of Athenæus, Δημήτριος δ' ὁ Πολιορκητὴς ἐ δαιμονίως ἤρα Λαμίας τῆς αὐλητρίδος, thus, Demetrius Phalereus Lamiam tibicinem amavit perditiſſime; i. e. "Demetrius Pha-"lereus did paſſionately love Lamia who played on "the flute." But he ſhould alſo have cenſured Aldobrandinus, who aſſerted that the Thebans, out of complaiſance for Demetrius Phalereus, built the Temple of Venus Lamia, with a deſign to honour the memory of his miſtreſs Lamia (35). Aldobrandinus quotes here Cælius Rhodiginus, Lib. 26. Cap. 5. There are three critical obſervations to be made here. 1. The Thebans built that Temple, out of complaiſance not for Demetrius Phalereus, but for Demetrius Policrates. 2. Athenæus ought to have been quoted, and not Cælius Rhodiginus. 3. It ſhould have been obſerved that the Athenians had the ſame complaiſance, which the Thebans had.

LAMPONIANO (JOHN ANDREW) deſcended from an illuſtrious family in the Milaneſe (a), was one of the three ſervants of Galeazzo Sforza, Duke of Milan, who conſpired againſt that Prince, and killed him in St. Stephen's Church December the 26th 1476. Lamponiano gave him the two firſt ſtrokes. He came as though he intended to diſperſe the crowd which ſurrounded that Prince, and pretended he had ſome letters to give him. He was exaſperated againſt him on account of a law-ſuit [A], in which he had not been able to prevail upon that Prince to favour him againſt his party, and he expected to find his account in a revolution in the State; he wanted to retrieve his affairs, having ſpent the greateſt part of his eſtate, and he was ſtill as proud and as much given to luxury as he had been before. His two accomplices were Charles Viſconti, and Jerom Olgiati. The latter was perſuaded to enter into that wicked conſpiracy by the inſtigation of a ſchool-maſter, an enemy of the Duke, who repreſented to him that he would gain a great reputation by murthering a tyrant [B]. As for Charles Viſconti rate even mean and inconſiderable perſons. There are few enemies but can do a great deal of miſchief. Cola being taken ſome time after fell into Laurence de Medicis's hands, who cauſed him to be hanged (8). The courage, with which he filled Olgiati's breaſt, by the hopes of an everlaſting fame, was not daunted at the ſight of the capital puniſhment to which he was condemned. Olgiati and his companion had time to make their eſcape, by means of the great diſorder and confuſion, which the Duke's murther had occaſioned in the Church, But as no perſon dared to ſhelter them, they were taken two days after, and condemned to ſuffer the puniſhment which their crime deſerved. Here follows an account of Olgiati's conſtancy. Olgiatus ipſe mirum viſu auditu-que veſana conſtantia obſtinatum animum in conſpectu carnificis gerens, ſeſeque in ipſa morte confirmans hæc contumaci ore protulit verba; Colligè te, Hieronyme, ſtabit vetus memoria facti; mors quidem erit acerba, ſed tormentum breve, atque ejus fama perpetua (9).

[A] He was exaſperated againſt the Duke of Milan, on account of a law-ſuit.] Here follows an account of the whole matter according to Paul Jovius. Ad audendum immane uſque adeo & periculoſum facinus vehementer incitabat illata ſibi injuria à Caſtellioneo Comenſium antiſtite, à quo ſacri latifundii poſſeſſione contra jus interrupta locatione, ſe periniquè ſpoliatum querebatur. Totum autem ejus injuriæ odiique venenum vertebat in principem, qui à ſe ſuppliciter deprecante eam contumeliam, ſæpe rogatus adverſarium in extrahenda lite præpotentem, neque advertere, neque mollire voluiſſet (1). i. e. He turned all the bitterneſs of his reſent-"ment for that injury againſt the Prince, whom "he had often humbly but in vain requeſted to do "him juſtice againſt his party, or at leaſt to move "his party to compaſſion, who being very power-"ful prolonged the proceſs." This calls to my mind Philip King of Macedon, who was killed by a man (2), who could not prevail upon him to puniſh another by whom he had been very outragiouſly abuſed. Pauſaniam Attalus mero onuſtum nefariis convivarum ludibriis expoſuerat. i. e. [B] Olgiati . . . was perſuaded . . . by a ſchoolmaſter, an enemy of the Duke, who repreſented to him that he would gain a great reputation by murthering a Tyrant.] His name was Cola Montanus; he had been tutor to Galeazzo Sforza, who remembering more than it was proper the laſhes he had received from his tutor, cauſed him one day to be publickly whipped upon his bare buttocks. Hic Cola quondam Galeacii pædagogus dirum in principem odium conceperat impotenti ejus contumelia percitus, quòd ille puerilium verberum nimis memor, poſtquam adolevit, imperiumque ſuſcepit, ipſi Colæ tanquam immiti ſubagreſtique præceptori, acceptas olim plagas nudatis clunibus loro palam rependi juſſiſſet (5). Cola being extremely exaſperated at this injury, animated young Olgiati with a ſtrong deſire of Glory, of ſuch a Glory, I mean, as ſhould accrue to him, if he reſtored his country to its ancient liberty by the murther of a tyrant. He exalted to the ſky the merit of Brutus and Caſſius: In a word, it was he, who by his violent exhortations encouraged him to undertake and perform that attempt (6), as Olgiatus confeſſed on the rack. Olgiatum penè imberbem, leviſſimumque adoleſcentem inani ſpe parandæ gloriæ inflaverat Cola Montanus litterarii ludi magiſter, ſi occiſo tyranno patriam in libertatem aſſereret; ſæpe Caſſios & Brutos in ſchola magnis extollens laudibus, qui gloria ducti pulcherrimi facti conſilium olim ſuſcepiſſent (7). Viſconti he had two powerful motives to engage in that conſpiracy [C]. Lamponiano was killed by a Moor whilſt he endeavoured to make his eſcape through a crowd of women. His corps biting the ground [D] was delivered to the populace (b), who abuſed it for ſome time (c). Peter Crinitus wrote verſes to the honour of this aſſaſſin [E]. It is reported that this Duke of Milan was adorned with eminent qualities (d), and governed his dominions like a good Prince, without any conſiderable blemiſh but exceſſive lewdneſs, in which he could ſo much the eaſier indulge himſelf, as the Ladies of his court took a pride in their amorous intrigues [F].

i. e. "Olgiati himſelf, (it was wonderful to behold "and to hear it,) having an undaunted courage, "and ſteady mind at the very ſight of the executioner, and comforting himſelf on the point of "death, ſpoke there with a haughty countenance; "Take heart, Jerome, the memory of thy action "will never periſh: death indeed is bitter, but the "pain of it will be but ſhort, and the glory everlaſting."

The reader will not perhaps be diſpleaſed to meet here with ſome verſes, which he wrote in priſon. They are a proof of his boldneſs, and an abuſe of the Prince he had murthered.

Quem non mille acies, quem non potuere phalanges
Sternere, privata Galeaz dux Sfortia dextra
Concidit, atque illum minime juvere cadentem
Aſtantes famuli, nec opes, nec regna, nec urbes.
Hinc patet humanis quæ ſit fiducia rebus,
Et patet hinc ſævo tutum nil eſſe tyranno (10).

i. e. "Galeazzo Sforza, whom the moſt numerous armies could not conquer, fell by my own hand. "Nor could the ſervants who ſurrounded him, nor "his riches, nor his eſtates, nor his Cities ſave him. "Hence it appears, how little the affairs of this "world are to be depended upon; hence it appears, "that nothing can ſecure the life of a cruel tyrant."

[C] . . . As for Charles Viſconti, he had two powerful motives to ingage in that conſpiracy.] In the firſt place he was exaſperated againſt the Sforza's for uſurping the ſovereign power to the prejudice of his own family. II. He had a ſiſter, whom Galeazzo had debauched, and whom he afterwards yielded to the luſt of a beautiful young man, who was his Ganymede. Germanæ ſororis probro quam Galeacius adamaret, atque ſubigeret, permovebatur: tanto indignantius quod eam decoro adoleſcenti, qui ætatis florem principi fruendum dediſſet, conciliaſſe & communicaſſe ſuſpicaretur (11). This Prince was reckoned to be ſo laſcivious that men talked not only of his amorous intrigues, but even of his pimping. Principem enim in amore improbum atque adeo impudentem plerique vel falſo exiſtimabant, ut alienæ libidini lenocinii obſequium lubens præbere crederetur. i. e. "Moſt people, though "perhaps unjuſtly, thought this Prince ſo wicked in "his amours, and ſo impudent, that it was imagi-"ned, he was even willing to pimp for other peo-"ple (12)." We have here an inſtance of the woman's compliance. Francis Viſconti's ſiſter did not only favour this Duke of Milan with the uſe of her body, but was even ready to gratify the paſſions of his catamite, whenever he pleaſed. I ſuppoſe it was not with a great reluctancy that ſhe gave him this proof of her complaiſance, ſince it was in favour of a beautiful young man.

"On the courage of John Andrew Lamponiano "the tyrant-killer." Here follow the ſix firſt lines of that Poem.

We ought not to wonder at Peter Crinitus's commending this murtherer. For amongſt the ſacred poems of Levinus Torrentius Biſhop of Antwerp there is an hymn (15) in praiſe of Baltazar Gerard (16, in which amongſt other elogies is the following encomium.

(15) Hymnus in laudem Baltaſaris Gerardi fortiſſimi tyrannicidæ.

(16) He murthered the Prince of Orange in the year 1584.

Reddis ovans animam parenti.

i. e. "As death muſt introduce you into the aſ-"ſembly of the ſaints in heaven, you return with "joy your untainted ſoul to your eternal Father."

[F] The Ladies of his Court took a pride in their amorous intrigues.] The deſcription which Paul Jovius left us of the corrupt morals of the women of that country is ſhocking. They imagined that chaſtity was inconſiſtent with good manners; they thought that to practiſe that virtue was not to know the world, it was, according to them, to behave like country girls. In a word, they did not think, that to lie with a Prince was doing any thing inconſiſtent with modeſty; they pretended that the beſt method to raiſe the condition of their huſbands above that of other men, was to make them wear golden horns. Galeazzo, who was an handſome, young and vigorous man, found his account in this. Paul Jovius's words are infinitely more expreſſive than mine, I ſhall therefore tranſcribe them in this place: His artibus quum boni ſplendidiſſimique principis nomen tueretur, premebant ejus famam intemperantes vagæque libidines. Nam ea tum erat ex multo otio luxuriantis ſeculi conditio, in ipſis præcipuè nobilioris matronis, ut totum pudicitiæ decus ab humanitate aulæ alienum prorſus & ſubagreſte putaretur, ideoque princeps ad licentiam libidinis proclinatus, & juventæ vigore venuſtateque oris ſupra omnes ſpectatu digniſſimus, procacibus fœminarum oculis & deſideriis cupidiſſimè deſerviret. Erat enim tum vulgatum inter fœminas, nullam ex principis concubitu fieri impudicam, earumque maritos qui ineptis hirci videri poſſent, ita excellere aureis cornibus, ut dignitate cunctos anteirent (17). This is a corruption of manners carried to the utmoſt exceſs. for if any thing can prevent chaſtity from being quite baniſhed, it is that the oppoſite vice carries with it a notion of ſhame and diſgrace with regard to the women (18). This is the chief bar which God's Providence made uſe of to ſtop a little the progreſs of laſciviouſneſs, and prevent its overflowing all mankind after the manner of the flood, which ſpared but very few perſons.

[A] It is one of the ten cities . . . which pretended to hold immediately of the Empire.] Monſieur Heiſs will explain this to us. Hagenau, ſays he (1), "is the "firſt of the cities of Alſace dependent on the Pre-"fecture, of which the Court of Judicature was "ſettled in the ſame city. After the peace of Munſter, "the French King, after the example of his prede-"ceſſors the Landgraves of Alſace, continued to keep "that Provincial Council there, at which his Grand "Bailif or Lieutenant preſided. But as that city has "been entirely ruined in the laſt war, the Moſt "Chriſtian King removed that Council to Briſac. "That city, as well as the other nine, acknowledged "at that time the King for their Protector, on the "ſame terms upon which they had acknowledged the "Emperor and Princes of Auſtria as ſuch, without re-"nouncing their right of holding immediately of "the Empire. But as they have been convinced of "the French King's right to a ſovereignty over them, "they have given up that pretenſion of holding im-"mediately of the Empire, and have ſubmitted en-"tirely to his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty. The other "nine cities are Colmar, Schleſtat, Weiſſembourg, Lan-"dau, Oberkheim, Kaiſerberg, Munſter in the valley "of St. Gregory, Roſheim, and Turcheim." Theſe cities had not yet ſubmitted to the yoke in the year 1673; far from it; do but read the the following words of the Duke of Navailles. As I deſigned to go to "Briſac, I took Colmar in my way. I found that "the Inhabitants there, though in the neighbourhood "of ſo ſtrong a city as Briſac, affected a great inde-"pendency. Their city was ſtored with all ſorts of "ammunition and proviſions, and they ſeemed to be ve-"ry little inclined to receive and obey the King's com-"mands. They took not the leaſt care to ſhew me that "reſpect which they ought to have for perſons to whom "the King commits his authority. There were be-"ſides in that country Schleſtadt, Hagenau, and four "other ſmall Imperial towns: they were all very "much united together, and had at all times their "Deputies at the Diet of the Empire, and were con-"tinually endeavouring to take ſuch liberties as were "contrary to the allegiance they owed the King. "When I was arrived at Briſac, theſe ſeven cities, "which pretended to be Imperial, ſent Deputies to "me. Thoſe of Colmar were at the head of the "Deputation, and ſpoke for the reſt. They ha-"rangued me after the ſame manner as they had "done my predeceſſors. It ſeemed to me that they "uſed ſome expreſſions, which did not ſufficiently ſhew "the ſubmiſſion they owed the King, ſtiling him only "their Protector: I anſwered them, that he had a "more conſiderable title with regard to them, that he "was their guardian, and that it was his right to rule "and govern them. I ſpoke ſo ſtoutly to them, that "the Intendant, who was preſent, told me before their "faces, Sir, if your predeceſſors had taught them "their duty as you do, the King would have had more "power in this country, and theſe Gentlemen would "not ſpend ſo much money in keeping Deputies at "the Diet. Theſe Deputies were very much amazed, "and fell on their knees before me. I thought it "was proper to mortify them a little, and therefore I "ſent the next day five hundred horſe to take away "ſome cattle at the very gates of their cities. This "opened their eyes, and ſhewed them how much they "were miſtaken in pretending to be independent of "France. They came a ſecond time to ſpeak to me, "but I would not give them audience, and ſent them "word that I was obliged to go to Philipſburg (2)." He told the King ſoon after, that there was a favourable opportunity to bring Colmar, and the other cities that pretended to be Imperial, to that condition, in which they ought to be (3). The King ſoon followed that advice; for he went into Alſace, and ſecured Colmar and Schleſtadt (4). The other cities ſurrendered alſo to him on a bare ſummons, upon this pretence, that the King as Grand Bailiff of Hagenau had a right to thoſe except in civil and criminal matters, which are brought before the Provoſt of Hagenau (b). They were yielded to France by the treaty of peace concluded at Munſter, with this condition, that they ſhould belong to the French King after the ſame manner as they had belonged to the Emperor; but this reſtriction wore inſenſibly out of date (c). It has been obſerved by ſome writer, that the Citizens of Landaw had not been cavillers, and that they kept their City in a flouriſhing condition, at a time when the others were plundered (d). This ſignifies, I think, that during the long war, which ended by the peace of Munſter, and at other times like that, they were not obſtinately reſolved unſeaſonably to reſiſt the ſtrongeſt party. They gave an inſtance of this ſubmiſſive temper in the year 1634, as may be ſeen in Puyſegur's Memoirs (e). Another writer (f) obſerves, that they have not been ſubject to domeſtic broils, and that they endeavoured conſtantly not to exaſperate the neighbouring Princes in words or deeds, and that in the year 1552 the troops of Henry II King of France, and thoſe of Albert of Brandenburg did them a great deal of damage. The Sieur du Val aſſerts that the wine of Landaw is the beſt Rheniſh wine that can be drunk (g). This city was but indifferently ſtrong at the time of the peace of Ryſwick in the year 1697, but it has been fortified ſince with all the care imaginable: the famous Monſieur du Vauban exerted all his ſkill in it. The Imperialiſts, under the command of Prince Lewis of Baden blockaded it in April 1702, and opened the trenches the 17th of June following. The city was ſurrendered to them by a capitulation September the 10th. The King of the Romans arrived at the camp July the 17th [B]. thoſe cities, and had ſecured them to prevent the Imperialiſts from taking an advantage of two ſuch conſiderable places as theſe two cities were (5).

I remember that men reaſoned very much on the ſurrendering theſe cities, and that ſome perſons maintained, it was a folly to pretend that they could preſerve their liberties. It was not impoſſible for them, added they, to be at once in the form of a commonwealth, and under the guardianſhip of the Landgrave of Alſace as long as this Landgrave was a German. But as ſoon as a King of France became Landgrave of Alſace, theſe cities muſt of neceſſity fall ſooner or later under his abſolute ſovereignty. This was agreeable to the conſtant order of political affairs, and the natural courſe of human things. There was a kind of inconſiſtency between the nature of a free city, and a city which acknowledged for its Protector or Guardian, a King, who might be at war with the Emperor and with the Empire. Have clients a right to declare againſt their patrons? If they cannot do it lawfully, the Prefecture of Hagenau muſt ſide with France in ſuch wars. Or if it could not do it juſtly, being a member of the Empire, it muſt either declare againſt France, or aſk to ſtand neuter. In the former caſe the King of France had as much right to conquer Colmar, and the other Imperial cities of Alſace, as he had to take the four foreſt-towns. In the latter caſe, it was to be examined, whether the cities of the Prefecture of Hagenau did really deſire to ſtand neuter, or whether they only pretended it with a deſign to ſecure themſelves till ſuch time as they could ſurrender to the Emperor's troops. If they demanded a neutrality with ſuch a view only, they were to expect to be treated as a ſecret enemy, to whom it is not prudent to give time to ſhew his ill deſigns. But in caſe they had ſincerely deſired to ſtand neuter, it was ſtill to be examined whether they could defend themſelves againſt the German troops, that would have forced them to admit garriſons. It is plain that they were not ſtrong enough to maintain themſelves in a ſtate of neutrality. It was therefore but proper that France ſhould not ſuffer the Germans to have arſenals and ſtore-houſes there, eſpecially conſidering that the Spaniards were maſters of the French-Comté. The Protector and Guardian was under a neceſſity to proſecute his right, that his pupils might not declare againſt him. If as a Protector and Guardian he was under an obligation to defend thoſe cities of Alſace againſt any enemy, who might do them ſome injury, he had alſo a right to prevent them from taking up arms againſt him. How abſurd would it be, if a Monarch was obliged to protect a State, which ſhould think it his duty to declare war againſt him? This is inconſiſtent with reciprocal obligations; and conſequently they who gave up the Imperial cities of Alſace to the protection of France, did thereby unavoidably give room to abſolute dominion. It began even then to be ſpread abroad that it is impoſſible a city ſhould continue to be Imperial and be at the ſame time under the protection of France; and if the Emperor had made arſenals and ſtore-houſes of Colmar and Schleſtadt, to make afterwards an inroad from thence into France as far as Dijon and Lyons, the French had not been commended for ſuffering thoſe cities to enjoy their privileges; but they would have been ridiculed for their imprudence and ſimplicity.

Men argued almoſt after the ſame manner, when the French ſeized upon Straſburg, a city which never would or could ſtand neuter, and which had yielded its bridge to the German armies toties quoties whenever it was demanded. This nettled the French too much to ſuffer it long. Either Straſburg muſt have ſincerely deſired a neutrality, and kept it faithfully, or that city muſt have been in a condition to reſiſt thoſe that ſhould attempt to force it to take part with them. Now neither of theſe two things was true, ſaid theſe reaſoners. I believe that they who teach the law of nations in the Univerſities, could have refuted them very eaſily.

[B] The King of the Romans arived at the camp July the 27th.] The News-writers of his Party have aſſerted, that Count de Melac Governor of Landaw ſent him the ſame Day a trumpeter, to pay his reſpects to him, and to deſire him to let him know, where he would fix his Quarters, that the Garriſon might not ſhoot that way. But the undaunted Monarch having given him thanks for his civility, ſent him word at the ſame time, that he might order the garriſon to ſhoot which way he pleaſed; for that his quarters were every where (6). An officer of the garriſon relates this piece of news thus (7). "Monſieur de Melac ſent a trumpeter "July the 31ſt, at eight a clock in the morning to "the Enemy's camp ... to aſk the Prince of Baden "where the King's quarters were. The prince gave "the King of the Romans notice of it, who anſwered, "That his quarters were at Inphling, that he thank-"ed him for the ſword which he ſent back to "him (8), and that he might ſhoot every where, "ſerving his King as he had done till then." It is certain that Monſieur de Melac did only what has been long ſince practiſed with regard to Monarchs, who are preſent at a Siege. The beſieged Governor pays them that compliment. As for the King of the Romans's anſwer, we have two obſervations to make here; the one is, that the accounts of the two parties do not differ in the main; the ſecond, that ſuch an anſwer being always noble, it is ſo chiefly the firſt time it is made. For when a King knows that another made it, he thinks himſelf in honour bound to imitate him, and even to go beyond him, if it be poſſible. It is no longer a matter of choice, but a kind of neceſſity. I have heard ſome perſons ſay, that the late King William III. made that anſwer, when portunity to offer ſome remarks [C], without hoping however that they will be any ways ſerviceable to them, nor proper to cure that deceitful credulity, which they know ſo well how to inſpire their readers with. They could not fail to reflect on the long time which this when the Governor of a place beſieged ſent him the ſame compliment: but I know perfectly well that he never beſieged any place, of which the Governor owned his Title of King: and after all, he would not be the firſt Author of that anſwer; for not to mention thoſe, who may have uſed it before the year 1667, there is a proof in print that it was made that year at the ſiege of Liſle in Flanders. Read the following paſſage. As ſoon as Count de Brouay Governor of the place had notice that his Majeſty (9) was arrived at the camp, he judged that there was no longer room to think the ſiege was only a feint, and made the Citizens of Liſle take the oath of Allegiance, and about ten thouſand of them ſwore that they would all periſh ſooner than ſurrender. He ſent afterwards a compliment to his Majeſty, deſiring him to chooſe any of the moſt beautiful houſes at a league's diſtance from Liſle, and offering him all that he might have occaſion for from the City during the ſiege; he alſo aſked him where he would fix his quarters, that he might give orders not to fire that way. But he added, that he deſired his Majeſty not to take it amiſs, if he defended the place with the utmoſt vigour, for the ſervice of his maſter the Catholick King. His Majeſty having given Count de Brouay thanks for his compliment, ſent him no other anſwer, but that his quarters were throughout his whole camp, and that the more the Governor's defence was ſtout and obſtinate to prevent this conqueſt, the more glorious would the ſucceſs of it be to his Majeſty (10).

The King of the Romans gained a great reputation during this long ſiege; this firſt campaign was very glorious to him. Monſieur de Melac, who ſaw him the eleventh of September, was very much honoured and commended by him (11). He ſupped the ſame day with Prince Lewis of Baden, who loaded him with kindneſs, and told him that it was imagined in the Imperial Army, that he correſponded with Spirits (12); to which Monſieur de Melac replied, that "the Prince correſponded with them as much "as he, but that that correſpondence was better than "his, ſince the Spirits had ſerved the Prince better "than they ſerved him (13)."

[C] What the News-writers publiſhed concerning this ſiege, will give us an opportunity to offer ſome remarks.] Thoſe of France aſſerted continually, that it did not in the leaſt go forward, that the garriſon repulſed all the aſſaults, and killed a numberleſs multitude of Germans. The News-writers on the other ſide aſſerted on the contrary, that the beſiegers carried without much difficulty every thing they attacked, that the Imperialiſts loſt very few men, that the mines of the beſieged were always countermined; or if they were not, the enemy ſet fire to them ſo untimely, that they cauſed no damage at all. The Author of the Mercure Galant argued very much about the conſequences, with which the conqueſt of that place might be attended. He pretended that it coſt the Emperor at leaſt five or ſix millions (14), and that the number of ſoldiers who periſhed before Landaw amounted at leaſt to fifteen thouſand men (15). I believe, adds he, that if I were to calculate the loſs, which the Germans themſelves confeſs in the Journals they are uſed to publiſh, I ſhould find it amount to a much greater number, though theſe Journals do not contain a faithful account. I do not know what Journals of the Germans he means, but I can hardly believe that he ever ſaw any others, but thoſe which they ſent to the News-writers in Holland, and which are printed in the Lettres Hiſtoriques and in the Mercure Politique of the Hague. Now it does not appear from theſe Journals that the Germans had above 800 men killed from the beginning of the ſiege till the beginning of September. We have not ſeen in thoſe books a particular account of what happened the following Days; but we may judge that it could not mention but about forty men killed. The number of the wounded is incomparably greater, according to the ſame Journals; and yet ſince the Capitulation it has been aſſerted in ſome Dutch news-papers, that the number of the wounded was but double the number of thoſe who were killed. The latter amounted to ſeven hundred or a few more, and the former (moſt of whom were recovered) to fourteen hundred or a few more. It is not an eaſy matter to reconcile this with what had been aſſerted in the ſame news-papers, that for want of Infantry the Germans had been obliged to make uſe of the Dragoons, and that as moſt of them, who were wounded, died, they were perſuaded that the beſieged made uſe of a particular kind of bullets; but the queſtion is not here, how the News-writers may be made conſiſtent with themſelves; the thing would be almoſt as difficult as to reconcile together the News-writers of two different parties. The queſtion is only, whether or not the great loſs mentioned by Monſieur de Vizé be acknowledged in the Journals publiſhed by the beſiegers. Let us obſerve by the by, that a priſoner, taken by the garriſon of Landaw July the 31ſt, aſſerted that the Germans had loſt very near two thouſand five hundred men, and that it was a general opinion amongſt them, that the bullets of the beſieged were all poiſoned becauſe none of thoſe who had been wounded, recovered (16). The other news which he told are ſo falſe, that one ought to give but little credit to his teſtimony with regard to the loſs of the Germans.

Monſieur le Noble aſſerts, that they loſt at this ſiege 4 Princes, 286 officers, and twelve thouſand Soldiers, or thereabout (17). I believe that with regard to the four Princes, he has been miſled by the following paſſage. "The young Prince of Bareith "died the firſt of this month, of the wound he re-"ceived before Landaw at the attack which was "made in the night between the 16th and 17th of "Auguſt. This is the fourth Prince, whom the war "has carried off in a very little time; and I am "to acquaint you with the death of them all in this "ſingle month (18)." If Moſieur le Noble had been a little more attentive, he would eaſily have known that the four Princes, mentioned here, are the Duke of Holſtein, the Prince of Commerci, the Count of Soiſſons, and the Prince of Bareith. But the firſt of them loſt his life in Poland, and the ſecond in Italy; and the fourth recovered of his wounds, as Mon. le Noble might have learnt from the retractation of the very Author, whom I ſuppoſe he had miſunderſtood (19). Judge whether a writer, who commits ſuch a groſs blunder with regard to the number of Princes killed at a ſiege, deſerves to be credited in what he aſſerts concerning the number of the officers and ſoldiers who periſhed at that ſiege.

One cannot ſufficiently wonder at the ignorance which the Authors of the Paris Gazette and of the Mercure Galant betrayed with regard to the condition of the ſiege (20.) They who credited their accounts would have ſworn that the affairs of the beſiegers were not more forward in the beginning of September, than they had been in the beginning of July, and that they were even in a worſe condition by that terrible ſlaughter, which the beſieged had made the 25th, 26th and 27th of Auguſt, by repelling the aſſaults of the Germans. Theſe three aſſaults are chimerical. We meet with the following words in a Mercure Galant dated Auguſt the 14th (21). It is very ſtrange, that after a ſiege that has already laſted two months and an half, a large army ſhould not yet have taken any of the outworks of Landaw. This Author might ſtill have ſpoke thus a month after, if he had argued from his own accounts, and of thoſe of the Paris Gazette, in which no progreſs of the beſieged had been taken notice of ſince the 14th of Auguſt mentioned above. But what is more ſurprizing ſtill, is, that the Author of the Paris Gazette continued to talk after the ſame rate the 16th of September, on which day it was known at Paris that Landaw had ſurrendered; ſo that this Writer prepared his reader infinitely more for hearing that the ſiege was raiſed, than for the news of the place having capitulated. It may be aſked hereupon, did theſe publick News-writers know how things went before Landaw, or did they not know it? If they imagined things were as they publiſhed them, their ignorance was very groſs and inexcuſable; for in the very beginning of September there were private perſons in the remote provinces, who

who knew very well that Landaw could not hold out at moſt till the tenth of the ſame month. There were Letters from them in Holland, in which this piece of news was poſitively told. Would it not be a ſhame for a publick News-writer to be more unacquainted with the condition of a ſiege than a mere merchant in a remote province? Would it not be a kind of diſgrace for them to know nothing but from the accounts of deſerters, men who endeavour only to make themſelves acceptable by telling pleaſing falſities, that they may be well received? If theſe News-writers were acquainted with all that paſſed at Landaw, their diſhoneſty is prodigious and abſolutely inexcuſable. Why did they thus miſrepreſent things? Were they afraid leſt a true account might raiſe a rebellion? This fear, which might perhaps be well grounded in other countries, would be ridiculous in that in which they wrote. One does not know therefore how to account for the perplexity in which theſe writers intangle themſelves, by the neceſſity they are under to find out ſome method to unravel the whole myſtery, when at laſt they muſt come to tell the unexpected news of a capitulation. They had been loaded with ſuch heavy cenſures (22) on account of the taking of Namur in the year 1695, that it is a wonder this did not render them more cautious. I imagine that the ſiege of important places will always be a dangerous ſtumbling block in the News-writers ways (23): I wiſh they would conſider ſeriouſly that the taking of a Town is not liable to hiſtorical Pyrrhoniſm, as the gaining of a battle is (24); and that it is therefore much better to prepare the readers by degrees to hear the news of the taking of a city, than to ſurprize them at once with it, when they expect it the leaſt. The indignation they have at being impoſed upon exaſperates their grief occaſioned by a capitulation told ſuddenly, and which diſappoints all the hopes they had conceived. I do not mention the outrageous railleries to which News-writers expoſe themſelves, when they are at laſt forced to confeſs the ſurrender of a place, before which they had ſuppoſed that the enemies ſpent their time in vain, without ſuffering them to make the leaſt progreſs. They expoſe themſelves to be ridiculed by the News-writers of the oppoſite party (25).

Here follows another particular, which is very ſurpriſing. They did not know at the Elector of Bavaria's Court, what paſſed before Landaw, and this gives us room to think that Monſieur de Catinat was not better acquainted with it. The garriſon beat a parley September the 9th (26), it was reduced to the laſt extremities, and even ſo ſoon as the 4th of September the Governor had repreſented to the council of war that it was high time to capitulate (27). It is aſſerted (28) that about the 22d of Auguſt he had ſent a man (29), to Marſhal de Catinat, to give him notice that he could not hold out above a week. And yet the French Envoy at the Duke of Bavaria's court imagined September the 9th, that the ſeizing upon the city of Ulm would oblige the enemy to raiſe the ſiege of Landaw. His Electoral Highneſs, this the Envoy wrote that very day (30), does not queſtion but this will make the enemy give up the ſiege of Landaw .... when his Troops will be joyned with thoſe of France, we ſhall cut out ſo much and ſuch dangerous work for the King of the Romans and for Prince Lewis of Baden in thoſe countries, that they will not think Landaw a place important enough, to detain them on the other ſide of the Rhine. The Elector of Bavaria wrote to the King of France, " that a perſon whom he had ſent " to the Imperial camp before Landaw, brought him " word, that this city could hold out a fortnight longer, " ſo that it would ſtill be time enough to relieve it, " after Ulm was taken by ſurprize (31)." If theſe words may ſerve either to comfort or excuſe the News-writers of Paris, I am glad that I have quoted them.

Some of them, who had been impoſed upon by the fabulous accounts that were ſent from Alſace, have themſelves undeceived the publick they had miſled: for here follows what we meet with in a work of the Author of the Mercure Galant. " As for the chi- " merical ſtories which have been ſpread abroad of " the pretended ſallies of the garriſon, in which it " was aſſerted that we (the French) had killed two " or three thouſand men, and of the deſperate aſſaults " made by the beſiegers with thouſands of men, in " which aſſaults their loſs was ſuppoſed to have been " no leſs conſiderable; there has not been any ſuch " action. The garriſon was not ſtrong enough to " make ſuch ſallies, and the enemy had not made " breaches ſufficient to venture ſuch aſſaults. So that " the very condition which things were in at that " time, is a full anſwer to thoſe who have told theſe " news, and who gave credit to them, only becauſe " they were of too eaſy a belief. We do not meet " with any action that might be ſtiled a battle, in the " Journal you have been reading (32)."

Let us cloſe this remark with another paſſage from the ſame Author (33). " It is unqueſtionably certain, " that there will be no peace concluded, but the " Emperor will be obliged to ſurrender this place (34), " in caſe it be not taken again before that time. " Whenever the King (of France) was pleaſed to " conſent to a peace, this Prince, for the ſecurity of " the ſame peace, ſurrendered all the places he had " beyond the Rhine, and it was agreed at the ſame " time that he ſhould keep all the places he was in " poſſeſſion of on this ſide of the Rhine, and this " has been followed as a rule, becauſe the Rhine is a " kind of a Barrier." I wonder that the Author who ſpeaks thus, did not know, that by the peace of Nimeguen the French kept Briſac and Friburg, two very important places beyond the Rhine. I might add that by the Peace of Munſter they were ſuffered to keep Philipſburg as well as Briſac. Where then is that rule, which is here mentioned to us?

[D] The News-writers could not fail to reflect, on the long time which the ſiege of Landaw laſted.] Let me only tranſcribe the words of a man, who has a great deal of wit; he will furniſh me not only with a commentary on my text, but alſo with proper additions to the foregoing remark. " This ſiege is ſo forward " that we expect daily the news of a capitulation; " the French reproach us with the ſlowneſs of this " conqueſt, but I am apt to think it is a diſgrace to " them rather than to us. His Highneſs of Baden " judged prudently, that he was to ſpare his men. " With this judicious precaution this wiſe prince never " followed that deſperate and killing method, which " makes ſo many brave ſoldiers periſh, and by which " all the choiceſt men of an army are ſometimes loſt. " When Landaw is ſurrendered, the army on the Up- " per-Rhine will not have ſuffered any extraordinary " fatigue, and will come out of their trenches, as it " were from a camp, ſtill freſh, and in a condition " to go upon a new expedition. But ſince his High- " neſs of Baden did not carry on his enterprize with " vigour, it follows from thence that he gave the " enemies all the time they could want to relieve the " place. Why then did they not ſtir? Does it not " ſeem as though the Prince of Baden acted with " ſlowneſs, and without much diligence, on purpoſe " to expoſe the weakneſs of France? Was not that " General's wary conduct, and ſlowneſs, a kind of " challenge, by which he defied the French to pre- " vent him from accompliſhing his deſign? It were " to be wiſhed for Monſieur de Catinat's reputation, " or rather for his maſter's, that the city had been " taken in a few days. The ſiege lingers, and yet " the Marſhal, who was to attempt to relieve the " place, or to give the enemy a diverſion, re- " moves farther back, and entrenches himſelf, as " though the noiſe of the beſieger's guns diſcouraged " him, and he ſuffers the town to be taken without " offering to ſtrike a blow .... The French are very " far from confeſſing that this long duration of the " ſiege of Landaw is owing to the moderation " and prudence of the Prince of Baden. As they " are uſed to value themſelves upon every thing, and " to make their very loſſes ſubſervient to the in- " creaſe of their glory, they pretend that this delay " was occaſioned only by the ſtout and vigorous de- " fence of the beſieged. If you will credit their " Journaliſt, the beſiegers fall before Landaw like " the leaves of a tree ſhaken by an high wind " towards

Thus this man of wit reaſons in his Nouvelles for the month of Auguſt 1702: let us tranſcribe alſo what he offered to the publick the next month.

" The city of Landaw has at laſt changed its " maſter (36) .... A bad omen this, with regard " to its conſequences. And indeed they have taken " all poſſible precautions in France to deceive the " people, and to make it be believed that this misfortune " would never happen. Never was the forgery of the " news-mongers more worked at than on account " of the ſiege of Landaw. If all that has been pub- " liſhed of the beſiegers were true, there would be " nothing left of their army but broken remnants, " and nothing could ſurprize us more than the ſur- " render of that city. The Imperialiſts expoſed them- " ſelves to be knocked down without carrying any " of the works; or if they were ſo lucky as to " take one, they were driven from it very ſoon. " Theſe falſities are not very honourable at preſent, " either to Monſieur de Melac, or to his garriſon. " How came this brave Governor to ſpoil at once his " brave defence? What panic fear ſeized upon him " and ſeduced him? Ought he not to have crowned " his courage, and wearied the patience of the Ger- " mans? A good commander never capitulates but in " order to prevent a general ſtorming of the place; " and it is pretended that the beſieged had hardly " loſt one man. Now the city is taken, with what " ſeaſoning ſhall this pill be ſweetned, that the peo- " ple may the leſs taſt the bitterneſs of it (37)? ... " Let us not imagine, that though the French ſuf- " fered Landaw to be taken without offering to pre- " vent it, this leſſens in the leaſt the glory of this " conqueſt. It can hardly be denied but the beſieged " made a very ſtout reſiſtance; the long time the " ſiege laſted is a proof of it. Nay, if we may be- " lieve the French, they ſurrender'd only becauſe the " garriſon was too much weakened. His moſt Chri- " ſtian Majeſty is ſuppoſed to have ſaid, that if " Monſieur de Melac could have been ſupplied with " only fifteen hundred men, the place had been ſafe. " A ſad comfort this, which only exaſperates the " wound! But how can this be reconciled with the " pretended good fortune of the beſieged in loſing but " very few men in every aſſault? The garriſon muſt " then have been very ſmall at firſt; which would " be an unpardonable neglect with regard to a fortreſs " of ſo great importance. Let us compromiſe the " matter; the vigour has been reciprocal: if the " Imperialiſts have aſſaulted the town with a great " deal of courage and reſolution, the French have " not anſwered them with leſs bravery and ſtoutneſs; " this circumſtance however muſt be obſerved, that as " the Prince of Baden wiſely reſolved to ſpare his " troops; he went on ſtep by ſtep, being ſure to " conquer, and bidding defiance to all oppoſi- " tions (38)."

Let us make ſome remarks upon this author's ingenious reflections, and let us obſerve in the firſt place, that conſidering the ſituation of affairs then, it had been much more for the common good of his Imperial Majeſty and of his allies, that the city of Landaw had been taken after a ſiege of three weeks only. Prince Lewis of Baden might then have undertaken any expedition, if the French had not been in a condition to diſappoint his deſigns; whereas the long time which this ſiege continued gave them an opportunity to take ſuch meaſures, as made thoſe of the Imperialiſts miſcarry, ſo that Prince Lewis of Baden could do nothing after the ſurrendering of Landaw. The only hope of France was that the enemy ſhould ſpend a long time in this ſiege; the Governor of the place received a letter from Monſieur de Catinat Auguſt the 10th, in which he was ordered to hold out as long as was poſſible, that the enemy might not go upon any other expedition during the remainder of the campaign; and that this would be the greateſt ſervice he could do the King (39). So that the loſs of a greater number of ſoldiers and Officers, which the beſiegers might have ſuſtained, by preſſing their attacks more vigorouſly, had been abundantly made up by the other deſigns, which they might have performed before the end of the campaign.

I obſerve in the ſecond place, that our News-writer's thought is very well grounded, when he tells us that it would have been a diſgrace for Monſieur de Melac to have behaved himſelf as he is reported to have done in the accounts publiſhed in France. This Governor would have imitated thoſe Poets, who do wonders in the four firſt acts of a Tragedy, but ſucceed very ill in the fifth, in which good Poets chiefly exert the whole ſtrength of their genius, and for which they keep their moſt noble expreſſions and exalted thoughts (40). It cannot but be denied that all the world was extremely ſurpriſed at the concluſion of this ſiege: even they, who were of the beſieger's party, imagined that it would be very bloody, and that the laſt ſtorm would prove fatal to a great many brave Officers. Whereas they heard that it proved the moſt eaſy thing in the world, ſo that men did not know what to think of it, nor how this would be at laſt accounted for. The News-writers related ſeveral things, which are not worth mentioning. The moſt probable account I have heard is, that the garriſon was too weak to venture to ſtand the laſt aſſault. We find in the Diary of that ſiege, that as early as the 4th of September Monſieur de Melac repreſented, that there were a great many brave men in the garriſon, which it was the King's intereſt to ſave; that they were in want of the moſt neceſſary things, as money, remedies, and proviſions; that it was ſix days ſince they had had nothing but horſe-fleſh to make broth for the ſick, and that beſides this their ammunition had failed them (41). It is related in the ſame Diary (42), that when the enemies made the laſt aſſault, the beſieged were retired into the half-moon over the bridge of communication; which is the reaſon why the enemies met with very little reſiſtance.

(42) Ibid. pag. 238.

IIIdly, Let us conſider theſe words. The garriſon muſt then have been very ſmall at firſt; which would be an unpardonable neglect with regard to a fortreſs of ſo great importance (43). As ſoon as it was known that the place was ſurrounded with troops, the News-writers in Holland publiſhed, in emulation of one another, that the garriſon was very ſmall, and wanted a great many neceſſaries. I know ſome perſons who blamed theſe News-writers, for thus leſſening the glory of Prince Lewis of Baden. They will make amends for it at a proper time and place, anſwered other perſons; do not trouble yourſelf about it. For when the town ſhall have ſurrendered, they will be ſure to publiſh a long catalogue of the ammunition and proviſions, which the Imperialiſts will be ſuppoſed to have found there. They will not fail to tell you alſo, that the garriſon was very numerous at firſt, but that moſt part of it periſhed by the fire and ſword of the Germans, by deſertion, by diſtempers, &c. It is not yet time to confeſs, that this town is well provided with every thing; the only buſineſs at preſent is to make the reader hope it will be ſoon taken.

(43) Nouvelles des Cours de l'Europe, for Sept. 1702, pag. 318.

I have wondered at the ſilence of the Officer, who drew up the Journal or Diary of this famous ſiege. He ought to have told us of how many men the garriſon conſiſted, when the place was firſt inveſted; but he does not ſay one word of it. They who find every thing myſterious, pretend that out of court-flattery he choſe rather to leſſen the reputation of the garriſon, than to reflect in the leaſt on the King's prudence. If he had told us that the place was not well ſtored with the neceſſary ammunition and proviſions, nor provided with a ſufficient garriſon, he would have charged the King his maſter with a prodigious negligence, and greatly extolled the long reſiſtance of the beſieged. Now it was much better that the latter ſhould loſe a part of the glory they deſerved, than that their common Prince ſhould be blamed. This, ſay ſome perſons, was the true reaſon of that Officer's ſilence. Others obſerve that there was a method to do juſtice ſhould be maintained in the exerciſe of their Religions, and that the Roman Catholic and Apoſtolic Religion ſhould be preſerved uncorrupted [E].

to both; namely by obſerving on the one hand, the garriſon and ammunition were far from being ſufficient, and on the other, that the King might judge without imprudence that they were ſufficient, ſince he had reaſons to think that the Elector of Bavaria would declare againſt the Imperialiſts ſoon enough to make their deſign of taking Landaw miſcarry, and ſuch reaſons as were proper to ſatisfy all prudent politicians.

I have read in a News-writer, that when the garriſon of Landaw left that place, it was two thouſand and two hundred men ſtrong, and that the French report they loſt but 412 ſoldiers at that ſiege (44). If this be true, it conſiſted at firſt but of 2612 men, which is a number much too ſmall for the defence of ſuch a fortreſs.

(44) Lettres Hiſtoriques, for October 1702, pag. 432.

Let us not omit the following obſervation of a News-writer at Paris (45). The beſiegers "had ſtill "a great way to go, and many aſſaults to make, and "they would have had much more ſtill, and had loſt a "much greater number of men, than they have "done... had it not been for the treachery of an engi- "neer, who went into their camp, and diſcovered ſeveral "mines to them. Thus this engineer's perfidiouſneſs, "together with the want of a great many neceſſaries, "are the reaſons why the Germans made themſelves "maſters of that place." The News-writers in Holland acknowledged, that the engineer, who deſerted from the garriſon, did the Imperialiſts a great deal of ſervice (46); but, what they add ſeems to be groundleſs, namely that "he was ſurpriſed on his return "into the city, after he had taken an exact view of "the works of the beſiegers. The Prince of Baden "would have him hanged immediately on a tree with- "out any trial; but this engineer having offered to "drain the ditches of the place, and to do other ſer- "vices, if they would ſave his life, General Thun- "gen repreſented that it would be proper to try whe- "ther he could do what he promiſed, and this advice "was approved. The engineer was immediately put "in chains, and they ſent him word by the hang- "man of the army, that in caſe he did not effectually "apply himſelf to perform his promiſes, he ſhould be "hanged at a gallows, which was ſhewed him (47)." It is not in the leaſt probable, that he had any intention to return to Landaw: he knew too well that he ſhould be condemned there to ſuffer the moſt diſgraceful puniſhment. We find in the Diary of the ſiege, that on the 26th of Auguſt, "Monſieur de la Rouſſi- "laire Captain of the Gates was commanded by "Monſieur de Melac to deliver into the hangman's "hands Ladoder's (48) commiſſions, and to ſee the "ſaid Ladoder's picture hung on a gibbet by the "hangman, under which picture was this inſcription, "The unworthy engineer Ladoder, a traitor to his King "and to his country. They likewiſe put up a gibbet "in an half-moon of the fort, where he was alſo hanged "in effigy (49)." Monſieur de Melac was ſo exaſperated againſt him, that when this Governor went to receive Prince Lewis of Baden's hoſtages for the capitulation, he commanded that if Ladoder ſhould appear, they ſhould fire an hundred muſquets at him, notwithſtanding the ceſſation of arms. But the hoſtages told him, that he had been wounded in the arm the day before (50) by a muſquet ball.

The News-writer, who obſerved that the diverſion intended by the ſurpriſing of Ulm did not prevent the King of the Romans from taking Landaw (51), did not remember the dates; for how could the taking of Landaw be retarded or prevented by the ſurpriſing of Ulm, of which the news was not yet known, when Landaw capitulated?

(51) Mercure Hiſt. for Jan. 1703, pag. 6.

[E] The Governor ſtipulated, that the Inhabitants ſhould be maintained in the exerciſe of their religions, and that the Roman Catholic and Apoſtolic Religion ſhould be preſerved uncorrupted.] This article was not granted but with this reſtriction, according to the treaties of Munſter and Ryſwick. The two parts of this article ſeem ſurpriſing, when it is conſidered that the King of France who ſurrenders Landaw, and the Emperor to whom he ſurrenders it, are both of them Princes who have ſhewed great zeal for the extirpation of the Proteſtant religion, and for the propagation of the Roman Catholic. Was it reaſonable to require from ſuch an Emperor, that he ſhould maintain the Roman Catholic religion in that city? Was not this a ſuperfluous care? And farther, muſt his hands be tied up to prevent him from rooting hereſy out of that city? He had a right to do it in a conquered town; for this the laws of war allowed him, unleſs the contrary were ſtipulated and granted by the articles of the capitulation. If his Imperial Majeſty does not labour as effectually to reunite this whole city to the body of the Popiſh Church, as he has done to reunite it to the body of the Empire, will not the King of France be anſwerable for it, who has declared himſelf the Protector of the heretics at Landaw, by procuring a ſolemn promiſe that they ſhould never be diſturbed in the exerciſe of their religion (52)? He hoped, ſay ſome, that the place would be reſtored to him by the next treaty of peace. But do they obſerve, that in order to act conſiſtently with his former conduct, and not to contradict himſelf, he ought to chooſe to recover Landaw, all the citizens being Roman Catholics, rather than to recover it with different religions profeſſed in it? And conſequently he ought to have given the Imperialiſts a full liberty to convert all the heretics by ſuch means as they ſhould think proper. If he thought it his duty not to ſuffer them to enjoy ſuch a liberty, which might have been very prejudicial to the inhabitants who were heretics, in a word, if he deſigned to promote the advantage of thoſe inhabitants, what is become of his zeal to convert? What irregularity, what inconſiſtency would this not be in his conduct? But after all, his fears would have been ſomewhat ſuperfluous; for in the preſent ſituation of things, there is no danger that the Emperor would perſecute the Proteſtants of Landaw; their whole party has laid ſo many obligations on his Imperial Majeſty, and it is ſo much his intereſt to have a great regard for them, that there is not the leaſt reaſon to fear that he would introduce the ſpirit of convertors and perſecutors into the conquered places. One cannot therefore gueſs at the reaſon of this fourth article of the long capitulation preſented to the beſiegers.

(52) The author of the Nouvelles des Cours de l'Europe urges this very artfully in his month of Sept. 1702, pag. 320, 321.

Some perſons, who by pretending to diſcover hidden myſteries, fall into chimerical notions, venture to aſſert, that the Court of France ſtipulated the preſervation of the Roman Catholic religion ſo expreſly, with a deſign to hint that the Catholics of Landaw wanted to have their religion ſecured to them, conſidering they were to be under the government of an Emperor, who was intirely devoted to the Proteſtants. What idle fancies are theſe?

As for the Roman Catholic religion being preſerved uncorrupted, as is demanded by the beſieged, I have not yet met with any perſon who could explain to me what this means. For to pretend that the deſign was to prevent the introduction of Janſeniſm, or on the contrary the introduction of the ſuperſtitious practices, and looſe maxims, with which the Jeſuits and the Monks infect religion, would be indeed a very whimſical notion. Did they then dread ſome kind of Samaritaniſm? Would they provide againſt I know not what mixture of Lutheran or Calviniſtical opinions with the articles determined in the Council of Trent? I underſtand very well that this is chimerical; but I am at a loſs what to determine.

LANDO (HORTENSIO) a Phyſician born at Milan, lived in the ſixteenth Century. He is the author of ſeveral works; and took a delight in publiſhing them under fictitious names. He is thought to be the author of a Dialogue publiſhed under the name of Philalethes, againſt the reputation of Eraſmus. This conjecture, in my opinion, is very very well grounded [A]. He wrote two Dialogues, which have been erroneouſly aſcribed to Cardinal Aleander [B].

[A] This conjecture, in my opinion, is very well grounded] I ſhall perform here a promiſe, which I made in the remark [C] of the article ERASMUS. Here then follows what is contained in the memoirs which I have quoted there. Herold imagined that a phyſician born at Placenza, and named Baſſiano Landi or Lando, concealed himſelf under the name of Philalethes. But for my part I think rather that it is Hortenſio Lando of Milan, who was alſo a Phyſician, and a man of wit. He publiſhed ſeveral works both in Latin and in Italian, in which he always affected to diſguiſe himſelf. He took that ſame name of Philalethes in a dialogue, which he intitled Forcianæ Quæſtiones, in which he examines the manners and genius of ſeveral nations of Italy. It is true that in this laſt dialogue he calls himſelf Philalethes ; Polytopienſis ; whereas in that againſt Eraſmus it is Philalethes Utopienſis, or ex Utopia Civis ; which is ſo far from ſhewing any real difference, that on the contrary it ſhews that the ſame Genius produced both the works. He alſo called himſelf ſometimes Hortenſius Tranquillus, of which Simler the Abbreviator and Continuator of Geſner was not aware, ſince he ſpeaks of Hortenſius Tranquillus, and of Hortenſius Landus as of two different writers. We have a work of Lando intitled Un Commentario delle piu notabili & moſtruoſe coſe d'Italia, i. e. " A treatiſe of the moſt " remarkable and wonderful things in Itala." in 8vo. It is a diverting work: as he did not prefix his name to it, he ſupplied this omiſſion by a ſhort advertiſement, which is at the end, in which he ſays, Godi, lettore, il preſente Commentario nato del coſtantiſſimo cervello di M. O. L. detto per la ſua natural manſuetudine il Tranq. i. e. " Reader, peruſe this " treatiſe, the product of the moſt conſtant brains of " M. O. L. who on account of his natural meekneſs " is ſtiled, Tranq." Who is there but ſees that theſe three letters M. O. L. Signify Meſſer Ortenſio Lando, and Tranq. Tranquillo ? After this there is un Catalogo de gli inventori delle coſe che ſi mangiano, e delle bevande ch'oggidi s'uſano. i. e. " A liſt of the " inventors of ſuch things as are fit to be eaten, " and of the drinkables which are now a days in uſe ;" at the end of which liſt or catalogue are the following capital letters, SUISNETROH SUDNAL ROTUA TSE, each ſeparate word of which being read backwards, but in the ſame order as it ſtands here, you find, HORTENSIUS LANDUS AUTOR EST. Thus at the end of his Paradoſſi (Paradoxes) printed at Venice in 8vo, in the year 1544, SUISNETROH TABEDUL, that is to ſay, HORTENSIUS LUDEBAT. It is therefore very probable that Hortenſio Lando, and not Baſſiano, is the author of the dialogue which Herold anſwered. What confirms me in this opinion is that, Hortenſio deſigning to prove in his paradoxes, that to be a baſtard is no diſgrace, quotes the inſtances of ſeveral men of letters, of Peter Lombard, de Giaſon Maino, of Longolius, of Celio Calcagnini, and of Eraſmus, and of this laſt he ſpeaks thus: O quanti letterati hannoci ancora dati i furtivi abracciamenti &c. hannoci dato un Eraſmo di Roterodamo, e per opra d'un valente Abbate ce lo dettero. i. e. " Oh how many more learned men have theſe " ſecret embraces produced us, &c. They have produced us an Eraſmus of Rotterdam, and as we " are told, by the means of a valiant Abbot."

We muſt not omit a collection of letters, which he publiſhed at Venice apreſſo Gabriel Giolito, in the year 1548, in 12*mo.* It is intitled, Lettere di molte valoroſe donne, nelle quali chiaramente appare non eſſer ne di eloquentiâ ne di dottrina alli huomini inferiori. i. e. " Letters of ſeveral eminent ladies, " from which it appears evidently, that they are " not inferior to the men, either in eloquence or " learning." There is at the end of it a ſhort advertiſement (1) of Bartolomæus Peſtaloſſa Rhetus, by which it appears that Hortenſio Lando collected theſe letters into a volume, at the requeſt of Octavianus Raverca, qui ob inſignem animi pietatem Terracinæ Pontifex deſignatus eſt, who for his eminent piety was made Biſhop of Terracina (2).

(1) It is in Latin.

(2) I am obliged to Mr. Des Maizeaux for theſe particulars.

[B] He wrote two dialogues, which have been erroneouſly aſcribed to Cardinal Aleander.] What I am going to obſerve has been communicated to me by the author of the preceding remark. " The two " dialogues, one of which is intitled Cicero relega- " tus, (Cicero baniſhed) and the other Cicero revoca- " tus, (Cicero recalled) were not written by Jerome " Aleander, but by Hortenſio Lando, of Milan, ſur- " named Tranquillus. They are dedicated to Pomponius " Trivulſio, and as the inſcription of the dedication is " thus, Pomponio Trivultio H. A. S. D. Henry Lewis " Chaſtaignier Biſhop of Poitiers imagined that the let- " ters H. A. ſignified Hieronymus Aleander. But they were " either put there for joke's-ſake, or perhaps H. A. was " put by miſtake for H. L. A. that is to ſay, Hor- " tenſius Landus, the author's true name. Simler " the continuator of Geſner aſcribes theſe dialogues " to Hortenſius Tranquillus Mediolanenſis whom he " erroneouſly diſtinguiſhes from Hortenſius Landus. " This Landus and this Tranquillus are but one " and the ſame writer. He loved to conceal his " name, and yet he was glad to be known. L'Autore della preſente opera, ſays he under the name " of Paulo Maſcranico in an advertiſement to the " reader at the end of his Paradoxes, il qual fu " M. O. L. M. (*) detto per ſopranome il Tranq. i. e. " The author of this preſent work was maſter Hor- " tenſio Lando, ſurnamed the peaceable." At the end " of his Commentario d'Italia, in another advertiſe- " ment to the reader, under the name of Nicolo Mor- " ra, he ſpeaks thus : Godi lettore &c (3). At the " end of his Sermoni funebri delle beſtie, he calls him- " ſelf at length and without any diſguiſe, Hortenſio " Lando ditto (†) il Tranquillo. Now this Lando or " Tranquillo owns in his laſt Paradox the Cicero re- " legatus for his own work. Non dubito certamente, " ſays he, che molti non ſi habbino da maravigliare " *che ancora fatto non habbia la pace con M. The ſup-"preſſion therefore of ſo uſeful a piece is to be "looked upon as no ſmall part of the public ca-"lamity of thoſe times, wherein it was written, and "its loſs muſt have been prejudicial to ours, where-"in, though we have ſeen the covenant reduced to "aſhes, yet even thoſe aſhes may be fruitful of iſſue, "no leſs monſtrous than its Parent." This treatiſe contains 13 chapters. Chapter the firſt: By what means the Covenanters were reduced to the neceſſity of entering into this combination, confeſſed to be their laſt refuge. Chapter the ſecond: The grounds of the Covenant, and falſe aſſertions laid down in the preface to it, diſproved. Chapter the third: The unlawfulneſs of the Covenant in reſpect of the cauſe efficient, as made by ſubjects againſt the will of their ſuperior in ſuch things as neceſſarily require his conſent. Chapter the fourth: The matter of the Covenant examined; and proved, firſt, to be againſt truth. Chapter the fifth: That the Covenant by reaſon of the many ambiguities in it, eſpecially this, who ſhall be the authentic interpreter of it, cannot be ſworn in judgment. Capter the ſixth: That the performance of ſundry clauſes in the Covenant cannot be without grand inconvenience or injuſtice. Chapter the ſeventh: That many things vowed in the Covenant are not poſſible to be fulfilled. Chapter the eighth: That the very taking the Covenant and other avowed actions of the Covenanters are in fact contradictory to the formal words of their oath. Chapter the ninth: That many particulars vowed in the Covenant, and intended by the covenanters, are ſimply and abſolutely unlawful. Chapter the tenth: That the Covenant is repugnant to thoſe general ends, for which it is pretended to be taken. Chapter the eleventh: That the particular ends of the ſeveral articles are likewiſe inconſiſtent with the matter of them. Chapter the twelfth: The true end of framing and enjoyning this Covenant, The bringing in of the Scots, abſolutely unlawful. Chapter the thirteenth: From theſe premiſes the Covenant is concluded unlawful in reſpect of the form. V. Anſwer of the Chancellor, Maſters, and Scholars of the Univerſity of Oxford, to the petition, articles of grievance, and reaſons of the City of Oxford: preſented to the committee for regulating the Univerſity of Oxford 24 July 1649. He likewiſe laboured very much in finiſhing Archbiſhop Uſher's Book, entitled, Chronologia Sacra, but died when he had almoſt brought it to an end. Mr. Thomas Barlow compleated it. He tranſlated into Latin, Reaſons of the preſent judgment of the Univerſity concerning the ſolemn League and Covenant, and aſſiſted Dr. Robert Sanderſon and Dr. Richard Zouch in the drawing up of thoſe Reaſons. He tranſlated into Engliſh A Review of the Council of Trent, written in French by a learned Roman Catholick, Oxford 1638, in fol. wherein is repreſented the diſſent of the Gallican Church from ſeveral concluſions of the Council. He left behind him 13 quartos and 8 octavos in manuſcript, with innumerable collections in looſe papers, all written with his own hand, collected chiefly from ancient manuſcripts in the Bodleian Library, &c. He had alſo made ſeveral Catalogues of manuſcripts in various libraries, and of printed books likewiſe, in order, as was ſuppoſed, for an univerſal Catalogue in all kinds of learning. Dr. Fuller tells us (2), that he took a great deal of pains in the continuation of Brian Twyne's Antiq. Academ. Oxon. and that he was intent upon it, when he died. But Mr. Wood obſerves (3), that he cannot find any ground for this aſſertion; and that Dr. Thomas Barlow and Dr. Lamplugh, who looked over his library after his death, aſſured him, that they ſaw nothing done towards ſuch a deſign. Dr. Langbaine greatly aſſiſted Dr. Arthur Duck in compoſing his book De uſu & authoritate Juris Civilis Romanorum in Dominico Principum Chriſtianorum, printed at London 1653 in 8vo. In the Collection of three hundred Letters written between Archbiſhop Uſher and moſt of the eminenteſt perſons for piety and learning in his time both in England and beyond the ſeas, publiſhed by Dr. Richard Parr at London 1686 in fol. we have ſeveral letters of our Author to that Prelate. In one dated from Queen's College, February 9th $164\frac{8}{9}$. he writes thus: "For "myſelf, I cannot tell what account to make of my "preſent employment; I have many Irons in the "Fire, but of no great conſequence. I do not know "how ſoon I ſhall be called to give up, and am "therefore putting my houſe in order; digeſting the "confuſed notes and papers left me by ſeveral pre-

" deceſſors both in the Univerſity and College, which " I purpoſe to leave in a better method than I found " them. At Mr. Patrick Young's requeſt I have un- " dertaken the collation of Conſtantine's Geoponics with " two manuſcripts in our publick library, up- " on which I am forced to beſtow ſome vacant " hours. In our College I am ex officio to moderate " Divinity-diſputations once a week. My honoured " friend Dr. Duck has given me occaſion to make " ſome inquiry after the law. And the opportunity " of an ingenious young man come lately from Paris, " who has put up a private courſe of Anatomy, has " prevailed with me to engage myſelf for his Audi- " tor and Spectator upon three days a week, four " hours each time. But this I do ut explorator, non " ut transfuga. For though I am not ſollicitous to " engage myſelf in that great and weighty calling " of the miniſtry after this new way; yet I would " be loth to be λειποτάκτης, as to divinity. Though " I am very inſufficient to make a Maſter-builder, " yet I could help to bring in materials from that " publick ſtore in our library, to which I could wil- " lingly conſecrate the remainder of my days, and " count it no loſs to be deprived of all other Ac- " commodations, ſo I might be permitted to enjoy " the liberty of my conſcience and ſtudy in that " place. But if there be ſuch a price ſet upon the " latter, as the former, as I cannot reach without " pawning the former, I am reſolved, the Lord's " will be done." Eleven other letters of our Author to Mr. Selden are publiſhed by Mr. Thomas Hearne in the firſt part of his Appendix to Leland's Collectanea, Vol. V. p. 270 and 282 & ſeqq. The firſt is dated at Queen's College, March 20th 164$\frac{7}{8}$. In one dated November 17th 1651. he has the following paſſage: " In purſuance of thoſe injunctions (for ſuch to me " are all, which you call requeſts) which your laſt of the " 6th inſtant laid upon me, I have made ſearch into " ſuch Greek manuſcripts, as our publick library " affords of the Firſt Epiſtle of St. John, which are " not many. Of theſe latter we have only three " copies, and one of them defective at the end, and " ſo wanting ſome of the Canonical Epiſtles. The " other two read that place, chap. 5. thus: Ὅτι " τρεῖς εἰσιν οἱ μαρτυροῦντες ἐν τῇ γῇ, τὸ πνεῦμα, καὶ τὸ " ὕδωρ, καὶ τὸ αἷμα, καὶ οἱ τρεῖς ἓν εἰσι· without " any veſtigium of that, which uſually paſſeth for " the 7th verſe. You know what Beza has noted upon " the place; to which I may add, that in the in- " terlineary of Raphelengius in 8*vo*. 1612, thoſe " words, εἰς τὸ ἕν εἰσι, make the cloſe of the 7th " verſe, and are totally wanting as in the 8th, with " which agrees the Geneva edition in 4*to*. 1620. " But I ſuppoſe it was not to your purpoſe to in- " quire after the varieties of editions, but manuſcripts, " and whether you meant only Greek and Latin " too, I cannot tell; and therefore do yet forbear " to trouble you with the ſeveral Lections in our " Latin Copyes, ſome having nothing of the 7th " verſe, ſome putting it in the margin, ſome place- " ing it after what we ordinarily account for the " eighth, and thoſe that have both varying di- " verſly; which, if it may be uſefull to you any " way, I ſhall upon the firſt notice, more methodical- " ly digeſt, and more particularly certify." In ano- ther dated March 16th 1651 he has this paſſage. For myſelf, I have engaged a matter of a ſcore of our ableſt men in that kind to undertake a thorough ſurvey of our publick library, intending to make a perfect catalogue of all the books according to their ſeverall ſubjects in ſeve- rall kinds; and when that's done, to incorporate in it all the authors in any of our private College libraries, which are wanting in the publick, ſo as he that deſires to know, may ſee, at one view, what we have upon any ſubject. Dr. James made ſome beginning in this kind; but none yet has ventured either to perfect his, or begin a new. In another dated Auguſt 22d. 1653. he writes thus: " Upon occaſion of the buſineſſe of " tythes now under conſideration, ſome, whom it " more nearly concerns, have been pleaſed to enquire " of me, what might be ſaid, as to the civil right " of them; to whom I was not able to give any " better directions than by ſending them to your " Hiſtory. Happily it may ſeem ſtrange to them, yet " I am not out of hopes, but that work (like Pelias " Haſta) which was lookt upon as a piece, that " ſtruck deepeſt againſt the divine, will afford the " ſtrongeſt arguments for the civil right; and if " that be made the iſſue, I do not deſpair of the " cauſe. . . . It is a mere difficulty to me to imagine, " what argument (as the law now ſtands) can be " brought againſt the miniſters title and propriety, " than for it; but of this we ſhall hear (I doubt not) " ſoon enough." In another dated September 19th 1653. he writes thus: " Touching the abolition or " continuance of the judiciall law either to the Jews " or Chriſtians, I do not remember to have ſeen any " peculiar tract. . . . With ſubmiſſion to your judg- " ment, I ſhould think theſe two propoſitions no " paradoxes: 1. That the judiciall law of Moſes, " as ſuch, (abſtracting from what in it is of the law " of nature and Nations, &c.) was never binding to " Chriſtians, as Chriſtians. 2. That to the Jews, " as Jews, it never ceaſed to be ſo, ſave only by ac- " cident, as countermanded by the civil ſanctions of " thoſe Princes and States, in whoſe dominions their " lot of reſidence has fallen, ſince their final diſper- " ſion; with what variety and temperament, both in " the Roman empire and other nations, no man " knows better than yourſelfe. I find in St. Auſtin " (Epiſtola 49) out of Porphyry, of their law in ge- " neral affirm'd: Prorepſit in fines Italos poſt Caium " Cæſarem, aut certè illo imperante. Thoſe ſeverall " laws in both Codes concerning ſometimes the re- " ſtraint, ſometimes the toleration of it, I need not " mention. For matter of fact, I know not, whe- " ther it be worth the while to take notice of that " paſſage in Theodorus (or rather Diodorus) Tarſen- " ſis (apud Photium in Bibl. Cod. 223. ex Lib. 6. " de Fato) who gives this teſtimony of the Jewiſh " nation, that as formerly, ſo ſince their univerſall " diſperſion till that time (about 400 years after " Chriſt) they never apoſtatized from their antient " laws. And tho' that were a time, when the Jews " (if ever) were in moſt flagrant favour with the " Emperors; yet that the Chriſtians of thoſe days " did not conceive themſelves oblig'd by the Jewiſh " judicialls, may be collected from that return of " Baſil to (as I ſuppoſe) the ſame Diodorus, Biſhop " of Tarſus, touching the caſe of a man's marrying " the ſiſter of his deceaſed wife (Baſil. Ep. 187. & " vid. Balſamon in eandem) where he waves the au- " thority of the Moſaical law with ὅσα ὁ νόμος λέγει, " τοῖς ἐν τῷ νόμῳ λέγει, &c. We have in ourpub- " lic library amongſt the Greek MSS. given by Sir " Thomas Roe, a great volume containing, inter alia, " ſeveral Collections of Laws both Civil and Eccle- " ſiaſtical, many of thoſe already extant in the Baſilica " and Jus Græco-Romanum, with others (for ought I " know) not yet in print: in which book betwixt " ſome novels of Baſilius and ſome others of Leo Imp. " comes in a piece of about ſix leaves in quantity " with this title: Ἐκλογὴ ἐν ἐπιτομῇ τῆ παρὰ τῆ Θεῆ " διὰ Μωϋσέως δοθέντος νόμου τοῖς Ισραηλίταις. The firſt " title thus: Περὶ κρίματος καὶ δικαιοσύνης· ἐκ τῆς Ἐξόδου " κιφ. κϑ. The beginning runs thus: Οὐ παραλήψη " ἀκοὴν ματαίαν, ἐ συγκαθήσῃ μετὰ τῆ ἀδίκου γενέσϑαι " μάρτυς ἄδικος &c. In the margin over-right " againſt the title, there is this note in the rubrick, " of the ſame hand with the reſt, πῶς συμβάλλεσι " ταῦτα πάντα τοῖς εἰς ἡμᾶς νενομοθετημένοις; by which, " as it is apparent at the time of the tranſcript, it was " otherwiſe, ſo it may be doubted, whether in the " firſt deſign of the collector thoſe laws were not ſup- " poſed to concern the Chriſtians of thoſe times as " rule of life. The method of the collection is not " much unlike that in the Collatio Legum Moſai- " carum & Romanarum ſet out by Pithæus, of which, " I think, you make Licinius Rufinus to have been " the author. The whole volume was writ about 300 " years ſince by one Conſtantinus Sapiens, for ſo I " read in the cloſe of the book, and ſometimes belonged in Grammar learning at Denton in the pariſh of Cudeſton near Oxford under Mr. William Wildgooſe, M. A. and bound apprentice to Mr. Nevill Simmons, a Bookſeller in St. Paul's Church-yard, but ſoon after called thence by his mother upon the death of his elder brother William, and by her entered a Gentleman Commoner of Univerſity College in Oxford in Michaelmas Term 1672, "where though put under the "tuition of a good tutor, ſays Mr. Wood (i), yet by his mother's fondneſs he became "idle, a great jockey, married, and run out a good part of the eſtate that had "deſcended to him. But being a man of parts, he afterwards took up, lived for ſome "years a retired life near Oxford, improved much his natural and gay genius, that he "had to dramatic Poetry, and at firſt wrote little things without his name ſet to them, "which he would never own." But he afterwards publiſhed ſome works, which he owned [C]. Auguſt the 14th 1690 he was elected Inferior Beadle of Arts in the Univerſity of Oxford; and on the 19th of January following was choſen Superior Beadle of Law. He died June the 23d 1692, and was interred in the Church of St. Peter in the Eaſt in Oxford (k).

"to the monaſtery τῆς Ἐσπέρᾳ in Inſulâ Chalce. I cannot tell whether any of later times, Caroloſtadius "and the Anabaptiſts excepted, have maintained the "Jewiſh Judicials to be univerſally and indiſpenſably "binding to Chriſtians." In another letter dated November the 8th 1653 he writes thus: "I was not ſo "much troubled to hear of that fellow, who lately "in London maintained in public, that learning is a "ſin, as to ſee ſome men (who would be accounted "none of the meaneſt amongſt ourſelves here at home) "under pretence of piety go about to baniſh it the Uniſity. I cannot make any better conſtruction of a "late order made by thoſe, whom we call viſitors, "upon occaſion of an election laſt week at All-Souls "College, to this effect, that for the future no ſcholar "be choſen into any place in any college, unleſſe he "bring a teſtimony under the hands of four perſons "at the leaſt, (not Electours) known to theſe viſitors "to be truly godly men, that he who ſtands for ſuch "a place is himſelfe truly godly; and by arrogating "to themſelves this power, they ſit judges of all "men's conſciences, and have rejected ſome, againſt "whom they had no other exceptions (being certified "by ſuch, to whom their converſations were beſt "known, to be unblameable, and ſtatutably elected "after due examination and approbation of their ſuffiſciency by that ſociety) merely upon this account, "that the perſons who teſtified in their behalfe, are "not known to theſe viſitors to be regenerate. I intend (God willing) ere long to have an election in "our College, and have profeſſed, that I will not ſubmit to this order. How I ſhall ſpeed in it, I do "not pretend to foreſee; but if I be baffled, I ſhall "hardly be ſilent."

[C] He afterwards publiſhed ſome works which he owned.] I. The Hunter: a Diſcourſe of Horſemanſhip. Oxford 1685 in 8vo. This is ſubjoined to the third edition of a book, intitled, The Gentleman's Recreation, in four parts, viz. Hunting, Hawking, Fowling, Fiſhing, &c. whereunto is prefixed a large Sculpture giving eaſy directions for blowing the Horn: With an Abſtract at the End of each Subject of ſuch Laws as relate to the ſame, &c. This Gentleman's Recreation was written by Colonel Edward Cook of Highnam in Glouceſter-ſhire, who attended King Charles I. at Newport in the Iſle of Wight, during the treaty between his Majeſty and the Parliament, and was there when the King was carried thence to Hurſt-Caſtle in November 1648, when his Majeſty commanded him to commit to writing the manner of his ſeizure, which he did. The Colonel died at London January the 29th 1683, and was interred on the 2d of February at Highnam abovementioned. There was publiſhed of his writing Certain paſſages, which happened at Newport in the Iſle of Wight November the 29th 1648, relating to King Charles I. London 1690 in four ſheets and an half in 4to. II. Momus Triumphans: Or the Plagiaries of the Engliſh Stage expreſſed in a Catalogue of Comedies, Tragedies, &c. London 1688 in five ſheets in 4to. Which title, with the book, and a large preface of 15 pages of Mr. Langbaine's writing, being publiſhed by another hand contrary to the mind of the author, and 500 of the copies ſold, he cauſed another title to be put to the reſt of the copies, with an advertiſement againſt the firſt. The title is thus: A New Catalogue of Engliſh Plays, containing Comedies, Tragedies, Tragi-Comedies, Opera's, Maſques, Paſtorals, Interludes, Farces, &c. both antient and modern, that have ever yet been printed, to this preſent year 1688. To which are added the Volumes and beſt Editions, with divers Remarks of the Originals of moſt Plays, and of the Plagiaries of ſeveral Authors. London 1688. This is the ground-work of another book, written by Mr. Langbaine, and entitled, III, An Account of the Engliſh Dramatick Poets: Or, ſome Obſervations and Remarks on the Lives and Writings of all thoſe that have either publiſhed Comedies, Tragedies, Tragi-Comedies, Paſtorals, Maſques, Interludes, Farces, or Opera's in the Engliſh tongue. By Gerard Langbaine. Oxford 1691 in 8vo. Dedicated to James Earl of Abington. IV. While he was Superior Beadle of Law, he wrote and publiſhed an Appendix to a Catalogue of all the Graduates in Divinity, Law, and Phyſic, &c. which Catalogue was written by Mr. Richard Peers, Superior Beadle of Arts and Phyſick. Mr. Langbaine's Appendix contains the names of all thoſe, who proceeded in Divinity, Law, and Phyſic in the Univerſity of Oxford from the 14th of July 1688, where Mr. Peers left off, to the 6th of Auguſt 1699. V. Mr. Wood tells us, that he had been informed by Mr. Langbaine and others, that he had written the Hermaphrodite: a Novel; which perhaps might be the ſame with The Gallant Hermaphrodite, an amorous Novel, London 1687 in 8vo, tranſlated from the French of the Sieur de Chavigny. LANGIUS (PAUL) a German Monk, would be but little known by the Chronicle he compoſed, had he not inſerted in it great complaints againſt the wicked lives of the Clergy, and beſtowed elogies on Martin Luther (a). This is the reaſon why the Proteſtants have quoted him a thouſand times over and over. He was born at Zwicka in Voigtland, and entered amongſt the Benedictine Monks in the year 1487 in the monaſtery of Bozaw near Zeits in Miſnia (b). The Abbot Trithemius ſent him in the year 1515 to ſearch all the Convents in Germany, in order to make a collection of all the manuſcripts, which could ſerve to illuſtrate Hiſtory, or to improve the catalogue of Eccleſiaſtical Writers (c). Langius laboured for himſelf alſo when he was viſiting the Libraries; for it proved very uſeful to him when he wrote his Chronicle (d) [A]. It begins

[A] His Chronicle.] It is intitled Chronicon Citicenſe. i. e. "The Chronicle of Zeits." But it does not follow from thence that Du Pleſſis was in the right to call the author of it Moine de Citique. i. e. "A Monk "of begins with the year 1468 according to Voſſius, but he is miſtaken [B]. Coeffeteau had recourſe to a very indifferent evaſion [C], when he anſwered the Myſtere d'Iniquité, in which ſome paſſages of Langius were quoted. There is a Reflection of Andrew Rivetus relating

" of Citicus." Coeffeteau inſtead of correcting that blunder, made uſe of the ſame words. Rivetus's expreſſions are not much better, le Moine Citique. See their paſſages in the remark [C]. Strangers have much reaſon to complain, that the French are uſed to alter and disfigure the proper names ſo, that one does not know what to make of them. Voſſius made this obſervation againſt the celebrated Thuanus (1). But here the fault conſiſts not only in disfiguring the name of a city; it is ſomething worſe, for becauſe Langius compoſed the Chronicle of a Cathedral Church, they give him a name derived from that Church. Now ſuch a name does not in the leaſt belong to him.

(1) Voſſius, De Arte Hiſtorica, cap. 12. pag. 69.

[B] Voſſius is miſtaken.] This work of Langius is a Chronicle of the Epiſcopal Church of Zeits. The Emperor Otho I founded this Cathedral in the year 968. Pope John XIII confirmed it. Teſte Paulo Langio in Chronico Citizenſi, quod a dicto anno (968) uſque ad annum 1515 deduxit Epiſcoporum Citizenſium & aliorum in vicinia Antiſtitum res geſtas commemorans (2). Langius carries his Chronicle from that foundation to the year 1515: he does not only give us the Hiſtory of the Biſhop of Zeits, but he mentions alſo the other Biſhops of the neighbouring cities.

[C] Coeffeteau had recourſe to a very indifferent evaſion.] Du Pleſſis Mornai could not omit to mention the Elogies, which Langius beſtows on Martin Luther.

" Paul Langius, a Monk of Zeits (*), and a diſciple " of Abbot Trithemius juſt when Luther began to ap- " pear in the world, though he did not quit his Mo- " naſtery, yet was greatly moved by Luther's preach- " ing, and gives him ſuch a noble character as could " hardly be expected from a Monk. This Martin, ſays " he, was a moſt learned, and incomparable Divine, " who endeavoured to reſtore the ſacred Divinity to its " primitive dignity, its ancient purity, and to the inno- " cence, plainneſs and ſimplicity of the Goſpel, deſpiſing " intirely all worldly Philoſophy. ... And in another " place under the year 1503, he mentions him together " with Carloſtad and Melanchthon, and obſerves of " them all, that they handle and teach the ſacred Theo- " logy ſo as to give the pure wheat of the word of God, " without any ſtraw: that is to ſay, without mixing " Philoſophy and Syllogiſms with it; but confining them- " ſelves only to the Goſpel of Chriſt, and to the Apoſtle " St. Paul, whom they take for their patrons and their " only authority; and with the ſtudy of the Holy Scripture " they join the fear of God, and the ſeeds of all the " moral virtues, which they ſow into the hearts of their " diſciples, by their words, by their example, and by " their writings. And that it might not be objected " to us, that this was ſaid before Luther had de- " clared war againſt the Pope, here follows what Lan- " gius obſerves under the year 1520, after he had ex- " patiated on the abuſe and exceſs of indulgences. The " ſame (Luther) ſays he, by his doctrine and admirable " preaching diſcredited intirely the indulgences; he raiſed " doubts about them, and diſſuaded the people from buy- " ing them, ſhewing that they were not in the leaſt ne- " ceſſary to ſalvation, they not being a remiſſion of ſins, " but ſerving only to make men careleſs of repenting, and " neglectful of good works, nay, that they were a ſtum- " bling block and an excitement to vice: that the me- " rits of Chriſt and the Saints were not the ſtock and " ſtore of theſe indulgences, ſince nothing of all this " was ever written in the primitive Church nor even " during a thouſand years by the Saints and Doc- " tors of the orthodox Church; ſo far were they from " having ſuch a value for them, and ſuch an high " opinion of them, as men have now, on account of the " money they raiſe by them. He aſſerted alſo and proved " that the Church of Rome is not the firſt and the " head of the others by any divine right &c. And " for this reaſon, adds he, they perſecute him now like " another Athanaſius, particularly becauſe he aſſerted this " theſis, and ſome other great and ſublime articles of " doctrine, which not only the Romans but even ſome " learned men, eſpecially the Thomiſts continue to oppoſe. " And yet this Martin, who is the firſt and wiſeſt " man of this time in matters of controverſy, could never " yet be vanquiſhed, for he ſupports and proves his doc- " trine by paſſages from the Goſpel, and from the Apoſtle " St. Paul's Epiſtles, and even from the original works " of the ancient orthodox Fathers (3)." Du Pleſſis does not omit the ſalvo which Langius makes uſe of to ſoften ſo many bold propoſitions. Thus ſpeaks that Monk, ſays he, non aſſertive, ſed admirative, not with a deſign to affirm any thing, but out of admiration, ſuſpending his judgment after the example of ſeveral other perſons, till the matter be determined by a general Council. I have here tranſcribed Langius's own words. Porro quæ de Martini Lutheri Doctrina diſſerui, non ſicut diſcipulus ejus aſſertive, quod abſit, ſed potius admirative poſui utpote nullius adhuc juratus in verba magiſtri. Sed cum ſim & ego more ſuſpenſus multorum, quouſque per Oecumenicum univerſale & generale Concilium, quid in tam ardua re tenendum ſit, decretum fuerit, paratus nihilo tamen minus, & modo, ſemper a recte ſapientibus doceri, quorum etiam & potiſſimum Romanæ Eccleſiæ judicio hæc præſentia, & alia qualiacunque mea ſcripta & corrigenda & examinanda ſubjicio, tametſi ego ſupra narrata, non de Romanis ſed de Romanenſibus, id eſt, non indigenis, ſed aliunde ad eum confluentibus deſcripſerim (4). i. e. " What I have obſerved of Martin " Luther's doctrine, I have not related affirmatively, " as a diſciple of his; God forbid; but rather by " way of admiration, as a man who is not addicted to " any party. For I am ſtill in ſuſpenſe, like many " other perſons, till it be decreed by a general Coun- " cil, what we ought to believe in theſe difficult and " abſtruſe matters. And yet I am always ready " to learn from thoſe, who think right, to whoſe " judgment, and particularly to that of the Church " of Rome, I ſubmit both this and all my other writ- " ings, to be by them examined and corrected. " However what I have obſerved above muſt be un- " derſtood not of the native Romans, but of thoſe, " who from other parts flock to Rome." Theſe words are a ſtrong proof of his being a Roman Catholic.

Here follows Coeffeteau's anſwer to this. " What " the Sieur du Pleſſis objects againſt us from Paul Lan- " gius a Monk of Citicus (Zeits) and a diſciple of " the Abbot Trithemius, ſhews us the ſincerity of the " Proteſtants, and with what honeſty they publiſh the " works of ſome authors. For they make Langius ſay " ſuch things concerning Luther, as are intirely incon- " ſiſtent, not only with the doctrine, which Langius " profeſſed till his death, but alſo with what he wrote " in that ſame Chronicle, which contains thoſe com- " mendations on Luther. The Proteſtants imagine " perhaps, that they will make us believe this author " was a Lutheran and a Papiſt, an Heretic and " Orthodox, for indeed they cannot otherwiſe reconcile " with his former writings what they make him ſay " here. And let no man be impoſed upon by the " name of Piſtorius, who publiſhed that work; for " though he turned Catholic, yet it was ſome time af- " ter, and he was ſtill a Proteſtant when he publiſhed " this Chronicle, with ſome other works of German " writers, and he does even declare, that he had it " from Henry Petreus, who lived at Baſil amongſt the " Heretics. Farther, the authors of this forgery are " ſenſible that the world would hardly believe Lan- " gius ſpoke ſo honourably both of the doctrine and " perſon of Luther; and therefore they added to it " a pitiful and ſilly evaſion, making him ſay, that " what he wrote was not affirmativè, but admirativè, " not to affirm any thing, but out of admiration, ſuſpend- " ing his judgment &c. One would think that this " Langius wants a maſter, and is not yet determined " what religion he ought to chooſe (5)." This is a wretched reply. It were better to be ſilent than to make ſuch an anſwer. Father Gretſer waved it, and imagined he ſhould find his account better in ſuppoſing that honeſt Paul Langius, who longed to take a woman in his arms, looked upon Luther as an hero, who would ſoon exterminate celibacy. Let us ſee what the Sieur du Pleſſis's apologiſt replied to this raillery, and to Coeffeteau's evaſion.

relating to Piſtorius, who publiſhed this Monk's Chronicle in the year 1583, which Reflection is ill-grounded in my opinion [D]. Moreri's blunders are not conſiderable (e) [E].

" that our Monk (Gretſer) cannot bear it, but he " muſt charge thoſe, who publiſhed Langius's work, " with adding to it from their own brains all that " is quoted from it to that purpoſe; thus he mea- " ſures their Corn by the buſhel of the Papiſts, " who are uſed to falſify with additions and mutila- " tions, all the writings that paſs through their hands. " And yet to deprive them of this objection, God " ſuffered this work to be publiſhed by a man, who " even then had already ſecretly deſigned to apoſta- " tiſe, which he did at laſt publickly: I mean Piſto- " rius, who would certainly have ſince that time diſ- " covered this artifice, had he been concerned in it, or " any other perſon to his knowledge. Gretſer, who " had it in his power to examine him upon this par- " ticular, had not the impudence to charge the pub- " liſher of this chronicle with falſifying it, though " otherwiſe he be impudent to the higheſt degree. " He choſe rather to abuſe this poor Monk in theſe " words. It is this Langius, who at the firſt preach- " ing of the Lutheran Goſpel longed to leave his Mo- " naſtery, imagining that the happy time was now " come, when the Monks would be at liberty to throw " off their hood and marry Nuns. But in thoſe times " the Monks knew very well how to find means to " lie with Nuns, without marrying them: and if " they had not been hindered by other conſiderations, " Coeffeteau does not want to be told, that they had " opportunities enough to gratify their deſires (6)." Theſe laſt words ſhew evidently, that the common topicks which the Miſſionaries inſiſt upon againſt the marriage of the Reformers, and of the Monks who improved the Proteſtant Religion, are not ſo favourable to them, as they imagine. They afford them indeed a large field for declamations; the moſt odious deſcriptions of ſenſuality drop very thick from their pen. But it is an eaſy matter to retort their own objections upon them; for it is but too true that they who make a vow of celibacy, do not always keep it; and common ſenſe teaches us, that if the Miniſters of the Church have not power enough over themſelves to abſtain from women, it is much better that they ſhou'd ſatisfy their paſſion with their own wives, than with their neighbour's wives.

(6) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Part. 2. p. 633.

[D] A reflection of Andrew Rivetus . . . which is ill-grounded in my opinion.] We have ſeen juſt now, that he pretends Piſtorius would have diſcovered his falſification after he was become a good Papiſt. I believe that he is miſtaken. If Piſtorius had falſified Langius's manuſcript, he would never have boaſted of it. The advantage which might accrue to the Church of Rome from ſuch a confeſſion, would have been very inconſiderable. Whether Langius commended Luther in the year 1520, or ſpoke ill of him, or did not mention him at all, it is after all of very little conſequence. But Piſtorius could not have diſcovered his wicked artifice, without making himſelf contemptible to the Roman Catholicks, aud expoſing himſelf to the abuſes of the Proteſtants, who from his own confeſſion would have had an argument to prove him a diſhoneſt man. Such faults are never confeſſed; they are attended with too bad conſequences to be owned.

[E] Moreri's blunders are not conſiderable.] He ought to have called Langius's native place Zwicka and not Zwickau (7). His Monaſtery was called Bozau and not Bozan. The miſtake of Paſtorius inſtead of Piſtorius has been corrected in the editions printed in Holland. It ought not to have been ſaid, that his Chronicle begins with the year 1468; this is a blunder of Voſſius, which I have already cenſured, and which Zeillerus has tranſcribed (1).

(7) It is called Zurickau in the edition of Moreri printed in Holland.

LANGIUS (RODOLPH a Gentleman of Weſtphalia, and Provoſt of the Cathedral Church of Munſter towards the end of the fifteenth Century, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning, and by his zeal for the reſtoration of polite Literature. He went through his firſt ſtudies at Deventer, and was afterwards ſent into Italy; by his uncle the Dean of Munſter, and applied himſelf to the greateſt maſters in Literature, Laurence Valla, Mapheus Vegius, Francis Philelphus and Theodore Gaza. By this means he acquired a good taſte of the Latin ſtile both in verſe and proſe, and confirmed himſelf in it by compoſing ſeveral pieces. His fellow-travellers in that journey were Maurice Count of Spiegelberg, and Rodolph Agricola: after they were returned into Germany, they laboured all three to baniſh ignorance, and were the firſt who by their example and by their exhortations eſtabliſhed a good method of writing in Latin, and of teaching that tongue. Langius being ſent to the Court of Rome by the Biſhop and Chapter of Munſter, under Pope Sixtus IV, acquitted himſelf very well of his Commiſſion, and came back with letters from this Pope and from Laurence de Medicis, which made him ſtill more conſidered than he was before, by thoſe who had ſent him to Rome, ſo that he was more able to proſecute his deſign of making the Belles Lettres flouriſh, by baniſhing from the ſchools the ignorance which prevailed there. He was obliged to ſtruggle ſome years with thoſe who protected it [A], and who objected that the

[A] He was obliged to ſtruggle ſome years with thoſe who protected ignorance.] The Univerſity of Cologne thwarted Langius's commendable deſign; but it was approved by the Italians, and their ſuffrages had ſuch a power with the Biſhop of Munſter, that they determined him intirely. You will ſee a more particular account of this in Chytræus's words (1). Cauſam bonarum literarum & emendationis ſtudiorum doctrinæ barbaræ, paſſim in omnibus Collegiis & Scholis regnantium, majore cum fructu egit (Langius) tametſi aliquot adhuc annos reluctantibus veteris Barbarici patronis, ac nominatim Academia Colonienſi, quæ datis ad Conradum Ritbergenſem Epiſcopum, qui Henrico Swartzburgenſi ſucceſſerat, & ſummum Collegium, literis, uſitatum tot ſeculis inſtituendæ adoleſcentiæ & docendi rationem & libellos, in ſcholis retineri, & mutationes novas, & ſtudiis & diſciplinæ periculoſas, faveri flagitabant. Etſi autem erudite & graviter Conſilii ſui cauſas Rodolphus explicabat: tamen ad Italorum doctorum judicia ipſi provocare neceſſe fuit. Qui cum emendationem doctrinæ in ſcholis uſitatæ neceſſariam eſſe & Langium recte, Lovanienſes (2) perperam judicare, in reſponſis ad Epiſcopum ſuis pronunciaſſent: Epiſcopus qui Italorum, apud quos olim vixerat, cenſuram magni faciebat, facultatem aperiendæ novæ bonarum literarum ſcholæ Collegio dedit. i. e. the introducing a new method of teaching was dangerous; but at laſt he got over all theſe difficulties, and perſuaded his Biſhop to found a ſchool at Munſter, the direction of which was committed to learned men. He pointed out to them the method they were to follow, and the books they were to explain, and gave them the uſe of his fine Library. This ſchool being thus eſtabliſhed a little before the end of the fifteenth Century, became very flouriſhing, and ſerved as a nurſery for Literature to all Germany till the Revolutions which were occaſioned at Munſter by the Anabaptiſts in the year 1554. Langius died in the year 1519 at the age of fourſcore. He publiſhed ſome Poems, by which it appears that there were Latin Poets of ſome reputation in Germany before Conrad Celtes (a) [B]. Rodolph Agricola dedicated his Latin Tranſlation of Plato's Axiochus to Langius (b).

Obſerve that Chytræus by uſing the word editis, publiſhed, hints that theſe poems had been printed: and yet the abbreviator of Geſner's Bibliotheque (3), who mentions ſome other poems of Langius, raiſes ſome doubts; for he obſerves that Herman Hamelman, who acknowledges that he had ſeen thoſe poems, does not declare, whether they were printed or only manuſcripts.

LANGIUS JOSEPH) born at Keiſerſberg (a) in Upper Alſace, and Profeſſor of Mathematics and of the Greek Tongue at Friburg a city of Briſgaw, was compoſing in the year 1612 his Elementale Mathematicum (b), which, according to Voſſius, was not printed (c) till five years after (d). Iſaac Habrecht a Philoſopher and Phyſician made Additions to it, and adorned it with Notes and Plates, and publiſhed it thus (e) in the year 1625. Langius had publiſhed at Straſburg in the year 1598 a Florilegium [A] in 8vo, which ſome years after was followed by a work in folio intitled, Polyanthea nova [B]. He lived ſeveral years in the Proteſtant Communion, and then he turned Roman Catholic (f). I ſhall give the titles of his other works below [C].

[A] A Florilegium.] It is a collection in an Alphabetical order of ſentences, Apophthegms, Compariſons, examples, and ſymbols. Such a work is very uſeful to young ſcholars, when they have ſome diſcourſes or exerciſes to make upon any ſubjects. Learned men might alſo uſe it with ſome advantage, if all that is quoted there had been carefully compared with the originals. But nothing like this has been done. Our Langius did only tranſcribe modern compilers, and amongſt others Thomas Hibernicus (1), whoſe work intitled Flores Doctorum (the flowers of the learned) abounds with errors.

(1) Dietericus nihil aliud in Langio reprehendit, quam credulitatem, qua ſe ab Hibernico decipi paſſus. Thomaſius, de Plagio, num. 482.

[B] Polyanthea nova.] The author follows in this work the ſame method as in his Florilegium. There are ſome paſſages of it corrected in the Spaniſh expurgatory Index, which contains alſo an hiſtory of the books intitled Polyanthea. I imagine that the reader will not blame me for giving here the ſubſtance of that hiſtory. The firſt Polyanthea was printed in the year 1512 (2): it was written by the Monk Dominicus Nanus Mirabellius, the author of the Monoteſſaron Evangeliorum, or the harmony of the four Goſpels. The ſecond was compiled by a bookſeller of Cologne named Maternus Cholinus, and publiſhed in the year 1585 (3). He added to Mirabellius's work all that he thought fit to tranſcribe from three other books which had been publiſhed, I mean the collection of Bartholomæus Amantius, the Sententiarum opus abſolutiſſimum ex probatiſſimis auctoribus excerptum (4). i. e. " A moſt complete work containing ſentences " collected from the moſt approved authors." And an anonymous work printed at Lyons. Cholinus added to all this his own collections. The third, intitled Polyanthea nova, is our Joſeph Langius's work: it was printed at Geneva in the year 1600, at Lyons in the year 1604, at Francfort in the year 1607, and ſeveral times ſince. The fourth, intitled Polyanthea noviſſima, is divided into twenty books, and differs from the preceding only with regard to ſome additions which it contains. The fifth with this title, Florilegium magnum, ſeu Polyanthea floribus noviſſimis ſparſa, was publiſhed at Frankfort in the year 1621. The new additions contained in this work are owing to the Lucubrations of Franciſcus Sylvius Inſulanus. We have mentioned Gruter's Supplements in another place (5): they are in two volumes, ſo that the Florilegium magnum contains three. The 1ſt is of Sylvius Inſulanus, the 2d and 3d, printed at Francfort in the year 1624, were compiled by Gruter.

LANGLE (JOHN MAXIMILIAN DE) Miniſter of the Goſpel, was born at Evreux in the year 1590. He was called to the Reformed Church of Roan in the year 1615, 1615, being then but twenty five years old. He performed there all the functions of a Miniſter during fifty two years, and always with a great reputation, piety and eloquence. We have of him two volumes of Sermons, the one on the eighth Chapter of the Epiſtle to the Romans, the other on ſeveral texts of the holy Scripture, and a Diſſertation in the form of a Letter being a defence of Charles I King of England. Seven years before his death he fell ſick of a palſy, which cauſed an impediment in his ſpeech; but yet he continued to pleaſe and edify by his converſations, which were both pious and witty. He died in the year 1674, at the age of fourſcore and four years, leaving ſeveral children behind him [A], who have inherited his merit and virtue (a).

[A] He left ſeveral children behind him.] SAMUEL DE LANGLE his eldeſt ſon was born at London, and was carried into France when he was but a year old; he continued in that country till the laſt perſecution obliged him to retire into England. He was a miniſter at about the ſame age as his father had been, and ſerved the church of Roan with him during three years. He was afterwards called to Paris in the year 1671, to be a miniſter to the congregation which met at Charenton; he was very much eſteemed in both on account of his ſtrict morals, ſound learning, and conſummate wiſdom: there was an intimate friendſhip between him and Monſieur Claude. The perſecution which the reformed ſuffered in France, and particularly the King's Edict by which the fathers were deprived of their children, forced him to take ſanctuary in England. The Univerſity of Oxford took a pride in conferring the degree of Doctor of Divinity upon him, without his petitioning for it; and King Charles II. ſhewed him how much he eſteemed him by making him a Prebendary of Weſtminſter. He was born in the year 1622. In June 1693, when he was threeſcore and eleven years old, he fell ſick of a violent diſtemper, in which however he enjoyed all the ſtrength of his mind, addreſſing continually excellent diſcourſes to his relations, to his friends, and particularly to his children, to whom he had given the ſame education as he had received from his father. The publick has not yet ſeen any of his writings, but a letter concerning the controverſy between thoſe who are called Epiſcopalians and Preſbyterians in England. Doctor Stillingfleet now Biſhop of Worceſter (1) had it printed at the end of one of his books on the ſame ſubject. But they found amongſt his manuſcripts a treatiſe of the Chriſtian truth, which he had begun ſome years ago, and which he had finiſhed a little before he died. It is hoped that his eldeſt ſon Monſieur de Langle, who is alſo a miniſter, will ſoon publiſh that work. The illuſtrious deceaſed had alſo made ſeveral critical remasks on divers paſſages of the Scripture, and particularly on the Pſalms, which it is thought he would have publiſhed himſelf, had he lived long enough to put them in that order and condition, which it ſeems he deſigned to do (2).

As for the other children of John Maximilian de Langle, the memoirs I quote do not mention a word of them.

(1) He died ſince the firſt impreſſion of this; namely in the year 1699.

LANGUET (HUBERT) born at Viteaux in Burgundy (a), gained a great reputation by his learning and virtue in the ſixteenth Century. Having read a book of Melanchthon in Italy, it created in him ſo ſtrong a deſire to be acquainted with that great man, that he went into Germany on purpoſe to viſit him. There was the moſt intimate friendſhip between them [A]. He charmed him by his agreeable converſation; for with a ſtrong memory he had alſo a very acute judgment (b). He continued a long while

(a) Thuanus, lib. 74. towards the end, under the year 1581.

[A] There was the moſt intimate friendſhip between Melanchthon and him.] All that I have to obſerve upon this ſubject is extracted from Joachim Camerarius's life of Melanchthon. Hunc (Langetum) lectio libri cujuſdam in Italia, ubi tum ipſe degeret, a Philippo Melanchthone compoſiti cupiditate incenderat videndi autorem illius, & ea ſtimulos perpetuo admovens perpulerat tandem ut in Germaniam veniret, & Wittembergam ſe conferret (1). Languet arrived at Wittenberg in the year 1549 (2), and kept ſo conſtantly to Melanchthon that he never left him, except to take a journey now and then. Neque ab ipſo diſceſſit niſi interdum per intervalla quædam peregrinationum quibus mirifice delectabatur, donec Philipi Melanchthonis vita in terris duravit (3). Languet's converſationwas admirable; he diſcourſed very pertinently on the intereſt of Princes, and was perfectly well acquainted with the hiſtory of illuſtrious Men. Erat autem Philippo grata atque jucunda multarum magnarumque rerum, quas ille tenebat, commemoratio, & oratio de Regibus Principibuſque gubernationum, & altis ſapientia, virtute, doctrina præſtantibus horum temporum (4). i. e. "Melanchthon was very "much pleaſed and delighted with his converſations, "in which he gave him an account of ſeveral important affairs, which he remembered very well, and "with his diſcourſes concerning Kings and Princes, "and other men of thoſe times eminent for their "wiſdom, virtue, and learning." His memory never failed him with regard either to the circumſtances of times, or to proper names; and he diſcovered the inclinations of men, and foreſaw the ſucceſs of things with a wonderful ſagacity. The perſon who gives him that character had been particularly acquainted with him. Neque ego, ſays he (5), audivi ullum alterum, qui tam prudenter & certo, & plane, dilucidè, diſertè exponeret, quicquid narrare inſtituiſſet. Non ille in hominum nominibus falli, non indiciis temporum errare, non confundere rerum negotiorumque ſeriem. Erat autem in eo ſingularis ſagacitas in notandis naturis hominum, & conjiciendo, quo quiſque ſuopte ingenio deferretur, & quæ eſſet voluntatis inclinatio. Conſiliorum etiam ſolertiſſimus æſtimator, & eventuum futurorum proviſione admirabilis. i. e. "I never heard a man, "who could expound with ſo much prudence, certainty, plainneſs, evidence, and eloquence, whatever he undertook to relate; he never miſtook the "names of men; he was never wrong in the circumſtances of time; nor did he ever confound the "order and ſeries of things and events. He had "alſo a wonderful ſagacity to diſcover the Characters of men, and to conjecture which way men's "tempers would lead them, and what was the inclination of their minds. He judged almoſt with "certainty of their deſigns, and could moſt wonderfully foreſee the event of things."

Let us add to this what Monſieur de la Mare relates. He obſerves that about the year 1548, a German gave Languet Melanchthon's Common Places or Body of Divinity; that Languet having read that book four or five times over that ſame year in his travels, found all his doubts removed which had a long time perplexed his mind, and conceived an extraordinary eſteem for Melanchthon; that having conſulted the moſt conſiderable divines at Leipſick, he embraced the Proteſtant Religion; and became a pupil of Joachim Camerarius who was profeſſor of polite literature in the Univerſity of Leipſick; that he even lodged at that Profeſſor's houſe; that ſeeing the troubles ariſing in that country he undertook a journey into Italy till ſuch time as he could ſettle in Germany when the publick tranquillity ſhould be reſtored there; that he ſtudied the law a whole year at Padua, and took his Doctor's degree there; that he went afterwards to Bologna, and that at this time, as Joachim Camerarius relates it (6), he was ſo enchanted with the reading of a new book of Melanchthon, that he longed for while one of the first Counsellors of Augustus Elector of Saxony (c), and if we may believe Thuanus, he left that Court only [B] because he was suspected to be one of those who advised Gasper Peucer to publish an Exposition of the Doctrine of the Lord's Supper agreeable to the Geneva Confession of Faith. That Historian adds, that having left the Court of Saxony he retired with the Prince of Orange, and was employed in very important affairs; but that whilst he applied himself to them he fell sick and died at Antwerp September the 50th 1581 at the age of threescore and three years (d). He was very much esteemed by Monsieur du Plessis Mornai [C]. He is thought to be the author of the Oration which was delivered before Charles IX King of France, December the 23d 1570, in the name of several Princes of Germany [D]. It is to him people ascribe the famous Treatise which is intitled, VINDICIÆ CONTRA TYRANNOS [E]; i. e. "A Defence against Tyrants." The Latin Letters which he wrote to Sir Philip Sidney were printed at Frankfort in the year 1639 (e). Those which he wrote in the same tongue to both the Camerarius's, father and son, were published in the year 1646, and have been reprinted with some others (f) in the year 1685: there is a beautiful Preface (g) prefixed to them, which contains a noble Panegyric upon him.

They published at Hall in the year 1699 a large Collection of those Letters, which he wrote to his master the Elector of Saxony [F] during the course of the negociations.

for nothing more passionately, than to return into Germany, to see the author of that book; which he did accordingly in the year 1549.

I find something in this account, which puzzles me; for it is not at all probable, that a man who has conceived such an esteem for Melanchthon, by reading his Body of Divinity, that he takes him for the only wise man in the world (7), should take a journey to Leipsick, continue there some time, and embrace there the Protestant Religion without waiting once upon that divine; and that he should be impatient to make him a visit, only upon reading at Bologna another work of that author. It is not true that Camerarius asserts this other work was the treatise de Anima (concerning the soul) and that it determined Languet to return into Germany. He expresses himself so as to hint, not a second journey, but the first, pepulerat tandem ut in Germaniam veniret. i. e. "Determined "him at last to come into Germany (8)." Lastly it is very strange, that if Languet had been Camerarius's disciple and boarder at Leipsic in the year 1548, Camerarius should yet assert that Langius did not come into Germany till the year 1549, out of a desire to see Melanchthon, occasioned by a book he read in Italy. It is unquestionable that either Camerarius or Monsieur de la Mare must be here mistaken. It is most probable that the former is in the right, for Languet (9) himself relates, that having read Melanchthon's Body of Divinity in Italy in the year 1547, and not being thoroughly satisfied with what is there observed concerning the Lord's Supper, he was determined to go and consult the author himself, and saw him in the year 1549. Would he speak thus, if he had embraced the Protestant Religion at Leipsick, in the year 1547, and if Camerarius had been his professor and his Landlord that same year in the same city?

[B] If we may believe Thuanus, he left that court only, &c.] Thuanus gives us too imperfect an account of this. The exposition of the doctrine of the Lord's Supper was published in the year 1573. Languet was not then at the court of Saxony, but at the Emperor's; and he did not leave that employment till the year 1577 (10), that his Electoral Highness of Saxony had given him leave to retire where ever he pleased; and since that time he always kept up a great correspondence with that Prince, though he applied himself to the affairs of Prince Casimir, or to those of the Prince of Orange. All this is proved by the letters published in the year 1699.

(10) It is the 28th of those which he wrote to Camerarius the son.

[C] He was very much esteemed by Monsieur du Plessis Mornai.] This appears from the following passage (11). "Du Plessis at his arrival at Antwerp "found his wife and children sick. And even a son "whom God had given him in his absence, was "soon after snatched away from him. But besides "this, his intimate friend Monsieur Languet was "dead: Madam du Plessis, though sick herself, had "attended him to his last moment. His dying words "were these. That the only thing which grieved him "was, that he had not been able to see Monsieur du "Plessis again before he died, to whom he would have "left his very heart, had it been in his power. That "he had wished to live, to see the world reformed; but "since it became daily worse and worse, he had no "longer any business in it; that the Princes of these "times were strange men; that virtue had much to "suffer, and little to get: That he pitied Monsieur du "Plessis very much; to whose share a great part of "the misfortunes of the times would fall, and who would "see many unhappy days; but that he must take courage, "for God would assist him. For the rest he begged one "thing of him, in his last farewell, namely that he "would mention something of their mutual friendship, "in the first book he should publish. Which Monsieur "du Plessis did soon after in a short preface to the "Latin translation of his treatise of the Truth of the "Christian religion." The commendations, which he bestows on Languet in that preface, and what others have published upon the same subject, have been carefully collected by Voetius (12). The epitaph alone is worth a panegyrick. You will meet with it in the same Voetius.

[D] He is thought to be the author of the oration which was delivered before Charles IX. . . . in the name of several Princes of Germany.] Monsieur Colomies gives a very strong proof of it in his Melanges Historiques (14) or Historical Miscellanies. He takes it from a letter of Languet to his hero Sir Philip Sidney, dated from Vienna January the first, 1574.

[E] It is to him people ascribe the famous treatise, which is entitled VINDICIÆ CONTRA TYRANNOS.] What I have observed upon this subject in the first sketch of this dictionary is too long to be conveniently inserted in this place; I thought it therefore more proper to refer it to the end of this work in the form of a dissertation.

Some persons suppose him to be the author of the book, entitled de Furoribus Gallicis (15), of the madness of the French: but without any just ground (16). It was thought in his family, that he wrote the famous apology for the Prince of Orange; the reason of this opinion was, that he had sent a copy of it to every one of his relations, as a work of his own composing. And yet Grotius ascribes (17) this apology to another French man, named Peter de Villiers (18).

[F] They have published . . . . a large collection of the letters, which he wrote to his master the Elector of Saxony.] Monsieur Ludovicus professor in the University of Hall has given us this edition. We should be still more obliged to him, had he added to it an index of the principal subjects mentioned in them, and had he taken care to have the errors of the printers or of the transcribers with regard to proper names more exactly corrected. People wonder that he prefixed no preface to this book, and that whereas the editions published in Germany are generally considerable by their indexes, there is none to Languet's letters, where it was wanted more than in a great many other books; because each of these letters contains several particular

The Abbot Nicaiſe had told me for certain, that the author's life writen by Monſieur de la Mare would be prefixed to theſe letters; but this did not prove true. It has been publiſhed by itſelf in the ſame city of Hall, in the year 1700, in 12*mo*. If I had met with it ſoon enough, this article would have been much better, more complete and more connected. [G] We muſt not omit ... a converſation, which Thuanus had with him....] He got acquainted with Languet at the wells of Baden in the year 1579, and was ſo well pleaſed with this man's behaviour, and with his agreeable and learned converſations that he thought he ſhould never be able to part with him. Here follows the elogy he beſtows upon him; I tranſcribe it here, becauſe neither Voetius nor Monſieur Teiſſier mention it in the leaſt. *Argentinâ Badam ventum, ubi Thuanus Languetum vacuum nactus ita mordicus per triduum ei adhæſit, ut ab eo divelli non poſſe putaretur. Ita candor hominis illum ceperat, inſigni probitate, judicio non ſolum in literis, ſed in publicis negotiis, quæ tota vita ſub variis Principibus magna fide geſſerat, præditi ad hæc rerum Germaniæ callentiſs. "From Straſburg we came to "Baden, where Thuanus meeting with Languet, who "was free from all buſineſs, ſtuck ſo cloſely to "him during three days, that it was imagined he "could never part from him: ſo pleaſed was he "with this man's eminent probity, and with his great "judgment not only in the Sciences, but alſo in pub- "lick affairs, in which he had been ingaged all his "life-time, having ſerved ſeveral Princes very faith- "fully: he was particularly ſo well acquainted with "the affairs of Germany, that he could inſtruct the "Germans themſelves in the affairs of their own "country. Thuanus being conſtantly with him all "that time, except when he was drinking the wa- "ters, learnt a great many things from him; and "when he had left that place, he received from him "ſome memoirs, written in his own hand, contain- "ing an account of the preſent ſtate of Germany, "of the rights of the diets, of the number of the "circles, and of the order or rank of the different "councils of that Country, which memoirs he ſtill "keeps by him."

(20) Thuan. de Vita ſua, lib. 2. towards the beginning, pag. m. 1176.

Thuanus alſo relates that Languet made him take notice of a German Lord who was at a window with his wife, and aſked him afterwards with a ſmile, If you were put to your choice, would you prefer a woman as beautiful as ſhe is, before the Archbiſhoprick of Cologne? Thuanus who did not underſtand the deſign of this queſtion, made no anſwer to it. Whereupon Languet explained the whole myſtery to him, and told him that the German Lord was the Count of Iſemburg, who had lately reſigned the Archbiſhopric of Cologne, to marry Jane de Lignes, the Count of Aremberg's ſiſter. He added that the ſuppreſſion of Celibacy was burthenſom to the great Proteſtant Lords in Germany; for whereas in the time of Popery they uſed to put their daughters into Nunneries, with certain hopes to ſee them ſoon raiſed to the dignity of Abbeſſes in ſome rich Nunnery, they were now obliged to provide huſbands for them, though they lived in a country, where people were very prolific (21).

LANSBERGIUS (PHILIP) had a rank amongſt the Mathematicians of the ſeventeenth Century. ☞ LANSDOWNE (GEORGE GRANVILLE, Lord) was deſcended of an antient and noble family derived from Rollo, the firſt Duke of Normandy, and was ſecond ſon of Bernard Granville, who was ſecond ſon of Sir Bevil Granville, killed at the battle of Lanſdowne in 1643, and younger brother of Sir John Granville, who was a chief inſtrument in the Reſtoration, after which he was created Earl of Bath and Viſcount Lanſdowne. The Nobleman, of whom we treat in this article, received the firſt tincture tincture of letters in France under the tuition of Sir William Ellis, a Gentleman bred up under Dr. Buſby, and who has ſince been eminent in many public ſtations. At eleven years of age he was ſent to Trinity College in Cambridge, where he remained five years; but at the age of thirteen was admitted to the degree of Maſter of Arts, having before he was twelve years old ſpoken a copy of Engliſh verſes of his own compoſition to the Ducheſs of York, at his College (a), when her Royal Highneſs paid a viſit to the Univerſity of Cambridge. October the 6th 1688 he wrote a letter from Mar near Doncaſter to his father upon the expected approach of the Prince of Orange's Fleet [A]. In 1690 he wrote a copy of verſes to Mrs. Elizabeth Higgons in anſwer to one ſent him by that Lady in his retirement [B]. In 1696 his Comedy called The She-Gallants was acted at [A] October the 6th 1688 he wrote a letter from Mar near Doncaſter to his father upon the expected approach of the Prince of Orange's Fleet.] It was written before he was twenty two years old, and was as follows:

" Your having no proſpect of obtaining a commiſſion for me, can no way alter or cool my deſire " at this important juncture to venture my life in ſome " manner or other for my King and my country. I " cannot bear living under the reproach of lying " obſcure and idle in a country-retirement, when every " man, who has the leaſt ſenſe of honour, ſhould be " preparing for the field. You may remember, Sir, " with what reluctance I ſubmitted to your commands upon Monmouth's Rebellion, when no importunity could prevail with you to permit me to " leave the Academy. I was too young to be hazarded; " but give me leave to ſay, it is glorious at any age " to die for one's country, and the ſooner, the nobler " ſacrifice. I am now older by three years. My " uncle Bathe was not ſo old, when he was left among " the ſlain at the battle of Newbury; nor you yourſelf, Sir, when you made your eſcape from your " tutors to join your brother at the defence of Scilly. " The ſame cauſe is now come round about again. " The King has been miſled; let thoſe who have miſled him, be anſwerable for it. No body can deny " but he is ſacred in his own perſon, and it is every " honeſt man's duty to defend it. You are pleaſed to " ſay, it is yet doubtful, if the Hollanders are raſh " enough to make ſuch an attempt. But be that as " it will, I beg leave to inſiſt upon it that I may " be preſented to his Majeſty as one, whoſe utmoſt " ambition it is to devote his life to his ſervice, and " my country's, after the example of all my anceſtors. " The Gentry aſſembled at York to agree upon the " choice of Repreſentatives for the country, have prepared an Addreſs, to aſſure his Majeſty they are " ready to ſacrifice their lives and fortunes for him " upon this and all other occaſions; but at the ſame " time they humbly beſeech him to give them ſuch " magiſtrates as may be agreeable to the laws of the " land; for at preſent there is no authority, to which " they can legally ſubmit. They have been beating " for Volunteers at York, and the towns adjacent, to " ſupply the regiments at Hull; but no body will liſt. " By what I can hear, every body wiſhes well to the " King; but they would be glad his Miniſters were " hanged. The winds continue ſo contrary, that no " landing can be ſo ſoon as was apprehended; therefore I may hope, with your leave and aſſiſtance, to " be in readineſs before any action can begin. I beſeech you, Sir, moſt humbly and moſt earneſtly, to " add this one act of indulgence more to ſo many " other teſtimonies, which I have conſtantly received " of your goodneſs, and be pleaſed to believe me always, with the utmoſt duty and ſubmiſſion,

" Sir,

" Your moſt dutiful, and moſt

" Obedient Servant,

" Geo. Granville."

[B] In 1690 he wrote a copy of verſes to Mrs. Elizabeth Higgons, in anſwer to one ſent him by that Lady.] That Lady's verſes were as follow.

I.

Why, Granville, is thy life to ſhades confin'd,
Thou whom the Gods deſign'd
In public to do credit to mankind?
Why ſleeps the noble ardour of thy blood,
Which from thy anceſtors, ſo many ages paſt,
From Rollo down to Bevil flowed,
And then appeared again at laſt,
In thee, when thy victorious lance
Bore the diſputed prize from all the youth of France?

II.

In the firſt trials, which are made for fame,
Thoſe to whom fate ſucceſs denies,
If taking counſel from their ſhame,
They modeſtly retreat, are wiſe.
But why ſhould you, who ſtill ſucceed,
Whither with graceful art you lead
The fiery barb, or with as graceful motion tread
In ſhining balls where all agree
To give the higheſt praiſe to thee?
Such harmony in every motion's found,
As art could ne'er expreſs by any ſound.

III.

So loved and prais'd, whom all admire,
Why, why ſhould you from Courts and Camps retire?
If Myra is unkind, if it can be,
That any nymph can be unkind to thee;
If penſive made by love, you thus retire,
Awake your muſe, and ſtring your lyre;
Your tender ſong and your melodious ſtrain
Can never be addreſt in vain;
She needs muſt love, and we ſhall have you back again.

His Lordſhip's anſwer begins thus:

" Ceaſe, tempting Siren, ceaſe thy flatt'ring ſtrain,
" Sweet is thy charming ſong, but ſung in vain:
" When the winds blow, and loud the tempeſts roar,
" What fool would truſt the waves, and quit the " ſhore?
" Early and vain into the world I came,
" Big with falſe hopes and eager after fame:
" Till looking round me, e'er the race began,
" Madmen and giddy fools were all that ran.
" Reclaim'd betimes I from the liſts retire,
" And thank the Gods, who my retreat inſpire.
" In happier times our anceſtors were bred,
" When virtue was the only path to tread.
" Give me, ye Gods, but the ſame road to fame;
" Whate'er my fathers dar'd, I dare the ſame.
" Chang'd is the ſcene, ſome baneful planet rules
" An impious world, contriv'd for knaves and fools."

He concludes with the following lines.

" Happy the man, of mortals happieſt he,
" Whoſe quiet mind from vain deſires is free;
" Whom neither hopes deceive, nor fears torment,
" But lives at peace, within himſelf content,
" In thought or act accountable to none,
" But to himſelf, and to the Gods alone.
" O ſweetneſs of content! Seraphic joy!
" Which nothing wants, and nothing can deſtroy.
" Where dwells this peace, this freedom of the " mind?
" Where, but in ſhades remote from human kind;
" In flow'ry vales, where nymphs and ſhepherds " meet,
" But never comes within the palace-gate.
" Farewell then cities, courts, and camps, farewell,
" Welcome, ye groves, here let me ever dwell,
" From cares, from buſineſs, and mankind remove,
" All but the Muſes and inſpiring love:
" How ſweet the morn! how gentle in the night!
" How calm the ev'ning! And the day how bright!
" From hence, as from a hill, I view below
" The crouded world, a mighty wood in ſhew,
" Where ſeveral wanderers travel day and night, at the Theatre Royal in Lincoln's-Inn Fields [C]; as his Tragedy intitled, Heroic Love, was in the year 1696 [D]. He wrote likewiſe a Dramatic Poem, intitled, The Britiſh Enchanters: or, no Magic like Love [E], which was performed at the Queen's Theatre in the Hay-Market; and altered Shakeſpeare's Merchant of Venice, under the title of The Jew of Venice, which was acted with great applauſe, and the profits of it were deſigned for Mr. Dryden, but upon his death given to his ſon. In 1702 he tranſlated into Engliſh the ſecond Olynthian of Demoſthenes. He was returned Member for the County of Cornwall in the Parliament which met in November 1710, and ſoon after made Secretary of War, next Comptroller of the Houſhold, and then Treaſurer, and ſworn one of the Privy Council. The year following, by Letters Patents bearing date December the 31ſt, he was created Baron Lanſdowne of Biddeford in Devonſhire. In 1719 he made a ſpeech in the Houſe of Lords againſt repealing the Bill to prevent Occaſional Conformity [F]. His Lordſhip died in February 1735. By his Lady, Mary, widow of Thomas Thynn Eſq; (Father of Thomas Lord Viſcount Weymouth,) and daughter of Edward Villiers Earl of Jerſey, he had iſſue four daughters, Anne, Mary, married March the 14th 1729 to William Graham of Platten near Drogheda in Ireland Eſq; Grace, and Elizabeth. His Lordſhip's works have been printed together at London in 4to and 12mo. His Lady died but a few days before him.

[C] His Comedy called, The She-Gallants.] He afterwards altered this Comedy, and publiſhed it among his other works under the title of Once a Lover, and always a Lover, which, as he obſerves in the preface, "is a new building upon an old foundation. It appeared firſt under the name of the She-Gallants; and "by the preface then prefixed to it is ſaid to have "been but the Child of a Child. By taking it ſince "under examination ſo many years after, the author "flatters himſelf to have made a correct Comedy of "it. He found it regular to his hand; the ſcene "conſtant to one place; the time not exceeding the "bounds preſcribed; and the action intire. It remained only to clear the ground; and to plant, as "it were, freſh flowers in the room of thoſe, which "were grown into weeds, or faded by time; to retouch and vary the characters; enliven the painting; retrench the ſuperfluous; and animate the "action, where it appeared the young author ſeemed "to aim at more than he had yet ſtrength to "perform."

[D] His Tragedy intitled Heroic Love.] Mr. Charles Gildon tell us (1), that "this is one of the beſt of our "modern Tragedies, and writ after the manner of the "antients, which is much more natural and eaſy "than that of our modern Dramatiſts." The Prologue to it was written by Henry St. John Eſq; and the Epilogue by Bevill Higgons Eſq; Mr. Dryden wrote a copy of verſes to our author upon this Tragedy, which begins thus:

(1) Continuation of Mr. Langbaine's Lives and Characters of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets, p. 66.

Auſpicious Poet, wert thou not my friend,
How could I envy, what I muſt commend!
But ſince 'tis nature's law in love and wit,
That youth ſhould reign, and with'ring age ſubmit,
With leſs regret thoſe laurels I reſign,
Which dying on my brow, revive on thine.

[E] The Britiſh Enchanters.] In the preface our author obſerves, that this "was the firſt eſſay of a very "infant muſe, rather as a taſk at ſuch hours as were "free from other exerciſes, than any way meant for public entertainment. But Mr. Betterton having had a "caſual ſight of it many years after it was written, "begged it for the ſtage, where it found ſo favourable "a reception, as to have an uninterrupted run of at "leaſt forty days. The ſeparation of the principal "Actors, which ſoon followed, and the introduction "of the Italian Opera put a ſtop to its farther appearance." Mr. Addiſon wrote the Epilogue.

[F] In 1719 he made a ſpeech in the Houſe of Lords againſt repealing the bill to prevent Occaſional Conformity.] It is printed among his works. In this ſpeech, among other things, he ſays thus: "I always "underſtood the Toleration to be meant as an indulgence for tender conſciences, not a licence for hardened ones; and that the act to prevent Occaſional "Conformity was deſigned only to correct a particular "crime of particular men, in which no ſect of Diſſenters was included, but thoſe followers of Judas, "who came to the Lord's Supper for no other end "but to ſell and betray him. This crime, however "palliated and defended even by ſo many Right Reverend Fathers of the Church, is no leſs than making the God of Truth, as it were in perſon, ſubſervient to acts of hypocriſy; no leſs than ſacrificing "the myſtical Body and Blood of our Saviour to "worldly and ſiniſter purpoſes: an impiety of the "higheſt nature! which in juſtice called for protection, and in charity for prevention. The bare "receiving the Holy Euchariſt could never be intended ſimply as a qualification for an office, but as "an open declaration, an indubitable proof of being "and remaining a ſincere member of the Church. "Whoever preſumes to receive it with any other "view, profanes it; and may be ſaid to ſeek his "promotion in this world, by eating and drinking his "own damnation in the next." H.

LARROQUE (MATTHEW DE) in Latin Larroquanus, one of the moſt illuſtrious Miniſters the Reformed ever had in France, was born at Leirac a ſmall city of Guienne near Agen in the year 1619. He was hardly paſt his youth when he loſt his father and mother, who by their condition and by their virtue were the chief perſons in their city. This misfortune was ſoon followed by the loſs of his whole patrimony; nor could it be known by what fatality it happened, or to whoſe fraud it was owing. But this was ſo far from diſcouraging him, that on the contrary it animated him more ſtrongly to comfort himſelf by ſtudying, and to add to polite Literature, which he had already learnt, the knowledge of Philoſophy, and above all that of Divinity. He made a conſiderable progreſs in theſe Sciences, and was admitted a Miniſter with great applauſe. Two years after he had been inſtalled in his office, he was obliged to go to Paris to anſwer the cavils of thoſe, who intended to ruin his Church. He could not prevent the effect of their artifices, but he happened to meet with ſuch circumſtances as proved favourable to him. He preached ſometimes at Charenton, and was ſo well liked by the Ducheſs de la Tremouille, that ſhe appointed him Miniſter of the Church of Vitré in Britany, and gave him afterwards a great many proofs of the particular eſteem ſhe had for for him; as did alſo the Prince (a) and Princeſs of Tarente, and the Ducheſs of Weimar (b). He ſerved that Church about twenty ſeven years, and ſtudied the ancient Fathers with the utmoſt application. He gave very ſoon public proofs of the progreſs he had made in that ſtudy, for the anſwer he publiſhed to the motives, which a certain Miniſter (c) had alledged for his converſion to Popery, abounded with paſſages quoted from the Fathers. The works which he publiſhed afterwards raiſed his reputation exceedingly [A]. There was an intimate friendſhip between him and Meſſieurs Daillé father and ſon, which was kept up by a conſtant literary correſpondence. The journey he took to Paris procured him the acquaintance of ſeveral illuſtrious men of letters [B]. The Church of Charenton reſolved to call him in the year 1669, but the envy of ſome falſe brethren againſt him was ſo ſtrong, that they had recourſe to ſeveral artifices to prepoſſeſs the Court againſt him, ſo that his Majeſty ſent a prohibition to that Church not to think of calling him, notwithſtanding the Deputy General of the Reformed (d) had offered to anſwer for Monſ. de Larroque's good behaviour. The grief he was under at being calumniated was very great, but the teſtimony of a good conſcience was his comfort. He was choſen to be both Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity at Saumur. He accepted the office of a Miniſter, but refuſed the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity, not thinking it conſiſtent with the ſtudy of Church-Hiſtory, for which he had a very ſtrong inclination. He was preparing himſelf for his journey to Saumur, when the Intendant of the Province (e) forbad him to go thither. The Church of Saumur brought in their complaints againſt this unjuſt prohibition, and petitioned very zealouſly for the neceſſary permiſſion, which ſhe obtained. But Monſieur de Larroque did not think it proper to make an advantage of it, nor to enter upon an employment in ſpite of the Intendant. He continued therefore ſtill at Vitré, where he did not ſuffer his pen to be idle. Three of the moſt conſiderable Churches of the Kingdom choſe him at once, namely the Church of Montauban, that of Bourdeaux, and that of Roan. He accepted the invitation of Roan, and there he ended his life January the 31ſt 1684, at the age of threeſcore and five years, having gained the reputation not only of a learned man, but alſo of an honeſt man, and of [A] The works which he publiſhed afterwards raiſed his reputation exceedingly.] In the year 1665 he publiſhed an anſwer to a book of the Gentlemen of Port-Royal, intitled, L'Office du S. Sacrement, ou Tradition de l'Egliſe touchant l'Euchariſtie, recueilli des Saints Peres & autres Auteurs Eccleſiaſtiques. i. e. "The Office of "the Holy Sacrament, or the Tradition of the Church "concerning the Lord's Supper, collected from the "Holy Fathers and other Eccleſiaſtical Authors." This anſwer was very much eſteemed. Mirâ cum ſolertiâ nimis Catholicorum virorum, qui ut legentibus fucum facerent, SS. Patrum textum vel mutilaverant, vel pravo commento inquinaverant, pias fraudes vel impias dicam neſcio, retexit. Mirati ſunt omnes nihil inter reſpondendum illum fugiſſe, nihilque vindicandum intactum fuiſſe, tantâ ſagacitate ac diligentiâ unum quodque expendens officium, ut in ejus meſſem nemo pedem, vel Spicilegii cauſa intulerit (1). i. e. "He laid open with "great ſubtlety the pious or impious frauds, I know "not how to call them, of thoſe over-catholic men, "who to impoſe upon their readers had caſtrated the "text of the Holy Fathers, or perverted the ſenſe of "it by a wicked commentary. All the world won"dered how he could remember every thing in his "anſwer, and forget nothing that deſerved to be vin"dicated; he had diſcharged his whole taſk with ſo "much ſagacity and diligence, that no man pretended "to undertake it after him, even by way of eſſay." How good ſoever this book was, it was not to be compared with the excellent work, which the ſame author publiſhed ſome years after with this title, Hiſtoire de l'Euchariſtie. i. e. "The Hiſtory of the Euchariſt, or "of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper." There were two editions of it publiſhed in leſs than two years, and it has been tranſlated into Engliſh. The author's name was not put to the firſt edition, but it was prefixed to the ſecond, which was printed in the year 1671. It is true that his name was a little altered through an error of the Printer, who undoubtedly took a q for a g, in the author's manuſcript ſigning (2). Hence it came that ſeveral polemical writers of the Roman Catholic Church called him Larrogue inſtead of Larroque. In the year 1670 he publiſhed at Geneva two Latin diſſertations de Photino & Liberio, in which he took notice amongſt other things of ſome errors committed by Father Petavius concerning the time when Photinus was condemned. He refuted in a third diſſertation what Mr. David had objected againſt the firſt. After this he undertook the defence of his good friend the learned Monſieur Daillé, (in Latin Dallæus) againſt two celebrated Engliſh writers. That work is intitled, Obſervationes in Ignatianas Pearſonii Vindicias, nec non in Beverigii Annotationes. i. e. "Obſervations on Dr. Pearſon's Vindication of Igna"tius, and on Dr. Beveridge's Remarks." He had almoſt finiſhed his reply to Dr. Beveridge's anſwer; but being deſired by ſome friends to give up this controverſy, he very willingly granted them their requeſt. His book of the agreement between the diſcipline of the Reformed Church in France with that of the Primitive Church was publiſhed after the works I have been mentioning, and was followed by a treatiſe on receiving the Sacrament in both kinds, wherein he refutes a work of the Biſhop of Meaux. This is what we find in the author's life, prefixed to a poſthumous work of his, which his ſon Monſieur Daniel de Larroque publiſhed in the year 1688. He does not mention there the treatiſe of the nature of the Church, nor that of the Regale: we muſt therefore add theſe two treatiſes to the former; and as for his poſtumous work, let us obſerve that it is intitled, Matthæi Larroquani Adverſariorum ſacrorum libri tres. Opus poſthumum. Acceſſit Diatriba de Legione fulminatrice, in quo expenduntur Veterum teſtimonia quibus hactenus hæc Hiſtoria vera habita eſt. Authore Daniele Larroquano M. Filio. i. e. "Three Books of Sacred Obſervations, by Matthew "de Larroque: A Poſthumous Work: To which is "added a Diſſertation on the Thundering Legion, "wherein are examined the authorities of the Ancients "on which this hiſtory has hitherto been admitted "as true." Monſieur Daniel de Larroque the ſon, who had already given proofs of his learning and wit, is the author of that diſſertation on the Thundering Legion. He tells us that his father undertook to write a Church-hiſtory, and had finiſhed the three firſt centuries, and begun the fourth. It is to be hoped that the publick will ſome time or other be preſented with that work.

[B] The journey he took to Paris procured him the acquaintance of ſeveral illuſtrious men of letters.] Amongſt others that of Monſieur Juſtel, of Monſieur Amproux (3) and of Monſieur Conrart. They with Meſſieurs Daillé and Monſieur Allix were the Proteſtants, for whom he had the greateſt friendſhip. He alſo made himſelf known to ſeveral learned men of the church of Rome, particularly to the Abbot de Marolles, and to Monſieur de Launoi. They have found amongſt his papers ſeveral letters of theſe two gentlemen, and chiefly of the latter (4).

LASCARIS (CONSTANTINE) left Conſtantinople his native place in the year 1454, and retired into Italy. He was one of thoſe who reſtored polite Literature in the Weſt. He taught it firſt at Milan, whither he was called by Francis Sforza. He went afterwards to meet Cardinal Beſſarion at Rome, who gave him ſeveral proofs of his friendſhip. Then he went to Naples, where he taught Rhetoric and the Greek Tongue with reputation. Laſtly he went to Meſſina, where he ſettled for the remainder of his days. He drew a great many ſcholars thither, and amongſt others Peter Bembus, who was promoted to the dignity of a Cardinal by Pope Clement VII. He bequeathed his Library to the Senate of Meſſina: it contained excellent books, which he had brought with him from Conſtantinople. The Senate had complimented him (a) with the freedom of the City, and had him buried at the expence of the public. His marble tomb, which was in the Church of the Carmelites, has been ruined by the injury of the time, and has never been repaired (b). Our Laſcaris has compoſed ſome works [A].

[A] He compoſed ſome works.] They treat of the Greek Grammar; Aldus Manucius printed them with ſome other ſmall treatiſes of the ſame kind in Greek and Latin. Laſcaris alſo made a collection of the lives of the learned men who flouriſhed anciently in Sicily (1).

LASCARIS (JOHN) ſurnamed Rhyndacenus (a), was of the Houſe of Laſcaris, of which there have been ſome Emperors of Conſtantinople. He took ſanctuary in Italy after the deſtruction of the Eaſtern Empire in the fifteenth Century, and was very kindly received by Laurence de Medicis. This great protector of the Learned judged him proper to collect the beſt manuſcripts that were to be met with in Greece, and therefore he ſent him to the Sultan [A]. This deputation was attended with very good ſucceſs: for (a) Perhaps from a city named Rhyndacus ſituated between the Helleſpont and Phrygia; Stephen of Byzantium mentions it.

[A] Laurence de Medicis .... ſent him to the Sultan.] He ſent him twice to him, if we may credit Paul Jovius, who adds that this Sultan loved Philoſophy, and had a particular eſteem for Laurence de Medicis. It is neceſſary to tranſcribe the very words of this Hiſtorian, becauſe I muſt compare them with Monſieur Varillas's account. Is (Laurentius Medices) tum abſolvendæ Bibliothecæ ſtudio tenebatur. Ob id Laſcarem, ad conquirenda volumina Byzantium cum legatione ad Bajazetem bis miſit: nec defuit honeſta petenti, nuſquam Barbarus Imperator, quippe qui erat totius Philoſophiæ ſtudioſus, Averroiſque ſectator eximius, & de Laurentio privatim tanquam de illuſtri cultore virtutis, optimè ſentiret, quum paulò ante Bandinum percuſſorem fratris, fuga in Aſiam elapſum in catenis ad ſupplicium tradidiſſet (1); ſingulari quidem religionis, atque juſtitiæ exemplo; quòd ille immane ſcelus in templo auſus, merita pœna plectendus cenſeretur. Itaque Laſcares, tuto abdita Græciæ perſcrutatus, quum patriæ opes victoribus ceſſiſſent, nobiliora divitiis antiquæ dignitatis volumina collegit, ut in Italia ſervarentur (2). i. e. "Laurence de "Medicis had a ſtrong deſire to complete his library; "for which purpoſe he ſent Laſcaris twice in the "character of his Embaſſador to Bajazet, that he "might make a collection of books. Nor did the "Sultan, who was by no means a barbarian, re"fuſe to comply with his requeſt; for he had ap"plied himſelf to every part of Philoſophy, and was "an eminent follower of Averroes; he had alſo a "great eſteem for Laurence de Medicis as for a "man diſtinguiſhed by his virtues; he had given "him a proof of it ſome time before, when he ſent "back to him in chains Bandini the murtherer of "his brother, who had made his eſcape into Aſia; "which was a remarkable inſtance of piety and "juſtice; for he judged, that this wicked wretch "having committed that horrid attempt in a church, "ought not to eſcape the puniſhment he deſerved. Laſ"caris therefore, having ſearched all Greece without "the leaſt danger, inſtead of his paternal eſtate, on "which the conquerors had ſeized, brought more "valuable treaſures with him; I mean conſiderable "works of the ancients, to be kept in Italy."

Monſieur Varillas imagined that this account, which Paul Jovius gives us, is too dry and lame, and therefore he has adorned it with a great many circumſtances, as though inſtead of tranſlating faithfully another's work, he had been ordered to turn it into a Romance. Here follows his relation (3). "Laurence de Medicis "received Laſcaris with open arms, and committed "the care of his library to him. It happened one "day, as they were diſcourſing together how they "might improve it, it came into Laſcaris's mind, "that Bajazet II. Emperor of the Turcs had an in"clination for Philoſophy, and that having cauſed "Averroes's commentaries on Ariſtotle to be explain"ed to him, he would not be ſorry that the Peripa"teticks ſhould be ſaved from the general ruin of "literature. Laurence de Medicis promiſed that he "would furniſh him with all things neceſſary for a "voyage to Conſtantinople, if he would undertake it "with ſuch a deſign. Laſcaris took him at his word, "and embarked without any credentials, except a letter "which Laurence de Medicis gave him for his fac"tors. However he found means to get acceſs "to the Grand Seignior, and to be preſented "to his Highneſs, who received him even better "than he expected. They had a pretty long conver"ſation together, and Bajazet ſhewed him all the "eſteem, of which an Infidel is capable, for Laurence "de Medicis's vertue, and gave Laſcaris leave, for his "ſake, to buy all the manuſcripts, that were to be "ſold for the Grand Seignior gave Laſcaris leave to viſit all the Libraries; by which means numberleſs ſcarce and valuable treaſures of Literature were carried into Italy. Laſcaris went afterwards into France, and was eſteemed by Lewis XII, who ſent him Embaſſador to Venice [B]. He went to Rome under Pope Leo X, and took another journey into Greece,

" ſold in his dominions. His Highneſs gave him ſome " perſons to eſcorte and conduct him to all the places " where he knew there had been libraries formerly " and to take care, that thoſe who had plundered them, " might not ſell the books for more than they were " worth. Laſcaris therefore was able to travel conveni- " ently over all Greece, and collect thoſe ſcarce volumes, " which are ſtill kept in the King's library. And yet " he brought but half of them with him in the firſt " voyage he made, becauſe the joy he had to be in " a condition to ſhew to his patron the authors he " had diſcovered, though they were thought to be " loſt for ever, made him return to Florence two " years after he ſet out from thence. But Lau- " rence de Medicis ſent him back again three " months after, and deſired him to continue to " ſearch every place where there had ever been " learned men. Laſcaris waited again on Bajazet, " and received new favours from him. He travelled " over the whole Peloponneſus, and came back as it " were in triumph on board a ſhip laden with the " ſpoils of the Greek tongue. But he had not yet " lodged his manuſcripts in the ſtately building de- " ſigned for them, when Laurence de Medicis died, " leaving Italy in a ſtate of tranquillity, which did " not continue long. The French army entered Flo- " rence, and diſperſed both the books and all the " other furniture of the houſe of Medicis." There are here not only ſeveral circumſtances, which Monſieur Varillas forged to adorn his account and make it more full, but alſo ſome falſifications of facts; for he ſuppoſes, I. That Laſcaris had no credentials for the Grand Signor. If it be ſo, what can be the meaning of theſe words of Paul Jovius, Byzantium CUM LEGATIONE ad Bajazetum miſit? i. e. " He ſent " him to Byzantium in the character of his Embaſſa- " dor to Bajazet?" II. That the ſcarce volumes which Laſcaris collected, are in the French King's library, the French army having plundered the books and other furniture of the houſe of Medicis, under the reign of Charles VIII. To refute that Hiſtorian's aſſertion, we need only to put him in mind of what he has obſerved in another work (4), namely that the houſe of Medicis was plundered by the Florentines, before ever Charles the eighth's troops entered Florence. He aſſerts poſitively that the Florentines diſperſed the prodigious collection of ſtatues, pictures, BOOKS and medals which ſtrangers uſed to behold with admiration in the palace of Medicis. Obſerve that the books of that library, which may have been carried into the French King's library, were brought thither another way, than by the means of Charles the eighth's expedition. They were lodged there much later: See father Jacob in his treatiſe of libraries; he tells you that Catherine de Medicis brought to her huſband Henry II. amongſt other things, the manuſcripts of the famous library of Medicis, which were lodged in the royal library, where they ſtill remain (5).

If it be ever proved that Monſieur Varillas does not ground the account he gives us of Laſcaris in his Anecdotes (or ſecret hiſtory) of Florence, only on Paul Jovius's elogies, I ſhall then examine whether I were in the wrong to charge him with forging moſt of the circumſtances he relates. If he had been acquainted with what Paul Jovius relates in another book, he would have given us a ſtory much more paraphraſed ſtill; it had been a ſcene adorned with a great many decorations. Paul Jovius relates, that the Baſhaw Cherſeoglis obtained leave for John Laſcaris to viſit all the Libraries in Greece, when by Pope Leo the tenth's orders he was ſearching for ancient manuſcripts. Nec illud quidem erga literarum ſtudia eximiæ benignitatis officium prætermittendum videtur, quòd Laſcari, quem ſupra memoravimus Græcorum nobiliſſimo, pariter atque doctiſſimo antiquos codices juſſu Leonis decimi conquirenti, cunctas Græciæ bibliothecas impetrato ad id regio diplomate, liberè excutiendas aperuit (6). i. e. " Nor ought we to omit the fol- " lowing remarkable inſtance of Cherſeoglis's kind " inclination to protect literature: for when Laſcaris, " that moſt noble and learned Grecian, whom we " have mentioned above, was by Leo the tenth's " command ſearching for ancient manuſcripts, Cher- " ſeoglis got him a patent from the Sultan, by which " he was permitted freely to ſearch all the Libraries " in Greece." This hiſtorian had obſerved juſt before, that the Baſhaw, who was turned Mahometan out of ſpite, was ſtill a Chriſtian in his heart, and had a crucifix hid in his cloſet, which he uſed to worſhip in the night time, when no man could be a witneſs to it. He ſhewed this Crucifix to John Laſcaris, who related afterwards all theſe particulars to Paul Jovius. Let us acquaint the reader with the reaſons of that ſpite, which determined Cherſeoglis to abjure the Chriſtian religion outwardly. He was upon the point of marrying a beautiful maiden; when his father who liked her very much took her for himſelf. This injury exaſperated the ſon to ſuch a degree, that he retired to the neighbouring garriſons of the Turks, and thence to Conſtantinople, where Bajazet received him very kindly, and promiſed him one of his daughters. Whereupon the young man turned Mahometan, renounced his name of Stephen, and took the names of Achomat and Cherſeoglis, and became Bajazet's ſon-in-law (7). With what romances, with what flouriſhes ſhould we not meet in the ſecret hiſtory of Florence, if Monſieur Varillas had been acquainted with the following Latin paſſage? Non, ut cæteri ferè omnes à prima pueritia per delectus Chriſtianis parentibus erepti, ſed jam planè vir (Cherſeoglis) ita à majorum religione diſceſſit, ut nunquam ex arcano vera pietatis oblivi ſceretur. Is Cherſechii reguli in Illyrico, ad montem Nigrum filius, quum adamata ei ſponſa quæ erat è Stirpe Serviæ Deſpoti, ad paratas nuptias duceretur, concupivit eam illico, quòd eſſet egregiæ venuſtatis, procaci oculo improbus pater, omnemque pudorem ſuperante libidine, ſibi ſtatim impotenter excluſo filio nuptias celebravit, fruſtra reclamantibus propinquis: qui id facinus filio contumelioſum patrique & domui infame deteſtabantur. Itaque juvenis tantæ injuriæ indignitate commotus, præcipitique actus deſperatione, &c (8). i. e. " Cherſeoglis was not, like a great many others, " ſnatched away ſtom his parents in his childhood, " but being already a grown man, he renounced the " religion of his anceſtors, yet ſo, that he could never " forſake nor forget the truth from the bottom of his " heart. He was the ſon of Cherſechius, a petty " King of Illyricum, near the black Mountain. He " was going to marry the daughter of the governor " of Servia, whom he loved intirely, when his wic- " ked father finding her beautiful, looked upon her " with a luſtful eye, and his luſt baniſhing all ſhame " from his heart, he ſnatched her away from his " ſon and married her himſelf, notwithſtanding all the " endeavours of his relations, who abhorred the fact " which was an injury to the ſon, and a diſgrace to " the father. The young man being highly exaſpe- " rated at ſo great an affront, and hurried away by " a ſudden deſpair, &c."

I leave others to examine whether Paul Jovius did not miſtake the voyages which John Laſcaris made by Laurence de Medicis's command, with that which he ſuppoſes he made under Pope Leo X. Bajazet died before Leo X was choſen Pope, and I queſtion much whether Cherſeoglis had great credit under that Sultan's ſucceſſor; it is certain that he never was any longer able to do John Laſcaris ſervice, than under the reign of Bajazet.

[B] Lewis XII... ſent him Embaſſador to Venice.] I find that he ſent him thither in that character in the year 1503, and in the year 1505. See Peter Bembus's hiſtory of Venice (9), where he relates the ſubject of theſe embaſſies, and gives us the ſubſtance of the embaſſador's orations. Vianoli (10) aſſerts, that in the year 1507 the republick being acquainted with the league of Cambray diſmiſſed Laſcaris, Lewis the twelfth's ambaſſador. But how could the republick be acquainted at that time with a league, which was not concluded till December 1508? See the margin (11).

What Monſieur de Wicquefort relates of this embaſſy is not very obliging. The Pope, ſays he (12), "diſcovered too late the fault he had committed in "chooſing ſo impertinent and ridiculous a Miniſter. "John Laſcaris, whom Lewis XII ſent embaſſador "to Venice in the year 1503, was not much leſs "impertinent. He was of a family, which had for-"merly afforded great Princes to the empire of Con-"ſtantinople, and he was a very learned man; but "he was not in the leaſt acquainted with publick "affairs. He had beſides ſuch a mean countenance, "and lived in ſuch a pitiful and ſordid manner, "that inſtead of appearing like an embaſſador, and "doing honour to the King his maſter, it ſeemed "as though he affected to imitate the falſe modeſty "of thoſe, who applying themſelves entirely to ſpe-"culative Philoſophy, pretend to a wilful poverty, "and are a kind of Cynicks. His commiſſion was "ſo much the more difficult, as he was ordered to "borrow money, and to conclude an alliance, at a "time when the ſenate was not in the leaſt inclin-"ed to favour the Freneh; becauſe the King's "affairs were not in a very good ſituation in Italy. "Laurence Suarez de Figueroa, Embaſſador from Fer-"dinand the Catholick, made an advantage of the "republick's diſcontent, who could not bear that "the King ſhould have ſent them a pedant inſtead of "an Embaſſador; Suares therefore ſaid in a full ſe-"nate, that the republick might judge how the King "of France would treat them, if after the conqueſt "he pretended to make of the kingdom of Naples, "he came to be ſuperior, and in a condition to "oppreſs all Italy without controul, ſince even at a "time when he was in the utmoſt neceſſity, and wan-"ted aſſiſtance, he ſhewed ſuch a contempt for the ſe-"nate, as to ſend them a Greek Philoſopher newly come "from the ſchools."

[C] He returned into France under the reign of Francis I.] Paul Jovius's not mentioning this has been the occaſion why Monſieur Varillas did not mention it neither. His paraphraſe of the Italian hiſtorian is as follows. Laſcaris not knowing what courſe to take, applied himſelf to Charles VIII; and as he was ſkilled in matters of ſtate, he was ſent embaſſador to Venice, and acquitted himſelf worthily of that employment, under this Monarch, and under his ſucceſſor Lewis XII. Laſtly Leo X being raiſed to the Papal Throne, ſent for Laſcaris to Rome to be of his council (13). This, according to Monſieur Varillas, was John Laſcaris's laſt employment. But there is more than one miſtake here; for the Pope did not make him his counſellor, but director of a college for the Greek tongue (14), and after that time this learned man had ſome employment at Paris. I imagine it was that of Library keeper to the King; the reaſon I have to think ſo is taken from a letter, which James Tuſa wrote to Angelo Laſcaris the ſon of John, in which we meet with the following words (15). Jani patris tui excellentem in Romana lingua, nedum veſtra, peritiam pluribus hic verbis ne fuſius perſequar, illud certe dicam Græcæ literaturæ quantum uſu, quantum ſcientia præcellat, ex hoc intelligi vel maximè poſſe, quod eum ex cunctis veſtri generis hominibus de ſententia doctiſſimum delectum Princeps noſter Franciſcus accerſendum eſſe cenſuerit, ut Muſæo quod in hac urbe longe omnium Principe multo celeberrimum ſperamus excitatum iri, propediem, velut alter Apollo præſideat. i. e. "I do not "deſign to expatiate on your Father's eminent "knowledge in the Roman, not to mention your own "language; however I cannot but obſerve, that how "much he excelled both in the practice and in the "Theory of the Greek literature, appears from this, "that our King Francis judged him the moſt proper "man, amongſt all the learned of your nation, to be "intruſted with the care of his library, which is to be "erected in the moſt noble city in the world, and will, we "hope, become much more conſiderable by his care, "who is to preſide over it as another Apollo." Here follows another paſſage, which is not free from errors, but yet it will ſerve us for an argument. I tranſcribe it from the Theatre of the antiquities of Paris compoſed by James du Breul (16), Emanuel Chryſoloras had for his ſcholar Angelo Tifernas, who being at Paris in the year 1523 taught the Greek tongue to John Laſcaris and to William Budæus two learned men, who publiſhed ſeveral noble works, as Genebrard obſerves in his Chronology in theſe words. Anno 1523 Chryſoloræ, qui primus Litteras Græcas Florentiam Coſmo Mediceo Florentino Duce attulit, diſcipulus Tifernas in Franciam venit, Budæumque literas Græcas docuit. Deinde Janus Laſcaris, mortuo Laurentio Medico Mœcenate ſuo. Atque inde literatura Græca, deſerta Italia, ad nos migravit. i. e. "Tifernas a diſciple of Chryſoloras, who firſt intro-"duced the knowledge of the Greek Tongue into "Florence, under the grand Duke Coſmo de Medicis, "came into France in the year 1523, and taught "Budæus the Greek Tongue. After him came John "Laſcaris after the death of his protector Laurence "de Medicis. Thus the Greek literature leaving "Italy came over to us." Now Laſcaris and Budæus, as the ſame author witneſſes, were the firſt at whoſe perſuaſion King Francis I erected the library of Fontainbleau, and eſtabliſhed afterwards Regius Profeſſors, as the ſame author aſſerts. Laſcari & Budæo auctoribus, Franc. "Francis the firſt eſtabliſhed the library of Fontain-"bleau at the perſuaſion of Laſcaris and Budæus; and "in the year 1530 he eſtabliſhed Profeſſors of the "languages and of Mathematicks; for the others "are ſupernumeraries".

There are ſeveral things to cenſure in this paſſage. In the 1ſt place, Tifernas's Chriſtian name was Gregory and not Angelo. 2. He died in the fifteenth century; how could he then come to Paris in the year 1523? Father du Breul had obſerved juſt before, that Chryſoloras, who died at Conſtance April the 15th 1415, had taught him the Greek tongue. Should not this have made du Breul ſenſible, that Tifernas was not alive under the reign of Francis I? 3dly. It is abſurd to pretend that John Laſcaris, who was a Greek by nation, learned the Greek tongue from an Italian (17). It is groſs ignorance to aſſert, that he and William Budæus were young ſcholars in the year 1523. Budæus was then fifty two years old, and was reckoned to be the moſt learned man, and the greateſt Grecian in France. 5. The paſſage quoted by Du Breul from Genebrard ſignifies, that John Laſcaris came into France after Tifernas, and after the death of Laurence de Medicis. Du Breul did not underſtand it. Obſerve that Laſcaris returned into France in the year 1518 (18), and that he was there ſtill in the year 1528 (19). This proves Moreri guilty of a groſs blunder, who aſſerts that Laſcaris died ſoon after Leo X had been choſen Pope.

(17) Tifernas was an Italian.

I do not know how I came to forget a particular which deſerves to be related; namely, that "he is the firſt who invented or at leaſt reſtored and brought again into uſe the "large letters, or to ſpeak more properly, the capital letters of the Greek alphabet, in "which he cauſed ſome moral ſentences and other Greek verſes to be printed in the year "1494, and dedicated them to Peter de Medicis, in a long Epiſtle, wherein he ac- "quaints him with his deſign, and with the great pains he was at, to find out the true "figure of thoſe capital letters, in the moſt antient medals and other monuments of "antiquity (d)."

[E] He underſtood the Latin tongue very well, and he did not judge it beneath him to be a Corrector of the Preſs.] It appears from a paſſage in Eraſmus, which I quote in another place (22), that John Laſcaris was a perfect maſter of the Latin tongue. Paul Jovius beſtows the ſame commendation upon him. Valebat Latina facundia, ita ut verſus, qui extant, perſcriberet (23). i. e. "He was well acquainted with the Latin "tongue, as appears by the verſes he wrote which "are extant." I might add other authorities to theſe two, and to that of Tuſa (24), if it were neceſſary. Obſerve that Laſcaris was not well pleaſed with the elogy which Eraſmus beſtowed on him, in the dialogue entitled Ciceronianus. He joined with the diſcontented perſons, who wrote ſatyrical verſes at Paris againſt the author of that dialogue (25). He was too exceptious on this occaſion, and had no reaſon to be angry; for Eraſmus had expreſſed himſelf as follows. De Jano (Laſcare) quoniam adhuc ſupereſt, dicendum eſt parcius. Morum comitate generis nobilitatem præ ſe fert, acri judicio vir, multæ in Epigrammatibus argutiæ: poterat inter Ciceroniani cognominis candidatos numerari, ni crebræ legationes ac regum negotia revocâſſent hominem à Muſis (26). i. e. "His noble deſcent appears in his polite behaviour: "he is a man of an acute judgment, his epigrams "abound with ſmart touches; and he might have "been reckoned amongſt thoſe, who aim at the title "of Ciceronian, had not his frequent embaſſies and the "affairs of Princes, in which he was engaged, di- "verted his thoughts from the Muſes."

[F] We muſt examine Giraldi's account.] He tells us, that the Family of the Medicis being driven from Florence, Janus Laſcaris wandered for ſome time from place to place, till Leo X invited him to Rome; that after this Pope's death he went into France at the invitation of Francis, who having employed him in the foundation of a College, and of a Library, ſent him Embaſſador to Venice; that he continued a long time there; and that at laſt after the death of Clement VII, he was determined by the many promiſes of Paul III, to return to Rome, where he died ſoon after, leaving behind him a ſon called Angelo (29). Let us obſerve firſt that there is a conſiderable omiſſion here, Giraldi not ſaying one word of the embaſſy to Venice under Lewis XII. Obſerve next, that he ſuppoſes Francis I ſent Laſcaris to Venice in the character of an Embaſſador, but I think he is miſtaken. Laſtly, take notice that he did not know, that this learned Greek was at Rome in the year 1532 under Pope Clement VII. The Oxford catalogue mentions the following works of his. De Diis Samogitarum cæterorumque Sarmatum & falſorum Chriſtianorum: item de Religione Armeniorum, & de initio regiminis Stephani Batorii. i. e. Of the "Gods of the Samogitians, and of the other Sarmatians "and falſe Chriſtians; as alſo of the Religion of the "Armenians, and of the beginning of Stephen Bat- "tori's reign;" printed at Baſil in the year 1615. Hiſtoria de ingreſſu Polonorum in Valachiam anno 1572, & Dantiſcanorum clades anno 1577. i. e. This is the work which Genebrard meant. It is proper to obſerve that it contains a Latin tranſlation made by Laſicius of a manuſcript, which the Great Duke of Muſcovy gave in the year 1570 to a Proteſtant Miniſter, who accompanied the King of Poland's Embaſſadors (2). Qui (Johannes Rokyta) Anno Chriſti 1570 *juſſu ſeniorum ſuorum, Sereniſſimi Regis Poloniæ Legatos in Muſcoviam comitatus, ipſis a ſacris fuit Concionibus. [B] A Bohemian brother or a Picard.] I find in the preface, which is prefixed to his hiſtory of the brethren in Bohemia (4), that he firſt embraced the Reformation of Zwinglius, when the leſſer Poland was reformed by ſome Miniſters, who came from Zurich: that hearing afterwards that the Churches of Great Poland ſhaking off the yoke of Popery followed, ſome the Confeſſion of Augſburg, and others the Confeſſion of Bohemia, he enquired carefully into the reaſons of this diverſity; that he travelled into Bohemia, Germany, and France; that he examined very exactly all that was neceſſary; that there was no diſcipline, nor Confeſſion of Faith he liked ſo well as thoſe of the Bohemian brethren; and that finding there had been but very few and imperfect accounts given of them, he undertook to write their hiſtory; that he applied himſelf ſeveral years to it, and compoſed a work divided into eight parts, and intitled, Origo, Progreſſus, reſque tam proſperæ quam adverſæ, nec non Mores, Inſtituta, Conſuetudineſque Fratrum Bohemicorum. i. e. [C] He publiſhed ſeveral Poems.] One on the battle of Lepanto, another on the death of Pope Pius V. and a great number of epitaphs. Here follow their titles: Auſtriados libri II, ſive de victoria navali Joannis Auſtriaci ad Echinadas Inſulas. De obitu Pii V, ejuſque in Philippum regem ſtudio. De auguſta regalium corporum ex variis tumulis in unum regale templum Eſcurialis tranſlatione, atque illinc in Granatenſe Reginæ Joannæ, Epigrammatum, ſive Epitaphiorum libri II, Granada 1576. The inſcription which I inſerted in the firſt remark, is taken from this laſt mentioned book; and as the author obſerves that he was fifty eight years of age (8), we may know (will it be ſaid) the year of his birth. A man who is in his fifty eighth year in 1576, muſt have been born in 1518. But we muſt not pretend to argue in that manner; for tho' Latinus's epitaphs and epigrams were publiſhed at Granada in 1576, it does not follow that the inſcription we ſpeak of was compoſed that year. This conſequence or inference would not hold, even tho' we ſhould know for a certainty that he was alive at that time; much leſs will it be concluſive, if we ſuppoſe that he died anno 1573, as his epitaph declares (9). Here follows what we may be certain of; ſince he died in 1573, this inſcription was not made after that year; and therefore the author was fifty eight years old, at leaſt, that year, and could not be born after the year 1515. Nicholas Antonio would have deſerved cenſure, for not having mentioned, in caſe he could have done it, the year in which Latinus ſaid he was fifty eight years old. I could wiſh, for the ſingularity of the thing, that our Latinus had found a place among Baillet's Poets.

[D] Clenard brought him from Ethiopia into Spain.] The author of the academy of ſciences (10) ſays, that Clenard left the court of Fez, followed only by an Ethiopian diſciple, with whom arriving in Granada anno 1542, he wrote an elegant letter to the Emperor Charles V. died the ſame year, and left his Ethiopian diſciple (known by the name of John Latinus) ſo well inſtructed in literature, that he wrote a fine Latin poem on the victory . . . of Lepanto. I am perſuaded, for ſeveral reaſons, that there are ſome falſities in this narrative. I. Latinus declares, that he was but a child when he was brought from Ethiopia into Europe (11); which would not be true, had he come out of Africa into Spain, with Clenard in 1542, he being then at leaſt twenty ſeven years of age. II. He ſays that he was brought up and inſtructed, from his infancy (12), with Gonſales Ferdinand of Corduba his maſter, who at laſt gave him his liberty (13). Now would he have ſpoke in this manner, had he owed all his erudition to James Clenard, as Bullart ſuppoſes? III. He does not ſay any thing that bears the leaſt relation to Bullart's account. My third obſervation perſuades me, that Aubertus Miræus is miſtaken in ſaying (14), Diſcipulum reliquit (Clenardus) Joannem Latinum Æthiopem (quod prodigii ſimile eſt) Rhetorem Illiberitanum, cujus Poëma exſtat panegyricum de navali Jo. Auſtriaci ad Echinadas Inſulas victoria. i. e. "Clenard left "a diſciple, John Latinus, a Moor, (which is next "to a prodigy) a ſchoolmaſter in Granada, whoſe "panegyrical poem written on the naval victory of "Don John of Auſtria at the iſlands Echinades (Le- "panto) is extant at this time." Doubtleſs Bullart was miſled by this paſſage of Aubertus Miræus, but then he added to it an error of his own, by ſuppoſing that James Clenard brought Latinus into Europe anno 1542. Probably his error proceeded from what follows. Clenard relates (15), that having been ſent to Braga to ſet up a ſchool there, he brought forth his three Mooriſh ſervants before his ſcholars, and commanded them in the Latin tongue, to perform certain poſtures. Theſe Moors had learnt Latin enough, by rote, at his houſe, to be able to underſtand all his orders in that language. Erant mihi Servuli tres, quos ſupra (16) nominavi, non ſane periti Grammatici, verum domeſtica conſuetudine tantum conſecuti, ut me perciperent, quicquid dicerem, & contra Latine reſponderent, licet identidem peccantes in Priſcianum. Hos in ludum productos, dialogos agere juſſi, ſpectantibus diſcipulis, & cum eis multis de rebus ſermonem miſcebam, attentiſſimo auditori, adeo miraculi loco fuit, quod Æthiopes loquerentur Latine. Heus Dento, inquam, ſalta, &c. From this incident it might eaſily have been concluded, that John Latinus had been a diſciple of that learned Grammarian.

[E] Moreri has committed . . . . very groſs errors.] It is not true that Gonſales Ferdinando of Corduba made our Latinus a ſlave, in his infant years. The inſcription I have copied (17) intimates manifeſtly, that he and Latinus were pretty near of the ſame age; and therefore Gonzales, when but in his infancy, muſt have undertaken expeditions into Africa, or by ſea, if it were true that he made Latinus a ſlave. I would fain know why Moreri did not endeavour to tranſlate his originals faithfully. He had Nicholas Antonio's book before him; why therefore did he not content himſelf with ſaying, that Latinus was the ſlave of Gonzales Ferdinando of Corduba? Does this ſignify that Gonzales himſelf had taken this Ethiopian, and afterwards (18) took him to Spain? II. Latinus's employment in Granada was not merely to teach the young clerks or ſtudents of the Cathedral; he taught publickly Latin to all comers, this being the cuſtom of the ſchools of Cathedral Churches, as Joli has ſhewn in one of his books. III. It ſhews great ignorance to ſpeak of a poem entitled Auſtriados (19). 'Tis in vain to endeavour an excuſe from the original, ſince Nicholas Antonio does not employ the genitive Auſtriados, without adding libros duos.

[B] Married the Earl of Devonſhire to Penelope, then wife of Robert Lord Rich; which action gave him afterwards the moſt ſenſible regret.] The Earl being a younger brother of William Lord Montjoy, and while his brother lived, known only by the name of Sir Charles Blount, had bore a ſtrong affection to the Lady Penelope, daughter of Walter Devereux Earl of Eſſex; and there paſſed between them ſome aſſurances of a future marriage. But her friends looking on him as a younger brother, conſiderable only for his dependence at the Court, choſe rather to diſpoſe her in marriage to Robert Lord Rich, a man of independent fortune, and a known eſtate, but otherwiſe of an uncourtly diſpoſition, unſociable, auſtere, and no very agreeable Converſation to her. Againſt this Blount had nothing to plead in Bar, the promiſes, which paſſed between the Lady and him, being made in private, no witneſſes to atteſt to it there, and therefore not amounting to a Pre-contract in due form of law. But long ſhe had not lived with the Lord Rich, when the old flames of her affection unto Blount began to kindle again in her; and if the Sonnet in the Arcadia, (a neighbour mine not long ago there was &c.) be not too generally miſconſtrued, ſhe made her huſband the ſole inſtrument to acquaint him with it. But whether it were ſo or not, it is certain, that having firſt had their private meetings, they afterwards converſed more openly and familiarly with one another, than might ſtand with honour to either, eſpecially when by the death of his elder brother, the title of Lord Montjoy, and the eſtate remaining to it, had accrued to him. Finding her, at his return from the wars in Ireland, to be free from the Lord Rich by a divorce, and not a voluntary ſeparation only à menſâ & thoro, he thought himſelf obliged to make her ſome reparation in point of honour by taking her into his boſom as his lawful wife. Beſides, he had ſome Children by her before ſhe was actually ſeparated from the bed of Lord Rich, (ſome of which afterwards attained to titles of honour) whom he conceived he might have put into a capacity of legitimation by his ſubſequent marriage, according to the rule and practiſe of the civil laws, in which it paſſes for a maxim, that ſubſequens matrimonium legitimat prolem. And to that end he dealt ſo powerfully with his Chaplain, that he diſpoſed him to perform the rites of that ſolemnization; which was accordingly done at Wanſteed December 26, 1605 (3). "Nor did he want, ſays "Dr. Heylin (4), ſome reaſons to induce him to it "(beſides the perſuaſion of his friends) which might "have gained upon a man not ſo much concerned in "it as he was, and may be uſed for his excuſe, if "not for his juſtification alſo. He found by the averment of the parties, that ſome aſſurances of marriage had paſſed between them before ſhe was eſpouſed to Rich; which though they could not "amount to a pre-contract in Foro Judicii, in a "court of judicature, yet he might ſatisfy himſelf "in the truth thereof in Foro conſcientiæ, in the court "of his own private conſcience. And thereupon he "might conclude, that being ſatisfied in the reality, "and truth of thoſe aſſurances, and finding that "Rich had quitted his pretenſions to her by a formal ſentence of divorce, he might conceive it lawful for him to perform that ſervice, which was "required at his hands. He had found alſo three "opinions touching the lawfulneſs or unlawfulneſs of "ſuch marriages, which are made after a divorce. "The firſt, that ſuch marriages are lawful unto neither party, as long as either of them liveth, which "is the doctrine of the Papiſts, determined poſitively in the council of Trent. The ſecond, That "ſuch marriages are lawful to the party wronged, "but not unto the guilty alſo; which opinion is maintained by ſome of the Calviniſts, and divers of the "antient writers. The third, that both the innocent "and the guilty party may lawfully marry, if they "pleaſe; which Maldonate (o) makes to be the general opinion of the Lutheran and Calvinian miniſters, as alſo of ſome Catholick Doctors. And then "why might he not conceive that courſe moſt fit to "be followed, in which all parties did agree, than "either of the other two, which was commended "to him but by one party only? And though he "followed in this caſe the worſt way of the three, "yet may it ſerve for a ſufficient argument, that he "was no Papiſt, nor cordially affected unto that religion, becauſe he acted ſo directly againſt the doctrines and determinations of the Church of Rome. "If any other conſiderations of profit, preferment, "or compliance did prevail upon him (as perhaps "they might) they may with charity be looked on "as the common incidencies of human frailty, from "which the holieſt and moſt learned men cannot "plead exemption." But whatſoever motive either the Earl or he had to put a fair colour upon the buſineſs, it is certain, that it ſucceeded well with neither. The Earl found preſently ſuch an alteration in the King's countenance towards him, and ſuch a leſſening the value, which he formerly had ſet on him, that he was put to a neceſſity of writing an apology to defend his action; but finding how little impreſſion it made both in Court and country, he became ſo uneaſy upon it, that he died before the end of the year following. Nor did his Chaplain bear it long without ſuch a check of conſcience, as made him turn the annual feſtival of St. Stephen into an anniverſary faſt, and compoſed a prayer for that occaſion. And though I doubt not, continues Dr. Heylin (†), but that that the Lord in mercy did remit this fault, yet was he not ſo mercifully dealt with at the hands of men, by whom it was ſo frequently and reproachfully caſt in the way of his preferment, that he was fain to make the Duke of Buckingham acquainted with the ſtory of it, and by his means to poſſeſs King Charles, his gracious maſter, with the truth thereof; ſo long it was before his enemies had deſiſted from preſſing this unhappy error to his diſadvantage.

[C] A Sermon, for which he was queſtioned by Dr. Airay, the Vice-Chancellor.] The Vice-Chancellor excepted againſt it as containing in it ſundry ſcandalous and Popiſh paſſages; "the good man, ſays Dr. Heylin (5), taking all things to be matter of Popery, "which were not held forth unto him in Calvin's Inſtitutes; conceiving that there was as much idolatry in "bowing at the name of Jeſus, as in worſhipping the "Brazen Serpent, and as undoubtedly believing, that "Antichriſt was begotten on the Whore of Babylon, as "that Pharez and Zara were begotten on the body of "Tamar. Which advantage being taken by Dr. "Abbot, he ſo violently perſecuted the poor man, and "ſo openly branded him for a Papiſt, or at leaſt very "Popiſhly inclined, that it was almoſt made an hereſy "(as I have heard from his own mouth) for any one "to be ſeen in his company, and a miſpriſion of he-"reſy to give him a civil ſalutation as he walked the "ſtreets." Dr. Heylin obſerves likewiſe (6), that this ſcandal being raiſed at Oxford, it was not long before it flew to Cambridge alſo, when Mr. Joſeph Hall (afterwards Biſhop of Norwich) was exerciſing his pen in the way of epiſtles, in one of which, inſcribed to Mr. *W. "I would I knew where "to find you? then I could tell how to take direct "aim; whereas now I muſt pore and conjecture. "The Lord "Chancellor Elſmere's complaint againſt me to the "King at Chriſtmaſs 1610. He was incited againſt "me by Dr. Abbot, Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury "Elect." Dr. Heylin informs us (9), that the Archbiſhop inſinuated to the Chancellor, that "Dr. Laud "was at the leaſt a Papiſt in heart, and cordially addict-"ed to Popery; that he kept company with none "but profeſſed and ſuſpected Papiſts; and that if he "were ſuffered to have any place of government in the "Univerſity, it would undoubtedly turn to the great "detriment of religion and diſhonour of his Lord-"ſhip." The Chancellor hereupon informed the King of all that had been told him concerning Dr. Laud, which was like to have deſtroyed his hopes of being choſen Preſident of St. John's College Oxford, notwithſtanding his petition to the King to believe otherwiſe of him, if Biſhop Neile had not acquainted his Majeſty with the abilities of Dr. Laud, and the old grudge which Abbot had conceived againſt him.

[E] Elected Preſident of St. John's College; but his election being diſputed, it was at laſt confirmed by his Majeſty.] Rawlinſon, once a Fellow of the ſame College, and afterwards Principal of Edmund Hall, was a competitor for the place of Preſident. Each of them having prepared his party, the fellows proceeded to an election May the 10th 1611. The ſcrutiny being made, and the election at the point of being declared, one of the Fellows of Rawlinſon's party, ſeeing which way the buſineſs was like to go, ſnatched up the paper, and tore it ſuddenly to pieces. The nomination being thus fruſtrated, an appeal was made to the King, who ſpent three hours in giving audience to both parties; and upon full conſideration of the proofs and allegations on either ſide, gave ſentence in favour of Dr. Laud on the 29th of Auguſt 1611; upon which he was ſworn and admitted Preſident. He could not, for example ſake, but inflict ſome puniſhment on the perſon, who had torn the ſcrutiny; but knowing him to be a man of hopeful parts, induſtrious in his ſtudies, of a courage not to be diſliked, he not only releaſed him from the cenſure, under which he lay, but took him into ſpecial favour, truſted him in all his weighty buſineſſes, made him his Chaplain, preferred him from one good benefice to another, married him to his brother's daughter, and

It was publiſhed in the name of R. B. i. e. Richard Baylie, afterwards Preſident of St. John's College in Oxford, and Dean of Saliſbury, who was at that time one of Biſhop Laud's Chaplains. It was printed with Dr. Francis White's Reply to Jeſuit Fiſher's Anſwer to certain Queſtions. This Conference is ſtiled by Hammond L'Eſtrange Eſq; (14) the exacteſt maſter-piece of Polemic Divinity of any extant at that time; and he obſerves, that the Biſhop declared himſelf ſo little theirs [the Papiſts] as he had for ever diſabled them from being ſo much their own as before they were. Sir Edward Deering alſo, his profeſſed adverſary, in the preface to his book of Speeches (15), tells us, that the Biſhop in this Conference, eſpecially in the laſt half of it, had muzzled the Jeſuit, and ſhould ſtrike the Papiſts under the fifth rib, when he was dead and gone; and being dead, that whereſoever his grave ſhould be, Paul's ſhould be his perpetual monument, and his own book his epitaph. It was reprinted by him, with great improvements in 1637. It was anſwered by Thomas Carwel alias Thorold, a Jeſuit, born in Lancaſhire, in a book intitled, Labyrinthus Cantuarenſis: Or Dr. Laud's Labyrinth: Being an Anſwer to the late Archbiſhop of Canterbury's Relation of a Conference between himſelf and Mr. Fiſher &c. Paris 1659 in folio. This was replied to by Dr. Meric Caſaubon in a treatiſe intitled, Of the Neceſſity of Reformation in and before Luther's time, and what (viſibly) hath moſt hindered the Progreſs of it: Occaſioned by ſome late virulent books written by Papiſts, but eſpecially by that intituled, Labyrinthus Cantuarenſis. Here, beſides ſome other Points, the grand Buſineſs of theſe Times, Infallibility, is fully diſcuſſed. London 1664 in 4to. [I] In October 1623 he fell under the diſpleaſure of Dr. John Williams, Biſhop of Lincoln, then Lord Keeper of the Great Seal.] We find the following paſſages in his Diary (16). "October 3d Friday. I was "with my Lord Keeper, to whom I found ſome had "done me very ill offices; as he was very jealous of "Lord Buckingham's favour. October 31. I ac- "quainted my Lord Duke of Buckingham with that "which paſſed between the Lord Keeper and me. "December 15th. on Monday morning, I went "about buſineſs to my Lord Buckingham. Wedneſday, my Lord Duke of "Buckingham told me of the reconciliation and ſub- "miſſion of my Lord Keeper, and that it was con- "feſſed unto him, that his favour to me was a chief "cauſe. Invidia, quo tendis? &c. At ille de novo "fœdus pepigit." Dr. Heylin obſerves (17), that while the Duke of Buckingham was with Prince Charles in Spain, the Lord Keeper, and Lord Treaſurer Cranfield, with others of the court endeavoured to ruin the Duke's intereſt with the King: of all which practices and proceedings Laud gives intelligence to the Duke, and receives back again Directions in his actings for him. From hence proceeded the conſtancy of Affection, which the Duke carried to him for ever after the animoſity between Laud and Williams; the fall of Cranfield firſt, and of Williams afterwards, Laud by his diligence and fidelity overtopping all.

posed, and executed that office till the first of May following (x). February the 2d 162⅝ he officiated at the Coronation of his Majesty as Dean of Westminster [K], the King having commanded Bishop Williams, the Dean of that Church, not to be present at the ceremony (y). June the 20th 1626 he was nominated to the See of Bath and Wells, to which he was elected August the 16th (z). In the beginning of October the same year he was made Dean of the Royal Chapel (aa); and April the 29th 1627 was made Privy Counsellor to his Majesty (bb). July the 15th 1628 he was translated to the Bishopric of London (cc). About this time his antient acquaintance Sir James Whitelocke a Judge, used to say of him, that "he was too full of fire, though a just and good man, and "that his want of experience in State-matters, and his too much zeal for the Church, "and heat, if he proceeded in the way he was then in, would set this Nation on "fire (dd)." April the 12th 1630 he was elected Chancellor of the University of Oxford (ee). In May 1633 he attended the King into Scotland, and June the 15th was sworn Counsellor of that Kingdom (ff). August the 4th the same year, upon the death of Archbishop Abbot, the King resolved to advance him to the See of Canterbury (gg). The same morning a person came to him, and offered him to be a Cardinal [L]. September [K] Officiated at the Coronation of his Majesty as Dean of Westminster.] It was objected to him in the time of his fall, that in the digesting the form of the Coronation, he had altered the Coronation Oath, making it more advantageous to the King, and less beneficial to the people than it had been formerly; from which imputation the King cleared both himself and the Bishop, when they were both involved by common speech in the guilt thereof. To clear this point, we shall first set down the Oath itself, as it was taken by the King, and then the King's defence for his taking it. The form of the oath is as follows (18).

Archbishop. Sir, will you grant, keep, and by your oath confirm to your people of England the laws and customs to them granted by the Kings of England, your lawful and religious predecessors, and namely, the laws, customs and franchises granted to the clergy by the glorious King Saint Edward your predecessor, according to the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel established in this Kingdom, and agreeable to the prerogative of the Kings thereof, and the ancient customs of this Realm? King. "I grant and promise to keep them." Archbishop. Sir, will you keep peace and godly agreement entirely (according to your power) both to God, the holy Church, the Clergy, and the People? King. "I will keep it." Archbishop. Sir, will you (to your power) cause law, justice, and discretion in mercy and truth to be executed in all your judgments? "I "will." Archbishop. Sir, will you grant to hold and keep the law and rightful customs, which the commonalty of this your kingdom have; and will you defend and uphold them to the honour of God so much as in you lieth? King. "I grant and promise so to do." Then one of the Bishops reads this admonition to the King before the people with a loud voice: Our Lord and King, we beseech you to pardon, and to grant, and to preserve unto us, and to the Churches committed to our charge, all canonical privileges and due law and justice, and that you would protect and defend us, as every good King in his kingdoms ought to be protector and defender of the Bishops and the Churches under their government. The King answers: "With a willing and devout "heart I promise and grant my pardon, and that I "will preserve and maintain to you and the Churches "committed to your charge all canonical privileges "and due law and justice; and that I will be "your protector and defender, to my power, by the "assistance of God, as every good King in his King-"dom in right ought to protect and defend the "Bishops and Churches under their government." Then the King ariseth, and is led to the Communion-Table where he makes a solemn Oath in sight of all the people to observe the premises; and laying his hand upon the book, saith, The things, which I have before promised, I shall perform and keep: So help me God, and the contents of this book. King Charles I. in his answer to a printed book, entitled, A Remonstrance, or, The Declaration of the Lords and Commons now assembled in Parliament, the 26th of May 1642. observes, that he had taken this oath at his Coronation, warranted, says he, and enjoined to it by the custom and directions of our predecessors; and the ceremony of their and our taking it they may find in the record of the Exchequer. Bishop Laud tells us himself (19), that upon his trial, on the eleventh day of hearing, May 27th 1644, Mr. Serjeant Wild charged him with two alterations in the body of the King's Oath: one added, namely these words, agreeable to the King's prerogative; the other omitted, namely, these words, Quæ populus elegerit, which the people have chosen, or shall chose. "For this latter, says he, the "clause omitted, that suddenly vanished; for it was "omitted in the oath of King James, as is confessed by "themselves in the printed votes (*) of this present Par-"liament. But the other highly insisted on, as taking "off the total assurance, which the subjects have by the "oath of their Prince for the performance of his laws. "First, I humbly conceive, this clause takes off none of "the people's assurance, none at all: for the King's just "and legal prerogative and the subjects assurance for "liberty and property may stand well together, and "have so stood for hundreds of years. Secondly, that "alteration, whatever it be, was not made by me; "nor is there any interlining or alteration so much "as of a letter found in that book. Thirdly, if "any thing be amiss therein, my predecessor gave "that oath to the King, and not I. I was merely "ministerial both in the preparation and at the "coronation itself, supplying the place of the Dean "of Westminster. After this day's work was ended, "it instantly spread all over the city, that I had al-"tered the King's oath at his coronation, and from "thence into all parts of the Kingdom; as if all "must be true, which was said at the bar against "me, what answer soever I made; the people and "some of the Synod now crying out, that this one "thing was enough to take away my life. And tho' "this was all that was charged this Day concerning "this oath, yet seeing how this fire took, I thought "fit the next day that I came to the bar to desire "that the books of the coronation of former Kings, "especially those of Queen Elizabeth and King "James, might be seen and compared, and the co-"pies brought into the court, both from the Exche-"quer, and such as were in my study at Lam-"beth; and a fuller inquisition made into the busi-"ness, in regard I was as innocent from this crime, "as when my mother bare me into the world. A "salvo was entered for me upon this; and every "day that I after came to the bar, I called upon this "business; but somewhat or other was still pretended "by them, which managed the evidence, that I "could not get the books to be brought forth, nor "any thing to be done till almost the last day of "my hearing. Then no books could be found in "the Exchequer, nor in my study, but only of King "James; whereas when the keys were taken from "me there were divers books there, as is confessed in "the printed votes of this Parliament; and one of "them with a watchet sattin cover, now missing. "And whether this of King James (had not my Se-"cretary, who knew the book, seen it drop out of "Mr. Prynne's bag) would not have been concealed "too, I cannot tell. At last, the book of King James's "coronation, and the other urged against me con-"cerning King Charles, were seen and compared "openly in the Lord's house, and found to be the "same oath in both, and no interlining or alteration "in the book charged against me."

[N] Made a ſpeech in the Star-chamber at the cenſure of Dr. John Baſtwick, Henry Burton, B. D. and William Prynne, Eſq;] It was printed at London 1637 in 4to. In this ſpeech, he declares (22), I can ſay it clearly and truly, as in the preſence of God, I have done nothing as a Prelate, to the uttermoſt of what I am conſcious, but with a ſingle Heart, and with a ſincere intention for the good government and honour of the Church, and the maintenance of the orthodox truth and religion of Chriſt profeſſed, eſtabliſhed, and maintained in the Church of England. He afterwards obſerves (23) with regard to the Prelates, that " he aſſured him-" ſelf, they could not be ſo baſe, as to live Prelates " in the Church of England, and labour to bring in " the ſuperſtitions of the Church of Rome, upon " themſelves and it. [P] In the beginning of the long Parliament he was attacked on account of the Canons made by the Convocation in May 1640.] The Parliament, which met April 13th, had been diſſolved May 5th; but the Archbiſhop perſuaded the King to continue the ſitting of the Convocation by a new commiſſion granted to them for the concluſion of ſuch matters, as were then in treaty among them. Yet by the opinion of Finch, Manchеſter, Littleton, Banks, Heath, and Shelton, ſignified to the King, the Convocation called by the King's Writ, was not to diſſolve but by the King's Writ, notwithſtanding the diſſolution of the Parliament. But it was held beſt, in order to clear all objections, to continue them by this new commiſſion (25). In this Convocation there were made ſeventeen canons. The firſt, concerning the regal power. The ſecond for the better keeping of the day of his Majeſty's moſt happy inauguration. The third for ſuppreſſing the growth of Popery. The fourth againſt Socinianiſm. The fifth againſt Sectaries. The ſixth entitled, An oath enjoyned for the preventing of all innovations in doctrine and government: and the Oath itſelf was as follows: " I A. B. do ſwear, that I do approve " the doctrine and diſcipline or government eſtabliſh-" ed in the Church of England, as containing all " things neceſſary to ſalvation. And that I will not " endeavour by myſelf or any other, directly or in-" directly, to bring in any Popiſh doctrine, contrary " to that, which is ſo eſtabliſhed. Nor will I ever " give my conſent to alter the government of this " Church by Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Deans, and Arch-" deacons, &c. as it ſtands now eſtabliſhed, and as " by right it ought to ſtand; nor yet ever to ſubject " it to the uſurpations and ſuperſtitions of the See of " Rome. By this canon it was ordered, that all maſters of Art, (the ſons of Noblemen only excepted) all Bachelors of Divinity, Law, or Phyſic, all that were licenſed to practiſe Phyſic, all regiſters, notaries, and proctors, all ſchool-maſters, all ſuch as being natives or naturaliz'd, do come to be incorporated into the Univerſities here, having taken any degree in any foreign Univerſity, ſhould be bound to take this oath; and that it ſhould be adminiſter'd to all of the perſons above-named reſiding in any Univerſity by the governors of their ſeveral houſes; and by the Biſhop reſpectively to all, who ſhould from thenceforth be admitted to holy orders, or receive any inſtitution, collation, or licenſe for the ſerving of any cure; with ſeveral penalties to all beneficed perſons, and all ſuch as were then in any Eccleſiaſtical dignity, for their refuſal of the ſame; that is to ſay, a ſuſpenſion ab officio for the firſt refuſal, a beneficio & officio for the ſecond, and deprivation for the third, a month's deliberation being granted betwixt each refuſal. The ſeventh canon was entitled, A declaration concerning ſome rites and ceremonies. The eighth of preaching for conformity. The ninth entitled, One book of articles to be uſed at all parochial viſitations. The tenth concerning the converſation of the clergy. The eleventh concerning Chancellors patents. The twelfth entitled, Chancellors alone not to cenſure any of the clergy in ſundry caſes. The thirteenth, entitled, Excommunication

Theſe ſeven ſermons were reprinted at London in 8vo 1651. The memorables of King James I. of famous memory. They are twenty nine in number, and were printed with the Archbiſhop's Diary by Mr. Prynne. They are called by the author, Short Annotations upon the life and death of the moſt Auguſt King James. They were drawn up at the deſire of George Duke of Buckingham. Anſwer to the remonſtrance made by the Houſe of Commons in June 1628. Officium quotidianum: or a manual of private Devotions. London 1650 and 1663 in 8vo. A ſummary of Devotions. London 1667 in 12mo, publiſhed according to a copy written with his own hand in the library of St. John's College in Oxford. Diary of his life. This, which is partly written in Latin, but moſtly in Engliſh, was publiſhed by Mr. Prynne in his Breviate of the life of William Laud, Archbiſhop of Canterbury: extracted (for the moſt part) verbatim out of his own Diary, and other writings under his own hand. Collected and publiſhed at the ſpecial inſtance of ſundry honourable perſons, as a neceſſary prologue to the hiſtory of his tryal, for which the criminal part of his life is ſpecially reſerved. London 1644 in fol. But Mr. Wharton obſerves (27) that Mr. Prynne did not publiſh the Diary intire, nor faithfully, as far as he did publiſh it, but altered, mangled, corrupted, and gloſſed in a moſt ſhameful manner, accompanied with deſperate untruths, as the Archbiſhop complains in this hiſtory, and therefore addeth: For this Breviate of his, if God lend me life and ſtrength to end this (hiſtory) firſt, I ſhall diſcover to the world the baſe and malicious ſlanders, with which it is fraught. This the Archbiſhop wrote, when he deſpaired that ever his Diary ſhould be recovered out of thoſe vile hands, in which it then was, and be publiſhed faithfully and intirely, which would be the moſt effectual diſcovery of the baſeneſs and malice of Prynne therein. Mr. Wharton therefore prefixed to the Hiſtory of the Troubles and Tryal of Archbiſhop Laud an exact and compleat edition of the Diary, which came into his hands. Hiſtory of his Troubles and Tryal written during his impriſonment in the tower. He begun to write this before the end of the year 1641, and continued it from time to time till the 3d of January 1643, which was the ſeventh day before his execution. He wrote in the firſt leaf of it, Non appoſui manum ultimam. W. Cant. It was publiſhed by Mr. Wharton in 1694 in fol. with ſeveral marginal notes by Archbiſhop Sancroft. To this Mr. Wharton has added, 1 His ſpeech at his death on the ſcaffold. 2. His laſt will and teſtament, made in the Tower 13 January 1643. 3. Several paſſages of his conference with Fiſher the Jeſuit, from the edition of 1639, and referred to in the preceding hiſtory; beſides other paſſages from other books, which are alſo referred to in the ſaid hiſtory. 4. His anſwer to the ſpeech of the Lord Say and Seal, touching the Liturgy: dated in the Tower December the 3d 1641. 5. His Annual accounts of his Province preſented to the King in the beginning of every year, with the King's Apoſtills, or marginal notes. Thoſe Annual accounts are from 1633 to the end of 1639. 6. His Notes on Rome's Maſter-piece or the grand conſpiracy of the Pope and his Jeſuited inſtruments to extirpate the Proteſtant Religion, &c. which book is there reprinted. 7. Several Letters, of which a large one to Sr. Kenelm Digby upon his embracing the Roman Catholic religion is dated March 27th 1636. After Mr. Wharton's death there was printed The ſecond Volume of the remains of Archbiſhop Laud, written by himſelf, collected by Mr. Henry Wharton, and publiſhed, according to his requeſt by the reverend Mr. Edmund Wharton, his Father. London 1700 in fol. This Volume contains, I. An anſwer to the Lord Say and Seal's ſpeech ſpoken in Parliament upon the bill about Biſhops power in Civil affairs and Courts of judicature, anno 1641. 2. A ſpeech delivered in the ſtar-chamber on Wedneſday 14*th of June* 1637 at the cenſure of J. Written by himſelf. There are about 18 letters of his in Latin to Gerard John Voſſius printed by Colomeſius in his edition of Gerardi Joannis Voſſii & clarorum Virorum ad eum Epiſtolæ, London 1690 in fol. and ſome letters of his are publiſhed by Dr. Richard Parr among the letters written by and to Archbiſhop Uſher. [U] We ſhall give the reſt of his character from ſeveral writers in the note.] Sir Edward Dering (28), who had greatly oppoſed him in the Houſe of Commons, ſpeaks of him in theſe terms. "I profeſs, I did and "do bear a good degree of perſonal love unto him, "and love unto ſome parts and qualities, which I "think him maſter of. His intent of public uni-"formity was a good purpoſe, though in the way of "his purſuit thereof he was extremely faulty. His "book lately ſet forth, (eſpecially for the latter half "thereof) hath muzzled the Jeſuit, and ſhall ſtrike the "Papiſts under the fifth rib, when he is dead and gone. "And being dead, whereſoever his grave ſhall be, "Paul's will be his perpetual monument, and his own "book his laſting epitaph. It is true, the roughneſs "of his uncourtly nature ſent moſt men diſcontented "from him; yet would he often of himſelf find ways "and means to ſweeten many of them again, when "they leaſt looked for it. Laſtly, he was always one "and the ſame man; begin with him at Oxford, and "ſo go on to Canterbury, he is unmoved, unchanged. "He never complied with the times, but kept his own "ſtand untill the times came up to him." Fuller tells us (29), that he was generally charged with Popiſh inclinations; and the ſtory is commonly told and believed of a Lady, ſtill alive, who turning Papiſt, and being demanded of the Archbiſhop the cauſe of her changing her religion, tartly returned, My Lord, it was becauſe I ever hated a croud. And being deſired to explain her meaning herein, I perceived, ſaid ſhe, that your Lordſhip and many others are making for Rome, as faſt as ye can, and therefore to prevent a preſs, I went before you. "Be the tale true true or falſe, take Papiſt "for a Trent Papiſt, embracing all the deciſions of "that Council; and ſurely this Archbiſhop would "have been made fewel for the fire, before ever he "had been of that perſuaſion. Fuller remarks likewiſe, that "amongſt "his human frailties, choler and paſſion moſt diſco-"vered itſelf. LAUDICE, ſiſter and wife of Mithridates, ought to be ranked in the catalogue of perſons of unhappy memory. Her huſband revolving a mighty deſign in his mind, ſtole from his Court in order to go and ſee incognito, and with very few followers, the ſituation of the places, which he reſolved, one day, to make the ſeat of the war. Laudice, hearing no news of him, imagined that he was dead, and conſequently would not return back; and therefore, inſtead of abandoning herſelf to grief, ſhe immerſed herſelf in the moſt impure pleaſures. Her huſband's return gave her prodigious uneaſineſs; and being under an indiſpenſable neceſſity of concealing, if poſſible, her fault, ſhe could not think

" a free and foreign nation. At home many grumbled " at him for oft making the ſhalloweſt pretence of the " Crown deep enough, by his powerful digging therein, " to drown the undoubted right of any patron to a " Church-living. But Courtiers moſt complained, " that he perſecuted them, not in their proper places, " but what in an ordinary way he ſhould have taken " from the hands of inferior Officers, that he with a " long and ſtrong arm reached to himſelf over all their " heads. Yet others plead for him, that he abridged " their bribes, not their fees; and it vexed them, that " he ſtruck their fingers with the dead palſy, ſo that " they could not, as formerly, have a feeling for " Church-Preferments. He was conſcientious accord- " ing to the principles of his devotion; witneſs his " care in keeping a conſtant Diary of the paſſages in " his life ... He was temperate in his diet, and (which " may be preſumed the effect thereof) chaſte in his " converſation. Indeed in his Diary he confeſſed him- " ſelf lapſed into ſome ſpecial ſin with E. B. for which " he kept an anniverſary humiliation. Indeed his " (*) adverſary makes this uncharitable note thereon, " perchance he was unclean with E. B. which is but " an uncharitable ſuſpicion. Now an exact Diary is a " window into his heart, who maketh it; and there- " fore pity it is, that any ſhould look therein but either " the friends of the party, or ſuch ingenuous foes as " will not, eſpecially in things doubtful, make con- " jectural comments to his diſgrace. But be E. B. male " or female, and the ſin committed of what kind " ſoever, his fault whiſpers not ſo much to his ſhame, " as his ſolemn repentance ſounds to his commendation. " He was very plain in apparel, and ſharply checked " ſuch Clergymen, whom he ſaw go in rich and gawdy " cloaths, commonly calling them of the Church- " Triumphant. Thus as Cardinal Wolſey is reported " the firſt Prelate, who made ſilks and ſattens faſhion- " able amongſt Clergymen; ſo this Archbiſhop firſt re- " trenched the uſual wearing thereof. Once at a viſi- " tation in Eſſex, one in Orders of a good eſtate and " extraction appeared before him very gallant in ha- " bit, whom Dr. Laud, then Biſhop of London, pub- " licly reproved, ſhewing to him the plainneſs of his " own apparel: My Lord, ſaid the Miniſter, you have " better cloaths at home, and I have worſe; whereat the " Biſhop reſted very well contented." Fuller likewiſe tells us, that he was not partial in preferring his kindred, except ſome merit met in them with his alliance; and that generally the perſons promoted by him were men of learning and abilities, though many of them Arminians in their judgments. That he perfectly hated covetouſneſs; and being a ſingle man, and having no project to raiſe a name or family, he was the better enabled for public performances, having both a price in his hand, and an heart alſo to diſpoſe thereof for the general good. Philip a Limborch, in the preface to the ſecond edition of Præſtantium ac Eruditorum Virorum Epiſtolæ Eccleſiaſticæ & Theologicæ, ſpeaking of the letters of our Archbiſhop inſerted in that collection, tells us, " that he appears " to great advantage in them, who though abuſed by " ſo many grievous calumnies, yet in his familiar let- " ters to Gerard John Voſſius uſed no reproachful " term againſt his moſt inveterate enemies, but after his " Saviour's example, when he was reviled, reviled not " again, when he ſuffered threatened not, but bleſſed " thoſe, who curſed him, and prayed earneſtly for " thoſe, who perſecuted him. He is here ſo fully " cleared from the ſhocking imputation openly caſt " upon him by his moſt implacable enemies, of endea- " vouring to bring Popery into the Church of England, " that calumny itſelf cannot find any ground to ac- " cuſe him. We find here continual ſollicitations in " his letters to Voſſius, to undertake the taſk of " confuting Baronius; ſo that he never ceaſed to urge " him to it; I am greatly deſirous, ſays he, before I " leave this world, to ſee Baronius falling under your " attack; and you cannot expect any letters from me with- " out reminding you of it." Sed Imprimis admirabilem ſe oſtendit reverendiſſimus Archiepiſcopus Cantuarienſis Gulielmus Laudus, ob cauſam religionis à fervidis zelotis ſecuri percuſſus; qui adeo graviter impetitus, tot calumniis oneratus, in familiariſſimis ad Voſſium Epiſtolis nullum contra ferociſſimos inimicos maledictum profert, ſed ad Servatoris ſui exemplum, cum malediceretur, non maledixit, & cum peteretur non comminatus eſt, ſed maledicentibus benedixit, & pro perſequentibus ſe ardentiſſimè precatus eſt. Hic ab immani Criminatione, quâ ab infenſiſſimis inimicis coram toto orbe palam & odioſe eſt traductus, quaſi Papatum in Eccleſiam Anglicanam reducere moliretur, adeò plenè purgatur, ut ne ipſa quidem διαβολὴ quicquam quod admordeat reperire poſſit. Extant hic continuatæ ipſius flagitationes, vel decies in Epiſtolis ejus repetitæ, ut Voſſius provinciam Baronium confutandi in ſe ſuſcipiat, adeo quidem ut id urgere nunquam deſtiterit. " Magnoperè, inquit, cupio, antequam fata mihi ape- " riant, ſepulchrum Baronium videre ſub tuis telis ca- " dentem, nec Literas potes a me ullas exſpectare ſine " ſtimulo." Biſhop Burnet (30) obſerves, that " he " was a learned, a ſincere and zealous man, regular in " life, and humble in his private deportment; but " was a hot, indiſcrete man, eagerly purſuing ſome " matters, that were either very inconſiderable or miſ- " chievous, ſuch as ſetting the Communion-Table by " the Eaſt walls of Churches, bowing to it, and cal- " ing it the Altar, the ſuppreſſing the Walloons privi- " leges, the breaking of lectures, the encouraging of " ſports on the Lord's Day, with ſome other things " that were of no value; and yet all the zeal and heat " of that time was laid out on thoſe. His ſeverity in " the Star-Chamber and in the High-Commiſſion- " Court, but above all his violent and indeed inexcu- " ſable injuſtice in the proſecution of Biſhop Williams, " were ſuch blemiſhes, that nothing but the putting " him to death in ſo unjuſt a manner could have raiſed " his character; which indeed it did to a degree of " ſetting him up as a pattern, and the eſtabliſhing all " his notions as ſtandards, by which judgments are to " be made of men, whether they are true to the Church " or not. His Diary, though it was a baſe thing to " publiſh it, repreſents him as an abject fawner on the " Duke of Buckingham, and as a ſuperſtitious re- " garder of dreams. His defence of himſelf, writ with " ſo much care, when he was in the Tower, is a very " mean performance. He intended in that to make " an appeal to the world. In moſt particulars he ex- " cuſes himſelf by this, that he was but one of many, " who either in Council, Star-Chamber or High-Com- " miſſion voted illegal things. Now though this was " true, yet a chief Miniſter, and one in high favour, " determines the reſt ſo much, that they are generally " little better than machines acted by him. On other " occaſions he ſays, the thing was proved but by one " witneſs. How ſtrong ſoever this defence may be " in Law, it is of no force in an appeal to the world; " for if a thing is true, it is no matter how full or " how defective the proof is. The thing that gave me " the ſtrongeſt prejudice againſt him in that book is, " that after he had ſeen the ill effects of his violent " counſels, and had been ſo long ſhut up, and ſo long " at leiſure to reflect on what had paſſed in the hurry " of paſſion in the exaltation of his proſperity, he " does not in any one part of that great work ac- " knowledge his own errors, nor mix in it any wiſe " or pious reflections on the ill uſage he met, or the " unhappy ſteps he had made. So that while his ene- " mies did really magnify him by their inhuman per- " ſecution, his friends Heylin and Wharton have as " much leſſened him, the one by writing his Life, " and the other by publiſhing his Vindication of " himſelf." T.

think of a ſafer expedient than the poiſoning Mithridates. Accordingly ſhe was preparing for it, but one of her maid-ſervants betrayed her, and revealed the myſtery; upon which Mithridates, without the leaſt heſitation, put his wife to death (a). A modern author (b) affirms falſely, that the Monarch in queſtion was actually poiſoned by his wife; but that being accuſtomed to his antidote, he cured himſelf, though with much difficulty. Thoſe who puzzle themſelves, becauſe of Juſtin's relating that Laudice was delivered of a child during her conſort's abſence [A], raiſe difficulties out of nothing. I have ſpoke elſewhere (c) of another LAUDICE, ſiſter to this, and ſtill more wicked than ſhe. Juſtin is unjuſtly accuſed of contradicting himſelf, when he ſpeaks of theſe two women [B].

[A] Laudice had been delivered of a child during her conſort's abſence.] This delivery was regular, and Mithridates could not take offence at it; the computation of the time allowed of his conſidering himſelf as father of the boy, of which Laudice was delivered in his abſence. The circumſtance, which makes me ſpeak in this manner, is, Juſtin's obſerving that Mithridates was congratulated, at one and the ſame time, on his return and on the birth of a Prince. Inter gratulationem adventus ſui & filii geniti (1). No perſon would have dared to congratulate him, as a felicity, on a ſhameful and indiſputable proof of his being a cuckold; what then, (will be objected to me) could occaſion Laudice's uneaſineſs? I anſwer, that in all probability ſhe was with child, or was afraid of being ſo, by having ſported with her gallants ſince her delivery. Hence ſhe was prompted, in order to conceal her adulterous practices, to diſpatch her huſband. Laudice, cum periiſſe eum crederet, in concubitus amicorum projecta, quaſi admiſſum facinus majore ſcelere tegere poſſet, venenum advenienti paravit (2). i. e. "Laudice . . . thinking her huſband was dead, and abandoning herſelf therefore to her gallants, prepared to poiſon him at his return; as tho' ſhe could cover or conceal one crime by the commiſſion of a greater.

[B] Juſtin is unjuſtly accuſed of contradicting himſelf, when he ſpeaks of theſe two women.] Freinſhemius charges him either with this, or with confounding hiſtory in a moſt egregious manner. Aut contradicit ſibi auctor, aut hiſtoriam mire confundit (3). His reaſon is, that Juſtin relates in other places, I. that (4) Laudice, widow of Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, was killed by his ſubjects, for poyſoning five of her children. II. That (5) Laudice, widow of Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, married Nicomedes King of Bithynia, whilſt her brother Mithridates was preparing to ſuccour her, againſt the Nicomedes in queſtion, uſurper of Cappadocia, in prejudice of Ariarathes the late King's ſon. There is no foundation for this charge of Freinſhemius, Juſtin mentioning two Laudices, queens of Cappadocia. The firſt had married an Ariarathes, who died during the war of Ariſtonicus, about the year of Rome 622. The ſecond was ſiſter of Mithridates and wife to the Ariarathes who ſucceeded the former. Here therefore is neither contradiction nor confuſion. I muſt obſerve, that Juſtin is cenſured in many places where he is right, and that no notice is taken of many incidents which are certainly miſrepreſented by him. The Commentator in Uſum Delphini has repeated the accuſation of Freinſhemius.

LAUNOI (MATTHEW DE) (*), one of the moſt violent Leaguers in France, had exerciſed during ſeveral years the miniſterial functions among the Calviniſts; but having committed adultery, and not believing that the ſeverity of the Laws would be ſoftened in any manner on his account, he returned to the Romiſh Communion. I dare not affirm what I have read in great authors, viz. that he was a Prieſt when he turned Proteſtant [A]; but if he was not ſo at that time, he certainly became ſuch after he had abandoned

(*) [He himſelf ſays that he was born in la Ferte-Alez, in the dioceſe of Sens. Tho' he wrote his name Launoy, he ſeems to have been generally called Launay] From the Remarks to the Paris edit. (1734) of Bayle's Diction.

[A] I dare not affirm . . . that he was a prieſt when he turned proteſtant.] This is affirmed by Thuanus. Matthæus Launæus, ſays he (1), ſacri Sueſſionum collegii Sodalis, olim ſacerdos, & poſtea ejerata majorum religione doctrinam proteſtantium amplexus paſtoriſque officio diu inter eos functus, uxore etiam ducta, cujus cum propter egeſtatem ætate jam inclinata tæderet, errore recantato ad nos redierat, ſed incerta fide, quam mox ut ſe vere Catholicum approbaret, factioſis addixit. i. e. "Matthew Launoy, canon of the Cathedral at Soiſſons, formerly a prieſt, and afterwards forſaking the religion of his forefathers, and embracing the faith of the Proteſtants, executed the miniſterial functions a long time among them; having likewiſe married a wife, of whom growing weary, on account of the narrowneſs of his circumſtances, when advancing in years, he recanted his errors and came back to us, but ſtill doubtful with regard to his faith. However, he ſoon after joyned the Leaguers, to ſhew himſelf a true Catholick." The ſame thing is repeated in Book XCV (2), with a very conſiderable addition; for in enumerating the motives, which had prompted our Launoy to leave the Proteſtants; the puniſhment he had to dread, on account of his having been found guilty of adultery, is not omitted. He returned into the pale of the Church, ſays Thuanus, whether it was that he repented of his errors, or was grown weary of his wife, or feared the puniſhment which is inflicted by the proteſtants, on thoſe who are found guilty of violating their conjugal faith. Rurſus ſeu pœnitentia ductus, ſive uxoris pertæſus, & adulterii pœnam, cujus convictus fuerat, metuens, ad ſacerdotium relicta uxore redierat (3). I ſhall tranſcribe another paſſage hereunder, in which Thuanus repeats part of theſe particulars. I paſs over the following words of Du Verdier Vau Privas (4); Matthew de Launoi, firſt prieſt, after a miniſter of the pretended Reformed Religion (a Proteſtant miniſter) and now return'd into the pale of the Chriſtian Catholick Church. The authority of Thuanus is ſufficient to prove what I advance. Let us ſee whether there be any room to doubt that Matthew de Launoi was a prieſt, when he turned Proteſtant. The motive of my doubting is from the ſilence of our Launoy himſelf, on an occaſion, wherein one would think he ſhould have mentioned his being a prieſt, I paſs over, ſays he (5), what they ſay of my vocation, before they had drawn me out of the boſom of the Chriſtian and Catholick Church, and of my deſerting my former employment; for I have always been in publick authority and office, ever ſince I left my ſtudies: and notwithſtanding my youth, which was very raw at that time, and far from maturity, I behaved with applauſe and honour, to the ſatisfaction of thoſe I was concerned with, till ſome miniſters and others of their ſect turned my brain with their illuſions and chimæras. And ſo great was their eſteem for me, that the inſtant I went over to them (in 1560) they forced me to accept of an employment among them; and were ſo haſty on this occaſion, that they did not give me time to breathe or recollect myſelf, ſo much they were afraid of loſing me. They even obliged me to make but one probation ſermon; nay, the moment they found I began to enter on my ſubject, being ſatisfied with my beginning, they made me leave off, and admitted me among them, in order that I might be ſent to Champagne.

abandoned the Proteſtant faith. Though he had been branded at Sedan in a very ignominious manner [B], on account of his adulterous practices, he nevertheleſs was received with open arms by the Roman Catholicks. They collected money for him (a); gave him a Canonry in the Cathedral of Soiſſons, and the Living of St. Mederic in Paris (b). He employed his tongue, his pen, in ſhort all his abilities to foment the rebellion of the Pariſians [C]; and made himſelf ſo conſiderable in the horrid faction of the Sixteen, that he preſided in all the aſſemblies which were held, in order to put to death Barnabas Briſſon, Preſident in the Parliament of Paris [C]. [E] He writes with great weakneſs in his anſwer to the charge brought againſt him, viz. of his committing adultery.] He owns himſelf to be a weak man, and liable to fall into ſin (10). He does not confeſs the fault he is accuſed of; but alledges, in juſtification of himſelf, only ſome little cavils. My accuſers, ſays he (11) have miſtaken with regard to the time, for want of a good memory; I being in Holland in the year 1574. They are guilty of ſeveral inconſiſtencies, (adds he;) they ſay that ſhe was a young maiden who had been left me in truſt, by honeſt people who fear God: and afterwards they ſay that ſhe was a ſervant wench. Now there is a wide difference between the one and the other. For when a young woman is given in truſt, that ſuppoſes her to be of a good family, and that ſhe has a fortune; ſo that ſhe is not a ſervant wench of ſix or ſeven French Livres a year. Beſides; they wanted to heighten ſtill more the enormity of that pretended incident; for it would be a much greater crime to debauch a young woman, well born, who had been left in truſt, than a ſervant wench, who lets herſelf out for hire, to ſerve and ſtay ſo long as her ſervice is approved of, or till ſome other thing makes her quit her place. This is making but an ill defence. I have cited above (12), a writer who ſays, that Launoi got his own couſin with child. In all probability 'twas a young woman who had been ſent to his houſe during the perſecutions in France; for at that time ſeveral Proteſtants made Sedan their aſylum. Now as Launoi was not in very flouriſhing circumſtances, and his fair refugee perhaps had not money to pay for her board, 'tis probable enough, that by her domeſtick ſervices ſhe gave him an opportunity of living without a maid ſervant; and therefore, ſome might ſay (without inconſiſtency or contradiction) that he had lain with his ſervant wench; and others, that he had lain with a young woman who had been committed to his care.

Here follows another pretended contradiction. They ſay, that having been found guilty of the fact in preſence of the conſiſtory, I confeſſed it to three or four among them (they are uncertain as to the number) (13); but they don't ſay in what manner I was found guilty. It was not, continues he (14), by my being catched in the fact by the Judge himſelf, attended by his Sergeants, and others of his court. 'Twas not by unexceptionable witneſſes, for witneſſes are not called on ſuch occaſions. 'Twas not by a violent preſumption; for had there been any, they themſelves would have greatly tranſgreſſed, according to their own principles. A preſumption is grounded, either on the too great familiarity of the parties, or upon the woman's being with child. In caſe they grounded their preſumption on familiarity, they ought to have given us notice of it, to prevent, by good remonſtrances or exhortations, our committing evil; ſo that they would be greatly to blame, for having ſuffered us to continue in ſin, without oppoſing it by a brotherly charity, or by proper cenſures. If their preſumption aroſe from her being with child, it is not ſufficient to accuſe me, much leſs to condemn me. It would be a fine law, if a ſervant wench plays the fool in her maſter's houſe, and is got with child, that the maſter muſt be looked upon as guilty of the crime. What reaſon would there be for this? Fathers and mothers often find it an extremely difficult taſk to keep in their daughters, though they watch them ever ſo narrowly; how then could a maſter be accountable for a ſervant wench's being with child, ſince he cannot always have her under his eye? It would be much better, in ſuch a caſe, for a perſon to be his own ſervant. Such a preſumption therefore would be of no force. But when they ſaw their pretended young woman of a good family with child, they ought to have ſent for, and enquired of her how all this had happened; and who had got her with child, and then they had known the truth. But they forgot to do this, and therefore they cannot alledge a preſumption without condemning themſelves; and ſtill it would be of no force. The weakneſs of this defence might eaſily be ſhewn, if one would be at the pains to do it; but 'tis really not worth while. I only ſay, that though he had ſent the young woman in queſtion out of the way, people might yet have had very convincing proofs of her being with child; ſo that he could not take any advantage of her not having been confronted or examined.

wretch, we must not give credit to the ſtories which he publiſhed againſt the Proteſtants [F]. That

The following pretended contradiction is not better than the foregoing ones. They ſay that I was found guilty in preſence of their conſiſtory, which, according to them, was compoſed of ſeventeen Miniſters and thirteen Elders, making in all thirty perſons. Now they aſſert that I was found guilty by that confeſſion, which, (ſay they), I made in preſence of three or four: It therefore was not their conſiſtory, twenty ſix or twenty ſeven perſons being wanting (15). An empty, childiſh cavil. 'Twas not pretended that he had confeſſed his crime in preſence of the whole conſiſtory: 'twas pretended that, without his confeſſing it before that aſſembly, he had been found guilty of it; and 'twas added, that he had confeſſed the charge, in private, to three or four people.

He complains (16) that they ſentenced them both as being equally guilty of adultery, and to the ſame penalties. Now adultery, as diſtinguiſhed from fornication, is committed between or by married perſons. Nevertheleſs they ſay that it was a maiden; ſhe therefore did not commit adultery in that ſenſe. This is a pitiful argument; for, to commit adultery properly ſo called, it is not neceſſary that both parties ſhould be married; if either of them be ſo, that is ſufficient. " [Bayle " would not have called this argument of Launoi a " pitiful one, had he underſtood it. The queſtion is " not, (in Launoy's anſwer) about the ſin of adultery, " but concerning the puniſhment of this ſin enacted " by the laws. You pretend, ſaid Launoy, that ha- " ving been judicially convicted, ſentence was paſt; " and you ſay that this ſentence condemned the young " woman and I, to the ſame puniſhment, as being equal- " ly guilty of adultery. A proof that this incident is " falſe, and that the ſentence is a mere calumny of " your raiſing, is, that the laws enacted againſt adul- " terers relate only to a double adultery, that is, to " ſuch an one as is committed between married per- " ſons; but not againſt that kind of adultery which " a married man commits with a maiden. In this " latter caſe, the laws do not look upon the maiden " as guilty of adultery. This ſentence therefore which " you ſay was paſt upon me, would not be agree- " able to the tenor of the laws; and this authorized " me to ſay, that 'twas you forged this incident, mere- " ly out of hatred to me &c.... Had not Bayle en- " deavoured merely to condemn Launoy, but only to " examine what relates to him, in order that he might " be enabled to condemn or clear him after a mature " enquiry, he would not have omitted a method, " which, to me, appears ſufficiently deciſive, and " which Launoi did not enough inſiſt upon. You " accuſe me (might he ſay) of having committed a " crime at Sedan in 1574, and I then had left that " city. You pretend that I was found guilty in a " full conſiſtory, and even that I afterwards confeſſed " the fact to three or four particular perſons. Now " nothing can be falſer than all this; I had then " left the city; and farther, neither the girl nor I " were ever examined or confronted. To all this " you add that, in conſequence of the conviction and " my confeſſion, ſentence was paſt upon me. It is " plain that this is an untruth. Either produce the " inſtrument of my conviction; the names of thoſe " perſons who heard me own the fact; and the judi- " cial ſentence paſt upon me, or know that you will " be looked upon every where as manifeſt calumnia- " tors."] From the remarks on the Paris Edition (1734) of Bayle's Dictionary, Vol. III. pag. 897, 898. The laſt thing he objects, is the reſpect to perſons (17). He pretends that they had ſhewn great indulgence to the ſame kind of crimes; he names perſons and places; and whether it were that he ſought for a greater conformity between the crime he was charged with, and that with which he charged ſome of his brethren; or for other reaſons, ſervant maids ſeldom fail of acting a part in his recriminations. He names a Proteſtant Miniſter, who made a figure in the frontiſpiece of ſome noble books, and who was called, in Holland, the ſchoon Predikant (18); if we may believe Launoy, the handſome miniſter in queſtion would have made himſelf formidable to his landladies by his exploits on ſervant wenches, and have made an excellent uſe of the maxim of a Roman Poet,

I ſhall obſerve in the following remark, that Launoi was not honeſt man enough, to injure thoſe perſons whom he ſlandered.

I will make a little digreſſion. Either Clergymen ſhould be allowed to marry, or they ſhould be forbid to keep young maid ſervants; for all the horrid concubinage of prieſts, which has ſcandalized the publick for ſo many ages, owes its riſe to the permiſſion, which was granted them, of having women about them, to manage their houſhold affairs. The deſign of the ſuperiors was, that they ſhould confine themſelves to the buſineſs of maid ſervants; but they ſuffered themſelves to be prevailed upon to ſerve to every other purpoſe: the office of concubine ſeemed ſo convenient to them in all reſpects (20), that their maſters did not find it a very difficult taſk to bring them to it. Since Luther's reformation, the prieſts have leſſened, by inſenſible degrees, this great ſcandal; but to this day their maid-ſervants, unleſs they are very antiquated, are ſtrongly ſuſpected to ſerve them in a double capacity. Every one knows the ſong, (20) Compare what is ſaid above, with the remark [E] of the article HADRIAN VI.

De neceſſite neceſſitante
Il faut que je baiſe ma ſervante.

By ſtrong neceſſity betrayed,
I'm forc'd to kiſs my ſervant-maid.

A prieſt is ſuppoſed to ſay this. Generally ſpeaking in all religions, if any lewd affair happens, which occaſions complaints againſt unmarried Eccleſiaſticks, it almoſt always ariſes from their maid-ſervants. The reaſon of this is manifeſt; the temptations on both ſides, and the opportunities for ſinning preſent themſelves more readily and conveniently; and doubtleſs hence it is why tender caſuiſts greatly extenuate the ſin of a ſervant wench, who is got with child by her maſter. The Latin of the lower ages furniſhes us with a word which is of great weight here. The word focaria, was taken, at firſt, in a virtuous ſenſe; it ſignified a woman or girl who ſerved in a houſe, and dreſſed her maſter's victuals, but it afterwards was made uſe of only to denote the concubines of clergymen (21): the reaſon was, moſt of their maid ſervants continued indeed to be cooks, but then they alſo lay with their maſters. Let us conclude, that it ought to be a law in all countries, not to ſuffer unmarried young clergymen to keep young maid ſervants.

(21) See Du Cange's Gloſſary, at the word focaria, pag. 469, 470. Paris edit.

[F] We muſt not give credit to the ſtories, which he publiſhed againſt the Proteſtants.] Though we ſhould even overlook the dreadful crimes which he committed during the league, we might with reaſon conſider him as an impoſtor, with reſpect to many particulars he relates concerning the Proteſtant miniſters, they being quite improbable. He ſays (22) that the Proteſtant Miniſters who fled for refuge to Neufchatel in Switzerland, having formed a reſolution to ruin a young man, who had preferred the ſtudy of phyſick to that of divinity, accuſed him of many falſe doctrines, but that one of the moſt eminent among them oppoſed their evil deſign; that notwithſtanding this they continued to do him all the injury in their power; Some calling him wizard, others anabaptiſt, others atheiſt. Others would ſay to him; How dare you ſay that you do not believe all the doctrine of Calvin, by whoſe mouth we all ſpeak? He anſwering that Calvin was a man liable to error as others were; immediately they cried aloud, O curſed Philoſophy! O execrable Blaſphemy! For to ſpeak againſt Calvin's doctrine, and againſt the intention and will of theſe venerable doctors is, in their opinion, ſpeaking againſt God, and lying againſt the holy Ghoſt; and they make no conſcience of proſecuting a man on this account, even to death, if they can come at him (23). The words he makes theſe Proteſtant Miniſters ſay of Calvin (24) is ſo different from the ſpirit and maxims of the Proteſtant Church, and ſo inconſiſtent with the ſtyle of the Proteſtants, that this is ſufficient to ſhew that he himſelf forged (and in the moſt groſs

"The "eldeſt Capel had, a little before, played another ſuch "mad trick to a lady of a good family, who being "come to Sedan about buſineſs, would not ſhew her- "ſelf to, or be known by any perſon. Neverthe- "leſs, his over great curioſity made him ſo raſh, "as to abuſe the name and authority of the duke "and dutcheſs de Bouillon to get into the chamber of "the lady in queſtion, and to ſee her. At the ſame "time he played another prank, which ſhewed both "his Genius and lewd and wicked inclinations. For "coming out of Church, and moved by I know not "what kind of devotion, he took by the arm a beau- "tiful, virtuous, and nobly-deſcended young lady, and "begged to ſpeak a word or two with her. This "being granted, he whiſpered to her as follows; "Young Lady, charmed with your ſhining qualities, "both of body and mind, and particularly with your "wit, I am ſo bold as to offer up a petition to you, "but then I would not be denied. [G] That which relates to two pretended Demoniacks is the moſt ridiculous.] Here follows an abſtract of this ſtory. Matthew de Launoi was a famous Proteſtant Miniſter in 1562. Some Merchants of the Netherlands, who were his auditors at Aï in Champagne, were ſo pleaſed with his ſermon, that they kept him at their houſes, juſt as he was going for England. They admired both his ſtile and his diligence; he often preaching ſix times in different places, in four and twenty hours, upon which they appointed him their Miniſter at Tournay. Whilſt he was in that city, advice was brought that ſeveral people poſſeſſed with the devil had been delivered by the exorciſms of the Catholic Church. This diſpleaſed the Calviniſts; they fearing that their ſect would loſe their credit, if their Miniſters ſhould not have the gift or power of driving out devils, which had been ſo conſpicuous in the Apoſtles, and was ſeen alſo among the Papiſts. They therefore ſuborned two perſons, a man and woman, and engaged them to act the part of demoniacks, upon condition of receiving a ſum of money, and having a penſion for life. The two perſons in queſtion played their parts to admiration; and thereupon Matthew de Launoi who knew nothing of this contrivance, was deſired to go and ſuccour the two demoniacks. Accordingly he went, offered up prayers, and preached; which brought ſo happy an effect, that the two demoniacks, after a great many tricks, which they had been directed to play, declared that the devil was come out of them. The miracle was ſpread univerſally, and gained de Launoi the higheſt veneration. However the knavery was diſcovered ſome time after, becauſe that the two perſons who acted the farce, not being paid the reward which had been promiſed them, brought their action againſt the ſeducers. A weaver and a rope-maker informed Launoi of this in Holland 1574. Non ante ſunt eæ technæ à Matthæo intellectæ, quam pecuniis non præſtitis litem movere debitoribus dæmoniaci cœperunt: totaque eſt ea fabula in Hollandia ad annum M. D. LXXIIII. Matthæo à duobus, Chriſtiano de la Quennoillerie textore lini, & Joanne Walle, qui chordis nectendis vitam ducere conſueſſet, commemorata (26). This was the motive of his converſion, if we may believe Sedulius the Franciſcan, who has inſerted this whole ſtory at full length, in his anſwer to the Alcoran of the Franciſcans, printed in 1607 (27). He ſays that Matthew de Launoi, being ſtill alive in Bruſſels, and writing ſeveral pieces againſt the Calviniſts, could vouch the truth of it. Vivit hodieque Matthæus Bruxellæ Principum urbe Brabantiæ, & multa adverſus illos ſcribit, quibus mendacio pallente non poſſunt reſcribere (28). Spondanus has inſerted the ſubſtance of this fine ſtory in his Annals (29). It would be needleſs to ſhew the impertinence of this relation; it is univerſally known that the Proteſtants made it their buſineſs to diſcredit all the miracles of the latter ages, and to aſſert that they were not any way neceſſary to juſtify the Reformation. Apply here what I ſay in the remark [T] of the article CALVIN.

LAUNOI (JOHN DE) in Latin Launoius, Doctor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Paris, was born in a little village of Normandy near Coutances. He went through his philoſophical and theological ſtudies in Paris, with ſo much ſucceſs, that he became a moſt formidable diſputant. He was ordained Prieſt, and took his degree of Doctor of Divinity in 1636 [A]; he did not make theſe two characters of uſe to him for amaſſing of wealth, and ſoliciting for benefices [B]; he having no other view but to acquire learning

[A] He was ordained Prieſt and took his degree of Doctor in Divinity in 1636.] I have not followed Moreri, who affirms that John de Launoi entered into Holy Orders in 1634, and took his Doctor's degree in June of the ſame year. My reaſon is this: It is affirmed, in this Doctor's elogium, that he entered upon his courſe of Divinity in 1633; and that he made ſo great a progreſs therein in two years, that no one ſurpaſſed him; and that he excelled many perſons of great genius and erudition. It is added that he was raiſed the following year to the Prieſthood, and took his Doctor's degree in Divinity. Studium Theologicum ingreſſus eſt anno trigeſimo tertio ſupra milleſimum & ſexcenteſimum, illudque biennio integro ita percurrit, ut multos ingenio & eruditione præſtantes vinceret, & à nemine vinceretur. Ad ordinem ſacerdotalem anno inſequenti, & ad Theologiæ Magiſterium evectus (1). I believed it was proper for me to put this following year, after the two years of his ſtudying Divinity; for had I fixed it immediately after the year 1633, it would follow, that this Doctor had ſtudied Divinity one year, as a ſcholar, after he had taken his Doctor's degree. I would not, however, inſiſt upon having the preference of Moreri; for the author of the elogium, did not perhaps pretend to great accuracy in ſuch minute particulars relating to Chronology. Did he not ſay (2) that after John de Launoi had ſpent five or ſix years in ſtudying Philoſophy and School Divinity, he began his courſe of Divinity and employed two years in it? Is this writing according to the ſtrictneſs preſcribed by the laws of accuracy? But how negligent ſoever he may have been, I prefer his authority to that of Moreri.

him for amaſſing of wealth and ſuing for benefices.] This requires a remark; for it is ſo very uncommon to find, even among Doctors of Divinity, any perſons exempt from avarice and ambition, that when we meet with any ſuch, the public ought to be carefully informed of them. Such examples ought to be conſecrated; all the juſtice they merit ought to be immediately done to them, a circumſtance that ſerves to the edification of the public, as it ſhews that Providence does not quite give up mortals to depravity and corruption. I ſay then that John de Launoi diſcovered from his childhood an entire indifference with regard to the good things of this world; and that theſe happy inclinations were not changed in him after he was more advanced in years, he then making over to his brothers and nephews all his pretenſions to his father's eſtate. Omnem ab ineunte adoleſcentia exuerat opum cupiditatem, quam divina vox flagitiorum fontem appellat. Sed ad firmam ætatem cum perveniſſet, paternam hæreditatem, parvam illam quidem, fratribus nepotibuſque reliquit (3). He would never liſten to the counſels of his friends, who adviſed him to ſue for prebends and benefices. To put a ſtop to their officious exhortations, he declared to them, that he did not believe himſelf qualified either for ſinging or preaching; and that he would not enrich himſelf with the poſſeſſions of the Church, ſince he could not do it great ſervice, by his miniſterial functions. *Monitus aliquando ab amicis, ut paræciam præbendamque vacantem, eo nomine peteret ab eo, cui conferendæ illius munus incumbebat, reſpondit, ſe huic utrique officio parum aptum eſſe à natura, cùm per latera parum firma, perque vocem minimè canoram, neque verba apud populum facere, neque pſalmos hymnoſque decantare poſſet. We are not to wonder at his acquiring ſo much erudition, ſince he applied himſelf to ſtudy with a frame of mind exempt from a deſire of amaſſing riches and acquiring preferments. How many people would be very eminent in learning, if the torturing care of making their fortunes did not draw them perpetually out of their cloſets? " Can verſes writ by perſons thus brought up
" Lay claim to immortality?———

I muſt not forget John de Launoi's will. The preamble to it was remarkable. After the uſual words, In the name of the Father, &c. were the following; I ſhall ſoon have done, for I have not much to bequeath (6). Menage did not ſay all; the reaſon was alſo given why the teſtator did not leave much behind him, viz. that God had made him underſtand, that it is much more difficult for a Chriſtian to make a right uſe of riches, than to live without them. Præfatur ideo teſtaturum ſe de re tenui, quoniam à quo admotus fuerat ſtudiis ſublimioribus, ſingulari Dei beneficio intellexerat, facilius eſſe homini Chriſtiano bonis carere, quam iis recte uti (7). This is a remarkable circumſtance; Mr. de Launoi left more money behind him than he thought he would be found maſter of; a manifeſt proof of his indifference with regard to the good things of this world. He did not give himſelf the trouble to count over his money, and ſometimes forgot where he had laid it. (8) Certum illum (9) fecit Launoius, plus penes ſe poſt obitum ſignatæ pecuniæ repertum iri, quàm præſtandis legatis requireretur; & revera longè plus repertum eſt, pluſque quam Launoius ipſe repertum iri crederet. Sed id tantum abeſt ut ei vitio verti poſſit; quin potiùs laudi duci debet, cùm illud omne quantumcunque fuerit, non avara manus aſſervaſſet uſquam, ſed contemptor opum animus domi projectum oblivioni penè dediſſet. i. e. " He was aſſured by Launoi, that more money " would be found at his deceaſe, than was ſufficient to pray " the legacies; and indeed much more was found than " Launoi himſelf could have thought. But this, ſo " far from being imputed as a fault to him, ſhould ra- " ther be looked upon as a virtue, ſince the whole ſum " of money, how great ſoever it might be, had not " been heaped up out of avarice, but careleſly thrown " about the houſe out of contempt." We here have a proof, that an indifference with regard to riches, and a ſtrong paſſion for amaſſing them, may produce the ſame effect; for ſome miſers hoard up ſo much wealth, that they themſelves do not know what they have.

[C] He kept company with the moſt learned Divines.] He was not contented with this; he uſed to conſult by letter, ſuch learned men as lived in the provinces of France or in foreign countries (11); and when he went to Rome, it was not in order to view the antiquities there, but to get acquainted with thoſe who were famed for their erudition. He viſited chiefly in that city, the Duke of Holſtein and Leo Allatius (12). Iter etiam ſuſcepit in Italiam, non quidem ut fluvios inſpiceret & maria, non ut urbes luſtraret, non ut vetera artium monumenta, novaſque ædificiorum moles mirabundus intueretur, ſed ut conſuetudine frueretur eruditorum (13).

[D] The converſation he had with the learned father Sirmond proved moſt advantageous to him.] He uſed to go and propoſe his doubts to him, which the other would clear up without the leaſt noiſe or heat. The Jeſuit in queſtion was quite averſe to this contentious manner of diſputing on the ſciences. Suam ſeu percunctationem, ſeu ſententiam, de maximi momenti capitibus proponentem benigne audiebat perſpicaciſſimus & cordatiſſimus ſenex, mentem ei ſuam candide aperibat, & cum eſſet ab omni quæ in ſcholis viget rixandi conſuetudine alienus, abſtinebat à contentione & pugna verborum, locoſque indicabat conciliorum aut patrum, quibus innixus ita ſentiret (14). i. e. Mr. de Launoi would examine theſe with the greateſt accuracy, and return to viſit father Sirmond, who after hearing him diſcourſe on thoſe matters would ſay; At firſt I underſtood theſe matters better than you, but you now are a much greater maſter of them than I. Tunc ejus ſolertiam & ſagacitatem ſuſpiciens Sirmondus, dicere ſolebat, cum primum loqui hac de re cœpimus, erat in ea forſitan aliquid quod paulo melius perſpexiſſem quam tu: nunc vero cum eam accurate pertractaſti, nihil ſupereſt quod te fugerit, quodque plenius perfectiuſque non teneas, quam ego unquam tenuerim (15). No Jeſuit had a greater ſhare in his intimacy and confidence, than de Launoi, a circumſtance which was no way pleaſing to the ſociety. Cum nullum haberet inter ſodales ſuos Sirmondus quocum fidentius loqueretur, de quo & ipſi nonquam conqueſti ſunt crebrius inviſi vehementer optabat à Launoio,

[E] Very few divines have printed a greater number of books.] See the catalogue of them in the hiſtory he publiſhed of the college of Navarre, in the year 1677. His bookſeller had often publiſhed it ſeparate. The following delicate remark deſerves, in my opinion, a place here. "Of all his books, this (18) was his favourite; whether it were that he took a pleaſure in this glorious teſtimony he had given the publick, of his gratitude to that college of the faculty which he conſidered as his parent; or that he was not quite inſenſible to the pleaſure of ſeeing all his own works particularized in this book. For he has inſerted in it the catalogue of all his compoſitions, which he choſe to draw up himſelf; as well to make it more exact, as to explain with greater eaſe and readineſs the titles and even ſubjects of his ſmalleſt tracts, and of all his letters in particular; wiſely judging that any other perſon would be diſcouraged at the great number of them, and at the ſo extenſive amplification of their titles (19)."

[F] He attacked ſeveral falſe traditions with great intrepidity.] Such as the arrival of Lazarus and Mary Magdalen in Provence; Dionyſius the Areopagite's miſſion, as an Apoſtle, in Gaul; the cauſe of the retirement of St. Bruno founder of the Carthuſians; the viſion of Simon Stoch; the privileges of the Sabbatine Bull. Thoſe whoſe intereſt it was to maintain this kind of ſentiments, inveighed the loudeſt againſt him; and declared him to be a deſtroyer of Religion. Credi vix poteſt quantam initio invidiam bis ſcriptis in ſe conflaverit: licet enim antiquam atque adeo genuinam traditionem propugnaret, ejuſque fidem, ut ipſe ſæpe ad locum Tertulliani alludens dicere ſolebat, ex temporibus aſſereret, tamen qui hiſtorias quas expungebat à teneris annis imbiberant, quive illas credulæ plebi non ſine aliquo commodo ſuo ingerebant, eas ſibi eripi ægre patiebantur, nec qui id tentaſſet mitius incuſabant, quam ſi firmiſſima religionis fundamenta convellere decreviſſet (20). i. e. "It is ſcarce poſſible to conceive how much envy theſe writings drew upon him at firſt: for notwithſtanding that he was a ſtrenuous defender of the ancient, and therefore genuine tradition; and vindicated its authority, as himſelf uſed frequently to ſay, alluding to a paſſage of Tertullian, from the times; nevertheleſs, thoſe who had believed, from their infancy, the ſtories or legends he had expung'd; and had impos'd 'em, for their own profit, on the credulous vulgar, were exaſperated at the loſs of them; and exclaimed with as much violence againſt him, for attempting this, as though he had reſolved to deſtroy the ſtrongeſt fundamentals of Religion." But de Launoi was not affected in any manner with their clamours, but ſtill purſued his point; and undeceived not only the true Literati, but alſo ſome of the vulgar. Vicit tamen inexpugnabili conſtantiâ Launoius hominum imperitorum, & malè feriatorum importunas inofficioſaſque querelas, & aniles eorum fabellas ita revicit, ut nullum jam patronum inveniant inter eos, qui aliquâ curâ veritatem indagant, multò pauciores quàm antea apud vulgum, & apud eos qui ne literas quidem norunt (21). He attacked with great vigour the Monks on two other heads (22), for he ſhewed the falſity of the pretended privileges, by virtue whereof they refuſed to acknowledge the juriſdiction of Biſhops; and refuted the arguments they employed, to prove the right they had to adminiſter the Sacrament of penance. I will here cite what Abbot de Marolles ſays of him. "He has found out the art of diſcovering the moſt hidden truths; and thoſe who love them are as much pleaſed with him for it; as thoſe who are incapable of knowing and honouring them, thought they had reaſon to complain of him, for having atchieved ſuch glorious conqueſts. However, they have nothing to reproach him with; and his adverſaries have not hitherto been able to convict him of the leaſt falſity, or of one wrong inference from the teſtimonies of the writers with regard to the points he has examined. It is true indeed that what we have ſeen of his writings, is but inconſiderable in compariſon of what we may expect; devoting himſelf, as he has done, to very ſerious ſtudies on important ſubjects; but perſons of the greateſt learning and abilities will always find benefit by the peruſal of his works, either from his method, or the certain knowledge of thoſe things, for which the orthodox Church will have no leſs reaſon to glory, than infamous ſuperſtition to repine and grieve (23)."

Among other books you will find that of Mr. de Launoi, wherein he attempts to prove, that there never was any ſuch Saint as Renatus, nor any Biſhop of Angers of that name. 'Tis he who wrote againſt St. Dionyſius the Areopagite, and declared that he had never been in France; againſt the ſcapulary of the Carmelites, and againſt Mary Magdalen, affirming that ſhe never came into Provence. He is a Doctor of Divinity, a Norman, a perſon of a mean aſpect, but learned, and chiefly in Church hiſtory. Some people here call him a deſperate, damn'd wretch, ſaying, that people ought to be aware of him; that he every year ejects a Saint from Paradiſe, and that there is reaſon to fear he will at laſt eject God himſelf from it! Notwithſtanding this, no one has anſwered him yet. One of his friends informed me that he had been a long time a boarder in the Jeſuits College (24), who made uſe of him, in order to make an elogium of their books; but that they at laſt ſtruck off his penſion, becauſe he would not give an approbation to a new doctrine they intended to publiſh (25)." What follows is curious, which I borrow from Menage, and it is he who ſpeaks (26). Mr. de Launoi, Doctor of Divinity of the faculty of Paris, has pretended that ſome of our Saints never exiſted; which made Mr. Feramus ſays as follows of him (*),

If Menage ſaid the ſame thing in converſation as Abbot Faydit, we muſt conclude from it, either that he had not conſidered the matter ſo thoroughly, as when he was writing for the publick; or that he embelliſhed that incident, in order to make it the more pleaſing, and more capable of the parallel. Be this as it will, here follows a paſſage from the ſequel to Menagiana, in which ſome words are falſly aſcribed to Homer (30). " Mr.

(31) The Greek diſtich follows here, in the ſequel of the Menagiana, probably with ſome errors of the preſs.

If I was not afraid of making too many digreſſions, I would ſay that it were to be wiſhed that ſeveral learned men were allowed to imitate Mr. de Launoi. Falſe Saints are as much increaſed as pretended or falſe Nobles: ſo that as Kings cauſe, from time to time, commiſſions of enquiry to be iſſued out, in order for diſcovering ſuch perſons as uſurp titles without having any right to them, and reducing them to their Plebeian ſtate; the clergy ſhould alſo appoint ſome commiſſioners as rigid as Boiſſeau, to examine the titles and patents of ſaintſhip. No one can forget the verſes (32), the ſubſtance of which is as follows:

(32) They are a ſong.

For ſome years paſt, we've none but Nobles met,
On ev'ry ſtreet, loaded with ſacks of Parchment.
And ſcream: —behold my awful, ſplendid titles!
But ſcarce have they diſplay'd the muſty heap,
E're Boiſſeau (dread Commiſſioner) arrives,
Who cries;—This inſtrument, I'll prove, is falſe;
That engroſs'd copy, there, I now reject;
And will ſee the foul Draught. ———

Were the forces of the Church triumphant to paſs muſter before honeſt commiſſaries, a great number of faggots would be found; not among the common ſoldiers; but among the high officers, I mean among the Saints who are invoked. The calender has more need of being reformed in that reſpect, than with regard to the preceſſion of the equinoxes; and whereas a bare ſubſtraction of ten days ſufficed for this latter reformation, the latter would require a ſubſtraction by hundreds and thouſands. The year has not, for a long time, been able to furniſh a day for every canonized Saint; many Saints muſt be heaped upon one another in the ſame places; and 'tis now that one may ſay with Juvenal;

Nec turba deorum
Talis ut eſt hodie, contentaque ſidera paucis
Numinibus miſerum urgebant Atlanta minori
Pondere (33).

How many Senators would be found vitio creati (34), in the celeſtial Court, were one to proceed rigorouſly in that affair? To how great a number of volumes the acta Sanctorum are already ſwelled? One might apply to them the well known diſtich following (35);

Be this ſaid without prejudice to the eſteem, in which their learned compilers are held. It muſt even be ſaid, in their honour, that they reject a great number of fables; and that their ſincerity daily expoſes them to the ſame complaints which have been made againſt de Launoi. See father Papebroch's (36) reply to the Exhibitio errorum, of a carmelite named Sebaſtian de Saint Paul; and it will be found that Jeſuit has drove a great number of intruders out of the calendar, and that for very ſubſtantial reaſons. Theſe intruders are not modern Saints, but of very remote antiquity. Cardinal Beſſarion, ſeeing in Rome the canonization of ſome perſons whom he thought had been ill livers, cried out, theſe new Saints make me very much call in queſtion the old ones: aſſe che queſti Santi moderni mi fanno aſſai dubitare delli paſſati. Beſſario cardinalis cum inter Divos inepta quadam ἀποθέωσει Romæ quam plurimos referri videret quorum vitam improbarat, ſe valde dubitare dixit utrum vera eſſent quæ ab antiquis prodita fuerunt (37). But it may be ſaid, that we are infinitely more certain with regard to modern Saints than with reſpect to many of the antient ones. We cannot doubt but that the former have lived upon earth; but we have almoſt demonſtrative proofs that the latter never did. A man of wit ſaid the other day in good company, that if we were obliged to have recourſe to the interceſſion of Saints, he would chooſe new-comers, for inſtance Capiſtran, or Thomas de Villeneuve, rather than a Saint Catherine or Saint Alexis. See the remark of the article PEREZ (Joſeph.) I ſhall obſerve below (38), that the inquiſitors cenſured the work of Papebroch the Jeſuit.

A canon of Paſſaw, an able preacher and profeſſor of divinity, in the fifteenth century, ſaid in one of his ſermons, that though there ſhould be as many feſtivals as minutes, the year would not ſuffice to give each Saint his feſtival, and he cites Durandus Biſhop of Mande, who obſerves that there are above five thouſand Saints for each day. Tanta (inquit ille) (*) eſt Sanctorum numeroſitas, quod totum tempus anni non ſufficeret etiam ſi ſingulis horis, etiam ſingulis minutis, aggeremus feſtum unius ſancti: deinde Durandum citat: Quia ſicut dicit (inquit) Gulielmus in rationali, pro quolibet die pluſquam quinque millia ſanctorum concurrerent (39). The author who quotes the ſermon of this German canon, adds, that the feaſt of all-Saints was inſtituted, to ſupply or make up for the too ſmall number of days in the year, and to prevent the reſentment of thoſe Saints to whom no honour might have been paid: Quocirca quum Pontificiorum divorum tanta illis authoribus ferè infinito ſit, in ſupplementum cultus Sanctorum feſtum omnium Sanctorum excogitatum eſt. Quoniam humani cultus illos appetentes eſſe ſomniant, & in ſuos cultores prolixos many other people have told merry ſtories concerning it [H]. It was ſcarce poſſible but our learned Doctor muſt make himſelf a great number of enemies, as he wrote ſo many volumes againſt the maxims of the Pope's flatterers [I], and againſt the ſuperſtitious and pretended immunities of the Monks. He found, in the decline of life, that he had diſguſted a moſt formidable party. He was forbid holding aſſemblies at his own apartment, prolixos, ne omiſſis & præteritis divis ſtomachandi ulla cauſa ſit, quod ſuo cultu orbentur. Sic omnibus minutis etiam & manipularibus divis, & non ſolum patriciis & majorum gentium, hoc omnium ſanctorum feſto & ſupplemento ſatisfactum eſſe putant. Atque hoc Gulielmi illius Minatenſis Epiſcopi eſt, quaſi ſalutari hoc pharmaco omnium divorum repulſæ & offenſæ placari debeant. Durandi verba hæc ſunt. (†) Propter ipſorum inquit multitudinem feſtare de illis ſpecialiter non valemus. Ergo ut antea idem ait propter omiſſorum (inquit) feſtorum ſupletionem inſtitutum eſt feſtum omnium ſanctorum (40). i. e. " Since therefore there are almoſt a numberleſs " multitude of Saints of the Pope's making, all-Saints " day was thought upon, in order to complete the " worſhip of them. Becauſe, as it is vainly ſuppoſed " they are very greedy of human worſhip, and are " bountiful to their votaries, in order that ſuch Saints as " might have been omitted may not have any cauſe " to reſent their being deprived of worſhip; this feſti- " val of All-Saints is looked upon as a ſupplemental " worſhip, not only of thoſe of the higheſt order, but " ſuch as are of the loweſt claſs. And this, accord- " ing to the abovementioned William Biſhop of Man- " de, is a kind of ſalutary remedy or expiation, to " appeaſe all ſuch Saints as may have been omitted. " The words of Durandus are as follow. There are " ſo great a number of Saints, that we cannot give " to each a particular holiday. Therefore, as the " ſame author obſerved before; the feſtival of all-Saints " was inſtituted, to make up for thoſe who may have " been omitted". Thoſe who make it their buſineſs to draw parallels, cannot but call to mind, on this occaſion, the provident care of the Athenians, who conſecrated an altar to the unknown Gods (41), from the fear they were under of neglecting ſome revengeful deity whoſe names and qualities they might be ignorant of. They imagined they had ſuffered for it juſt before; and therefore, to play a ſure game (42), they reſolved to offer up worſhip even to ſuch deities as they might not know; which was a ſure way not to omit any God.

[H] Many other people have told many ſtories concerning it.] Here follows that of Vigneul Marville, which is as good as the ſtory I borrowed from the Menagiana, " Mr. de Launoi was a terrible critic, " formidable both to heaven and earth. He has ex- " pelled a greater number of Saints from paradiſe than " ten Popes have canonized. He ſuſpected the whole " martyrology; and he ſought for, or examined all " the Saints in their turn, in the ſame manner as " the Nobility are in France. The rector of St. Eu- " ſtachius's church in Paris uſed to ſay: Wherever I " meet Dr. de Launoi, I bow as low as the ground; and " never ſpeak to him but with my hat in my hand, " and with the utmoſt humility, for fear he ſhould be- " reave me of my St. Euſtachius, who indeed hangs " but by a thread (43). (α)". Theſe laſt words are very true, and here follows a paſſage from the Valeſiana which confirms them. " St. Euſtachius's life is al- " ſo a heap of fables; and I am greatly ſurprized that " the largeſt pariſh in Paris ſhould have quitted the " name of one of our moſt renouned and illuſtrious " martyrs, for that of an unknown and very ſuſpicious " Saint (44)". Ancillon had heard Daillé ſay, that meeting him one day at Mr. Cramoiſi the bookſeller's ſhop in Paris, they expreſſed a great deal of eſteem and friendſhip for one another; and that at their parting, Mr. de Launoi ſaid to him; Sir, I expunge a Saint every month out of the breviary, do you ſtrike out an error from it (45). If de Launoi ſpoke in that manner, it was only in jeſt; he did not ſpeak ſeriouſly, but exaggerated; for the number of Saints he would have degraded, it is too inconſiderable to be compared to all the months of his life. But he might have compared, without exaggerating, the number of Saints, whether doubtful or fabulous, to the number of minutes comprized in his long life. See the excellent hiſtory of the Church, which Baſnage publiſhed in the year 1699, in two vol. folio. There (46) are ſo many falſe Saints and falſe Martyrs diſcarded, that de Launoi's attempt is but a rivulet in compariſon of that ocean.

[I] He wrote . . . againſt the maxims of the Pope's flatterers.] To go to the root of the evil, in refuting the immunities which the Monks claim, he thought it neceſſary to eſtabliſh the following important truth, viz. that the Pope has no power with regard to the canons of Councils. He wrote ſeveral letters on this ſubject, which were ſo much approved of in England, and ſo proper to mortify the Italians, that they were reprinted in Cambridge (47). He fell chiefly on Bellarmin; and the following account is given of the victory he obtained over that mighty champion of the Popes. In eo verò adverſarium inter alios nactus eſt Cardinalem Robertum Bellarminum, qui abſurdiſſima quæque Romanæ curiæ placita defendenda ſuſceperat. Si quæ porro in eorum confirmationem deſumpta ex ſacris libris teſtimonia adduxit, clariſſimè demonſtravit Launoius, fuiſſe ea in pravum detorta ſenſum, & aliter intellecta quàm ea ſanctiſſimi quique patres intellexerint, à quorum ſenſu in exponendis Scripturis recedere, nihil aliud eſt quàm fideliſſimos duces, & à Tridentina Synodo datos aſpernari, & in errores omnes ſeipſum conjicere. Si quos etiam canones aut patrum textus laudat Bellarminus, eos plerumque interpolatos oſtendit Launoius, & malâ fide relatos. Sicque hominem armis Scripturæ & traditionis nudatum exponit, velut nutritum in philoſophica palæſtra tyronem, qui adverſus invictam caſtrorum aciem irrito ridendoque conatu digladiatur; & tela ab Ariſtotele deſumpta juveniliter vibrat (48). i. e. " Among other " adverſaries he met with, on this ſubject, was Cardi- " nal Bellarmin, who had undertaken to defend the " moſt abſurd ordinances of the Court of Rome. " But de Launoi demonſtrated very clearly, that all " the teſtimonies he had alledged out of the ſacred " writings to confirm them, were wreſted from their " genuine ſenſe, and taken quite differently from what " all the Fathers had underſtood them; the departing " from whoſe ſenſe in expounding the Scriptures, was " contemning the moſt faithful guides, given by the " Council of Trent, and running into errors of every " kind. Whenever Bellarmine cited any paſſages " from the Canons or Fathers, Launoi ſhewed that the " greateſt part of them were interpolated and unfaith- " ful. Thus he pulls off the armour of ſcripture and " tradition, with which this man had cloathed him- " ſelf; and exhibits him naked, like a youth juſt ma- " triculated, fooliſhly contending with a very learned " opponent, and brandiſhing, with an infantine air, " the weapons borrowed from Ariſtotle." Reiſerus a Lutheran Miniſter (49), publiſhed a book in 1685, which, in ſtrictneſs of ſpeech, is but an abridgment of our Doctor's letters. He put two titles to them which ſerve to our purpoſe. At the top of the pages, throughout the whole book, are the following words; the running title Joh. Launoi Theol. Paris. Anti-Bellarminus: but the title of the book is as follows; Johannes Launoius Theologus & Sorboniſta Pariſienſis teſtis & confeſſor veritatis Evangelico-Catholicæ in potioribus fidei capitibus controverſis adverſus Robertum Bellarminum & alios quoſdam ſedis Romanæ Defenſores egregius & luculentus, nunc poſt obitum contra Chriſtianum Lupum Lovanienſem, Immanuelem à Schelſtrate Antverpienſem, Natalem Alexandrum Pariſienſem, Dominicum Galeſium & Franciſcum Marcheſium Romanos, vindicatus. The author of this book pretends, that John de Launoi is a perſon proper to be inſerted in Illyricus's Catalogus teſtium veritatis. Mr. Couſin has ſpoke, a little too late, of this work of Reiſerus, in his Journal des Sçavans; he ſpeaking of it only in the Journal of the 30th of July 1696, and in that of the 6th of Auguſt following. Theſe two extracts are well enough adapted to acquaint us with Mr. de Launoi's character.

[K] He was forbid holding aſſemblies in his apartment.] Theſe aſſemblies were perfectly innocent; the only converſation was on learning and the ſciences; and yet word was ſent him, that the King deſired they ſhould be diſcontinued (50). It was thought that this was owing to the Archbiſhop of Paris, which made ſome people ſpeak ill of him. But de Launoi did not take that liberty himſelf, and would not even ſuffer the Archbiſhop to be accuſed of it in his preſence; yet he could not forbear ſaying, "that if he was juſtly accuſed, "he muſt be guilty of the greateſt ingratitude." *Hos animorum motus utcunque ſedabat Launoius, reique acerbitatem, benigna ut poterat interpretatione leniebat. Abſtinebat ipſe ſemper ab omni atrocitate verborum. Archiepiſcopum nec incuſabat ipſe, nec incuſari ab aliis, carpive coram ſe patiebatur. [L] His Printer was brought into trouble.] This was in 1675. He was printing his treatiſe on Simony, in which, among other particulars he writes againſt the Annates; and refutes Azorius the Jeſuit, who, about the cloſe of the ſixteenth century, wrote a book to clear them from the charge of Simony. The copies of this work of Mr. Launoi were ſeized at the Printer's; all that could be found were carried off, and he was forbid to ſell the reſt; however this prohibition, on paying a fine of fifty livres, was taken off (52).

[M] There was a book of his in the preſs during his laſt ſickneſs.] Here follows what Mr. Viſé ſaid of him (53). "It may be ſaid that he died, in ſome "meaſure, with his pen in his hand, ſince the day "before he died, he corrected the proofs of a book he "had writ in defence of the King's intereſt. It is "by way of anſwer to an Italian writer, who, ſome "time after, printed a treatiſe againſt the right of "ſecular Princes, with regard to the impediments to "matrimony. De Launoi had before aſſerted a quite "contrary doctrine, in a book publiſhed in the year "1674, wherein the rights of the King, and at the "ſame time of all ſecular Princes are eſtabliſhed on "ſo ſolid a foundation, that this work may be conſi-"dered as one of the moſt uſeful to the State. It had "been anſwered in Italy; and as this anſwer diveſted "ſecular Princes of their eſſential right, with regard "to capacitating or incapacitating their ſubjects to "contract matrimony; this great man was not ſilent, "and took care, as he was dying, of the impreſſion "of a work he had writ to refute the errors of the "Italian author in queſtion. Thus he ſpent all his "days, either for the Church or for his Prince; and "he may be called, not only Doctor or Vindicator of "the King's rights, but alſo Defender of the juſt autho-"rity of Biſhops, the Deſtroyer of falſe privileges, and "Doctor or Aſſertor of the liberties of the Gallican "Church." The author of the Elogium of Mr. de Launoi does not agree with the Mercure Galant, with regard to the book that was then in the preſs. It has not, according to him, an apology for the right of Princes over marriages, but a reply to father Alexander. He tells us that de Launoi began the treatiſe on this right of Princes, at the requeſt of Cardinal Bentivoglio. De Launoi being in Rome, at the time that an enquiry was making in France, whether the marriage of the Duke of Orleans, brother to Lewis XIII, with the Princeſs of Lorrain, was valid, met with Cardinal Bentivoglio in the library of the Dominicans, and propoſed this argument to him. If Princes have had the power to enact laws with regard to the impediments of marriage, they enjoy it ſtill, in caſe they have not been diveſted of it. Now they have enjoyed it; and it cannot be proved that they have been deprived of it. Therefore, the Cardinal deſired Mr. de Launoi to write on this ſubject, and to explain this argument. See the margin (54). The book was ſmall at firſt: but it grew very voluminous before it was publiſhed in 1674. Dominic Galeſius, Biſhop of Ruvo in the Kingdom of Naples, wrote againſt this book. De Launoi had no ſooner ſeen this Prelate's work, but he took up his pen in order to refute it. Scarce had he ended the refutation (55) but he ſet about making a reply to father Alexander. Qui Annatas à Simoniæ labe liberandas ſuſceperat, & Summam Theologicam Thomæ Aquinati tanquam vero ejus auctori aſſerendam (6). His anſwer was very near finiſhed, when he was ſeized by the ſickneſs which carried him off in a few days; and this laſt work had been then ſome time at preſs. This ſhews that Mr. de Viſé and the author of the Elogium, are not agreed with reſpect to the book that de Launoi had in the preſs at the time of his death.

(54) One muſt conclude from thence, that Ancillon is miſtaken, when he ſays, pag. 330. of tom. 2. of Melange, Critique de Literature, that de Launoi wrote this book, by order of a ſuperior power, involuntarily, and againſt his own opinion.

[N] The epitaph which was prepared for him was not ſuffered to be engraved on his monument.] Launoi had made his will eleven years before he died; and he had intreated Mr. le Camus, firſt Preſident in the Court of Aids, his old and very intimate friend, to be his executor. Mr. le Camus diſcharged his duty faithfully on this occaſion; and got Mr. Clement, antient Counſellor of the Court of Aids, to write an epitaph for the deceaſed (57). The Minims having read and examined it; ſhewed a letter from their General, ſignifying, that this epitaph could not be admitted, as it praiſed de Launoi for having always maintained orthodoxy; and ſome time after they declared that the two powers, the royal and eccleſiaſtical, had enjoyned them not to admit any inſcription in praiſe of de Launoi. Ubi illam (inſcriptionem) expenderunt, attulerunt præpoſiti ſui generalis literas, quibus renunciabatur, nec probari nec recipi à ſe poſſe inſcriptionem, quâ Launoio laus defenſæ perpetuo veritatis, & optimæ famæ, maximæque venerationis apud probos quæſitæ tribuatur. Poſtea vetitum ſibi prædicarunt regia ſimul & ſacrâ auctoritate, ne ullum apicem in capella ſua extare ſinerent, quo Launoii nomen commendaretur (58). See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (59), and eſpecially a letter from a Prelate of the Court of Rome, on the decree of the Inquiſition of the 7th of December 1690. I will extract a paſſage from it, which may be of uſe in the hiſtory of our Doctor. The Abbot who wrote that letter, obſerves that the Court of Rome maintains its rights with more policy than the Court of France does hers. He obſerves that the Court of Rome recompences in a moſt ſplendid manner, thoſe who write in its favour; but that thoſe who write, in France, in favour of the Gallican Church, are neglected: "However, ſays the "author of this letter, if I might adviſe, poſterity "ſhould be informed by ſome mark of honour, of the "eſteem in which their merit was held, and the gra-"titude which has been ſhewn to their labours. "But you know how this was done with regard to one "of your friends. There has not been a man more "zealous for the doctrine of the Clergy of France; "nor whoſe labours were more indefatigable, in order "to illuſtrate and defend it, than the excellent Mr. "de Launoi, who likewiſe had a ſoul abhorrent of "every thing that was venal. What has been done "to honour his memory, you very well know. They "would not ſo much as ſuffer to be engraved on "his tomb, the ſlender teſtimony which his friends "paid to his merit, and to the ſervices he had done "the Church of France; they had even ſtopt as it "were his mouth, ſome years before his death, by "forbidding him to continue certain conferences that "were that he died in the Hotel d'Etrées [O], the 10th of March 1678, at above ſeventy ſeven years of age (d). The public has great obligations to him. Had he publiſhed no other work but his de Autoritate negantis Argumenti, he would have done very great ſervice to the Republic of Letters; he having given a thouſand fine hints in that book, for the diſtinguiſhing of truth from falſhood in hiſtorical matters. He was engaged in controverſy with many perſons, and among others with Father Nicolai a Dominican [P], and Mr. Thiers (e).

(d) Elog. pag. 37. He therefore was not born the 21ſt of December 1603, as Moreri affirms.

He drew upon himſelf the indignation of the whole Order of St. Dominick, for attacking with too much freedom the reputation of Thomas Aquinas. The teſtimonies of reſpect, which prudence and gravity prompted him to intermix with his cenſures, did not prevent the reſentment of the Dominicans; for after all, it could not be denied but that the angelical Doctor was faulty, in point of ignorance, or that he was very inſincere, in the alledging of ſeveral paſſages deſigned for the refutation of heterodoxy. Father Baron endeavoured to juſtify Thomas Aquinas, but was not very ſucceſsful in his attempt. This circumſtance will give me an occaſion of making ſeveral obſervations [Q].

" were held at his apartment on thoſe ſubjects, and " where it may be ſaid that more perſons were taught " to defend our liberties than in any other place. It " may even be looked upon as near to a miracle, that " we have thoſe pieces he got printed during his " life-time, in favour of the ſuperiority of Councils, " and againſt the infallibility of Popes, and ſo many " other ſubjects of that kind; and we owe it to his " particular contrivance, which was, the giving it us " by ſmaller portions in the letters he wrote to his " friends; avoiding, by this means, the intolerable " ſlavery of the cenſure of certain Doctors of his time, " without whoſe approbation no book could be licenſed; " and who ſeemed hired to prevent the publication " of all good books, and make authors run mad."

[O] He died in the Hotel d'Etrée.] The Cardinal d'Etrée, when only Biſhop of Laon, had engroſſed, in ſome meaſure, Mr. de Launoi. See Mr. de Marolles (60).

(60) In pag. 159. of his Memoirs, printed in 1636, are theſe words: The eſteem he has for Mr. de Launoi, Doctor of Divinity, one of the greateſt men of the age for learning and probity, is a mark of his judgment. And indeed, he cannot be too careful of ſo great a man, who is an ineſtimable treaſure.

[P] He had a diſpute ... with father Nicolai a Dominican.] The Journal des Savans mentions three works of this author. I. His two diſſertations De Concilio plenario, quod contra Donatiſtas Baptiſmi quæſtionem definivit (61). II. His two diſſertations De Baptiſmi antiquo uſu (62). III. His book De Jejunii Chriſtiani & Chriſtianorum Abſtinentiæ vero ac legitimo ritu juxta veterem Eccleſiæ univerſalis uſum (63). The firſt of theſe three pieces is levelled entirely at de Launoi, who declared that St. Auſtin hinted at the Council of Arles, when he ſaid that the error of the Donatiſts, with regard to the invalidity of the baptiſm of heretics, was condemned in a general Council. De Launoi drew from thence a good number of conſequences diſadvantageous to the Ultromontans. The ſecond piece of this Dominican does not relate to de Launoi; a work which the Proteſtants of France took advantage of, becauſe therein is found an expreſs condemnation of thoſe who conſtrain infidels to be baptiſed. The third piece of this Dominican is againſt de Launoi. Here follows a ſhort paſſage in the ſequel to the Menagiana. " I one day ſaid to Mr. de Launoi, that he " had diſguſted all the Dominicans in the tracts he " had writ againſt father Nicolai, and that they would " all draw their pens againſt him. But he anſwered " me with a malicious air; I dread their penknives " much more than I do their pens (64)."

[Q] Father Baron endeavoured to juſtify Thomas Aquinas, but was not very ſucceſsful in his attempt. This circumſtance will give me an occaſion of making ſeveral obſervations.] Unprejudiced perſons would judge thus of the ſucceſs of this diſpute, though they even ſhould only compare his firſt tract, with the firſt tract of his antagoniſt; but much more will they form this judgment, if they ſhould compare de Launoi's firſt and ſecond reply, with father Baron's anſwer. I ſhall only juſt mention ſeveral tracts belonging to this controverſy. A letter of Mr. de Launoi to Mr. Faure (65) is that in which Thomas Aquinas is animadverted on. Father Baron's anſwer is contained in three paragraphs of Sect. II, Book I, of his apology for the Dominicans (66). Mr. de Launoi's anſwer is in a letter to Mr. Fortin (67). I have not ſeen father Baron's reply; but I know that his adverſary refuted it, in a letter dated from Paris the 1ſt of Auguſt 1667 (68). I know not whether this diſpute went any farther.

To give my reader a ſmall ſpecimen of the judgment, which the Monks formed of the caſt of mind of this Doctor of Sorbonne, I will quote ſome lines from father Baron. Quiſquis hominem privatim, ſeu publicis ſcriptis intimius noverit, etiam ex amiciſſimis, non abnuet meum de illo judicium; aut verius votum. Optandum plane, ne mores ingenuos corrupuiſſet nimio ſuarum cogitationum amore, & alios jure, vel injuriâ carpendi, in naturam inductâ conſuetudine. Unde ad minus, ut cætera omittam, illud incommodi accidit, ut magnum potius, quam bonum nomen videatur ambire, & doctiores viros voluiſſe inumbrare, neque, ut conveniebat ſapienti Theologo, ſatis cordi fuerit effatum illud medicorum, malum bene poſitum ne moveto. Plura enim ab heroicis Temporibus communi piorum opinione receptâ, quæ nihil Fidei adverſa, pietati etiam opportuna, auſus eſt, longe debilioribus, quam niterentur, Argumentis laceſſere; nullo alio operæ pretio, quam ex ſummâ moroſitate comparati ſibi nominis, & juſtis poſſeſſoribus, ſaltem ex probabili opinione juris plerumque inique erepti (69). i. e. " Who- " ſoever has been very familiar with his perſon or " writings (though his greateſt friend) cannot deny the " judgment I have formed, or rather my deſire con- " cerning him. It were greatly to be wiſhed, that an " overfondneſs for his own thoughts, joined to a " habit he had contracted of cenſuring others right or " wrong, had not depraved his happy diſpoſition; " whence this miſchief, to omit the reſt, aroſe, that " he ſeems to have thirſted after a great name, rather " than a good one; and that he wanted to eclipſe men " of greater erudition; nor to have ſufficiently ob- " ſerved, as a wiſe Divine ſhould do, that maxim of " the Phyſicians, remove not an evil that may prove " advantageous. For he has been ſo bold as to " attack many traditions, which ever ſince the pri- " mitive ages, had been unanimouſly received by the " faithful; and without claſhing with their belief, " were of advantage to their piety; and this he has " attempted with much weaker arguments than thoſe " on which they were grounded; and all this with no " other view but to acquire a name by his great mo- " roſeneſs; and to deprive other people of theirs, which " they are generally thought to have a better right to." In the next leaf he contraſts the character of Thomas Aquinas to that of our Sorbonne Doctor; and declares that Thomas Aquinas would have made a ſcruple of conſcience, and been aſhamed of thoſe things, which de Launoi gloried in. The angelical Doctor, adds he, would not have diſturbed the French in their belief, that St. Dionyſius the Areopagite was their firſt Apoſtle; he would not have robbed the inhabitants of Provence, of the glory they claim of having had Mary Magdalen among them; nor the Carmelites of their deſcent from Elias, and the ſcapulary of Simon Stoch; nor the monaſteries of their exemptions. He had better ſubjects to write upon; and even had he met with ſome doubts with regard to thoſe things, and ſome improbability, he would not have meddled with them, but paid a reverence to traditions; which promote piety without prejudicing religion. Habebat meliora ſcribenda (Divus Thomas) & ſubodoratus etiam, ut erat emunctæ naris, aliquid incerti, aut minus veriſimilis, ex medicorum præcepto, malum bene poſitum noluiſſet primus movere: atque iſta longâ traditione rata & firma, quæ nihil obſunt fidei, proſunt etiam pietati, in diſputationem revocare, credidiſſet pertinere ad illius generis quæſtiones ab Apoſtolo damnatas, quæ lites generant,

Father Alexander laboured with much greater ſucceſs to prove that Thomas Aquinas is the true author of the ſummary of Divinity aſcribed to him (f). De Launoi had propoſed ſome doubts on that head (g). Of all his antagoniſts none ſhewed leſs regard for him non ædificationem (70). If all the circumſtances ſet forth by this Dominican were true, there is no doubt but John de Launoi would deſerve condemnation. He would be a man, who, to procure himſelf a name, and pleaſe his own peeviſh temper, had attacked general opinions, which had prevailed from time to time immemorial; were of ſervice to the advancement of piety; no ways repugnant to religion, and grounded on proofs infinitely ſtronger than his objections. This laſt circumſtance alone would be ſufficient to make one condemn an author, who otherwiſe might be prompted by laudable motives; for it is beyond all diſpute, that a long poſſeſſion deſerves ſo much reverence as to prevail with us to maintain it, all things elſe being equal on both ſides. But if it be juſt to maintain it, when its titles are as valid as the pretenſions of the innovator; how much muſt it be more ſo, to forbear all attempts to overthrow it, when they are much ſtronger than thoſe of the adverſe party? But this is not the caſe with our Sorbonne Doctor. The traditions which he oppoſes have no good title, and the arguments he objects to them are unanſwerable. Now, in this caſe, it is plain that people have as juſt a right as poſſible to attack the moſt general and moſt antient opinions; and eſpecially when their falſity keeps up a criminal devotion. I would have my readers take notice, that the reaſons alledged by our Doctor were ſo ſtrong, that they undeceived numberleſs multitudes of people; but yet the abuſes have not been removed; and things continue on the ſame foot in Provence and other places. They palm the ſame ſtories upon you, as they did on your anceſtors, and you find the ſame worſhip and ceremonies there. This proves the difference there is between particular perſons and the public. Periods come about, in which moſt people, in particular, are undeceived, and yet the public practice continues as before. Cicero affirms, that there was not ſo much as an old woman ſtupid enough to give credit to the ſtories, which had been antiently believed with regard to hell; and he employs this remark to prove that fabulous traditions vaniſh away by length of time; but that true doctrines, ſuch as are grounded on the nature of things, are confirmed by age; and that it was to this circumſtance we are to aſcribe the long duration and increaſe of the worſhip of the Gods. Videmus cæteras opiniones fictas, atque vanas diuturnitate extabuiſſe. Quis enim Hippocentaurum fuiſſe, aut Chimæram putat? quæve anus tam excors inveniri poteſt, quæ illa, quæ quondam credebantur, apud inferos portenta extimeſcat? Opinionum enim commenta delet dies, naturæ judicia confirmat. Itaque & in noſtro populo, & in cæteris, Deorum cultus, religionumque ſanctitates exiſtunt in dies majores, atque meliores (71). Juvenal alſo complains, that the antient doctrine with regard to hell was no longer believed by any one.

Thus we ſee a great change in the opinions of particular perſons, and yet the publick worſhip had not changed, either in the time of Juvenal or Cicero. There were ſtill the ſame feſtivals, the ſame proceſſions and ſacrifices, not only in honour of the celeſtial Gods, but alſo in honour of Pluto, Proſerpine, and the reſt of the infernal Deities. This like inconſtancy on one hand, and conſtancy on the other, will be ever obſerved. Some Doctors (men of learning) of greater parts and more courageous than their brethren, will undeceive a numberleſs multitude of people, and yet cauſe no change in the publick ceremonies. The Ritual will laſt longer than the Faith or Religion on which it is grounded. Too many perſons will find it their intereſt to maintain it, and will have induſtry enough for that purpoſe, though they can give no better reaſons for it, than thoſe urged to Cotta in the above-cited work of Cicero. They urged to him, among other things, the apparitions of ſome Deities; and to prove the reality of theſe apparitions, they alledged the foundation of ſome Temples, a decree of the Senate, or a proverb . . . I expected reaſons, replied he, and you bring only popular ſtories. Tum Lucilius: An tibi, inquit, fabellæ videntur? Nonne ab A. Poſthumio ædem Caſtori & Polluci in foro dedicatam, nonne S. C. de Vatieno vides? Nam de Sagrâ, Græcorum etiam eſt vulgare proverbium: qui quæ affirmant, certiora eſſe dicunt, quam illa quæ apud Sagram. His igitur auctoribus nonne debes moveri? Tum Cotta, Rumoribus, inquit, mecum pugnas, Balbe: ego autem à te rationes requiro (73). i. e. " Then Lucilius: Do you " look upon theſe things as fables? Do not you be- " hold a temple in the forum, dedicated, by A. Poſt- " humius, to Caſtor and Pollux, and a decree of " the Senate with reſpect to Vatienus? With regard " to Sagra, there is a common proverb among the " Greeks, who, when they would affirm a thing, " ſay it is more certain than any thing in Sagra. " Ought you not therefore to be moved by theſe au- " thorities? . . . Cotta anſwered; O Balbus, you com- " bat me with popular tales, but I inſiſt upon your " giving me reaſons." Mr. de Launoi might have employed the like anſwer, and many others; but, as I obſerved before, too many people were concerned, in point of intereſt, to oppoſe the innovation and maintain the tradition. They ſeem to have well weighed the conſequences of the principle, which one of the interlocutors in Cicero has laid down, I mean that they were ſenſible, that to prove a tradition true, one muſt ſhew that it ſtood the teſt of many ages. It is ſuppoſed, in Cicero, that no Doctrine which is ill grounded can laſt for any conſiderable time (74). Quid enim eſt hoc illo evidentius? quod niſi cognitum, comprehenſumque animis haberemus, non tam ſtabilius opinio permaneret, nec confirmaretur diuturnitate temporis, nec una cum ſæculis ætatibuſque hominum inveterare potuiſſet. Etenim videmus cæteras opiniones, &c (75). i. e. " For " what can be more manifeſt than this? which, had " we not known and comprehended could not have " remained ſo long an eſtabliſhed opinion, have been " confirmed by length of time, nor have grown old " with the ſeveral ages of men; for we ſee that other " falſe opinions, &c." Doubtleſs the Monks are prompted by ſome more weighty motive than what this argument ſupplies, to oppoſe John de Launoi and perſons of his character. We may obſerve by the way, that the argument drawn from antiquity is employed in Cicero to prove a falſity; it being made uſe of to prove the reality and exiſtence of the falſe Gods of the heathen ſyſtem. This therefore is a principle which may lead one into error; and nevertheleſs the maxim, that time deſtroys falſe opinions, Opinionum commenta delet dies, might have been long ſince urged againſt the falſe worſhip of the ancient Greeks and Romans; ſince for many ages, there is no country, in which their Religion, their Jupiter, Juno, Venus, Neptune, &c. have been acknowledged and worſhipped. Thus their cauſe falls to the ground, when once it is ſuppoſed that length of years deſtroys falſe Doctrines. It is to be obſerved, that this principle can never be admitted as good proof, unleſs we fix and determine the number of years ſufficient to diſtinguiſh truth from error. In caſe a thouſand years are ſufficient, then every opinion which has laſted that term of years is true; but if no time be limited, it is to no purpoſe to conclude, that ſince a Doctrine has laſted four thouſand years it muſt neceſſarily be true. No man knows what will come to paſs, or whether the fifth millenary may not put a period to that which reſiſted the four preceding ones. A reflexion of Horace may be applied on this occaſion;

I have one thing more to obſerve. It does not appear likely, that thoſe who tread in de Launoi's ſteps, will do any thing effectual, ſo long as things ſhall be carried on only in the way of a literary diſpute. The patrons of falſe devotion will never recede: they find too much their account in not giving up any thing, and are powerful enough to ſecure themſelves from any violence. The Court of Rome will aſſiſt and ſupport them. The Church of Rome ſeems to have adopted the Religion of the God Terminus, of the Roman commonwealth. This God did not recede or yield a tittle, not even to Jupiter himſelf, which they ſaid, was a ſign that the Romans would never recede or fall back, nor ever give up an inch of ground to their enemies (77). If any Pope ſhould agree to ſacrifice ſome things, ſome ſuperannuated traditions for inſtance, in order to procure a reunion with the ſame Schiſmaticks, he might expect to be as much inveighed againſt, as much or more than the Heathens did againſt the ignominious peace concluded by the Emperor Jovian (78). The Jeſuits, notwithſtanding their great credit, were not able to prevent the inquiſition of Toledo from condemning ſeveral volumes of the Acta Sanctorum; and it is certain that this ſtorm was raiſed wholly at the ſollicitation of the Carmelites, and ſome other Monks, who were exaſperated at father Papebroch and his aſſiſtants for rejecting ſeveral acts and old traditions, as apocryphal. They are to be commended for having made themſelves worthy of this thunder-bolt, and will do well to merit others. It is on ſuch an occaſion that the character of a Capaneus is a laudable one (79).

But in combating, in this manner, the Inquiſitors, they will render themſelves uſeleſs with regard to the reformation of publick abuſes; their criticiſm, tho' much ſeverer than it is, would, at moſt, ſerve only to the inſtruction of particular perſons. The diſeaſe is paſt cure. Father Mabillon has laid down ſome very good rules with reſpect to the worſhip of certain Saints, and the judgment to be formed of relicks (81); but what has he gained by this? It was anſwered, Phyſician cure thyſelf. Reform firſt the worſhip which is paid, in ſome Monaſteries of their order, (St. Benedict's) to Saints as dubious as any. He was told of the injury he does to the Church, and the advantage he gives the Proteſtants (82). Is not this ſhutting the door, as it were, to all his good deſigns? Mr. Thiers takes up his pen againſt falſe relicks, he enquires where the bodies of the Martyrs lie, he publiſhes diſſertations on the holy tear of Vendôme, and on St. Firmin. Now all this is loſt labour. The King's Council ſuppreſſes his book on St. Firmin, as the Biſhop of Amiens had condemned a letter that had been publiſhed on the ſame queſtion. See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres (83), and the third part of the Bibliotheca volante. All the Saints of a diſcreet zeal are nipt in the bud. They build on this principle, that it is dangerous to annul old cuſtoms; that old boundaries muſt not be removed; and that, according to the old proverb, We ſhould leave the minſter where it ſtands (84). The proſperity of Chriſtian Rome, like that of Pagan Rome, is grounded on the preſervation of the old Rites (85). Conſecrations muſt be complied with, and Religion will not ſuffer any innovation to be made in them. Sed illa mutari vetat religio, & conſecratis utendum eſt (86). In our days, uſed a Sub-prior of St. Anthony to ſay, let us beware of innovations (87).

[R] Of all his antagoniſts, none ſhewed leſs regard for him than father Theophilus Raynaud.] We need but read his Hercules Commodianus, which ſhews the utmoſt fire and paſſion. Thoſe who will not take the pains to read it, and will only reflect on the following quotation, will be perſuaded that our Doctor never met with more injurious treatment. *Infruniti vir ingenii Joannes Launoyus, cui nihil adeo ſacrum fuit, quod non fœdarit ſcriptione aliqua petulanti ac pluſquam cenſoria, Cœlitibus ipſis non pepercit, imo in hoc non ſemel coniſcavit . . . . . He did " not ſpare the Saints themſelves, but even declared " war againſt Heaven more than once . . . . . When " this man thought fit to attack me likewiſe, excited " by a certain dreaming Marſyas, who was diſpleaſed " at my juſt glancing, in that counterſcarp, on his " chimerical and even openly heretical poſitions, he " was chaſtiſed by a Doctor of Divinity, my friend " and fellow Citizen; having firſt laid open and expoſed all the idle ſtorming, by which he endeavoured to paſs for another Hercules, and then the " lies, calumnies, garrulity, ſcurrility, and other womaniſh faults, which diſgraced his book, or rather ſatyr, written againſt me; inſomuch that, after the example of Commodus, he ſeemed deſirous " of appearing, in that work as a terrible Hercules, " and a woman armed only with flattery and falſhood. " For this cauſe he was dubbed with the title of " Commodus's Hercules." In another place this Jeſuit compares him to Iſhmael. Homo Iſraelita, cujus manus contra omnes, Joannes Launoy (89). [T. Raynaud publiſhed this piece under the name of Honoratus Leotardus. He never employed more Gall than on this occaſion. It is a Satyr from beginning to end. a particular not very much known; and which does not well agree with the little friendſhip there was between this Doctor and the Jeſuits, and with the affection he bore Mr. Arnauld. The fact is, that his opinion concerning grace was contrary to the doctrine of St. Auguſtin (l).

that there are two ways of loving truth; the one to love it for its own ſake; and the other, to love it in regard to one's ſelf. . . . That St. Auſtin loved it for its own ſake . . . . that it is not quite the ſame with reſpect to the generality of Criticks, who only love truth, either for the glory it gives to thoſe who firſt diſcover it; or, which is oftner the caſe, from a peeviſh humour of domineering over others. " I will not ſay, continued he, " that de Launoi was one of thoſe ramblers who go " in queſt of truth as Knight Errants formerly did " after mighty atchievements. But then it cannot be " denied, that numbers of very learned people have " ſometimes looked upon him as a Critick who over- " ſhot the mark, and did not always find the truth " he idolized. This will appear, if we caſt an " eye on ſuch literati as have attacked him, or " wrote ſevere anſwers to him." One may have ſeen him quite covered with the duſt of his daily combats, and with the bruiſes he had met with on thoſe occaſions (93). This author adds that, even in Mr. Arnauld's opinion, he had not always maintained orthodoxy; he had declared too much in favour of a divine inferior to St. Auſtin; and from which the Proteſtants, of the Arminian principles, pretended to gain great advantage. From this we may infer that he did not approve St. Auſtin's doctrine with regard to predeſtination; but we ſhall be much better informed of his ſentiments concerning that doctrine, by the preface to a treatiſe which is not yet publiſhed. Mr. Simon has inſerted it in one of his letters (94) and has ſhewn that Dr. de Launoi condemns the ſentiments of St. Auſtin in this work. This letter is not very advantageous to the Doctor, and gives us a very mean idea of his erudition. See the Journal des Savans of November 14, 1701, pag. 722, Dutch Edition, and the Journal of Trevoux, of Auguſt 1703, pag. 1313. of the French edition. The Journal of Trevoux, for January 1704, Article I. ſpeaks of a defence of St. Auſtin, by father Daniel, in oppoſition to the diſſertation aſcribed to de Launoi.

[" The work Bayle ſpeaks of, the preface whereof " Mr. Simon had writ, was printed, probably under " the direction of Mr. Simon, in 1702. it is a ſmall " 12*mo*. Many people are of opinion that it was " not writ by Mr. de Launoi; but it is univerſally " allowed, I believe, that it contains the real ſenti- " ments of that doctor. I read that book when it " was firſt publiſhed; and did not perceive any par- " ticulars in it, which could make one judge that " it was not writ by de Launoi. I ſince read (above " twenty years ago) an Extract of a ſmall diſcourſe " made by this Doctor at Sorbonne, in Mr. Arnauld's " affair, in the year 1655; and I remember that it be- " gan in pretty near the following Terms (in Latin): " Every one knows that, on the Articles of Predeſtination and Grace, I am not of St. Auſtin's opinion; but " adhere to what all the Greek and Latin fathers who " preceded him, have taught on that ſubject. It was " notorious that de Launoi perſiſted always in the " ſame ſentiments; but it is my opinion that he had " not ſtudied this ſubject ſufficiently, in order to form " a right judgment of it. And indeed this work " publiſhed in 1702 is far from being a good one." De Launoi wrote a great deal, and did not think enough.] From the Remarks to the Paris edition of Bayle's Dictionary.

LAUNOI (JOHN DE) was born in Valdeſie, a village of the Lower Normandy, in the dioceſe of Coutance, and not at Valagne, as ſome authors pretend. After going through his firſt ſtudies in Coutance, where he was educated under the direction of William de Launoi, his uncle, he came to Paris, and purſued his ſtudies during five or ſix years ſtay in that city (a). He afterwards received his Diploma, after which he was ordained Prieſt, and took his degree of Doctor in Divinity of the College of Navarre in 1634. He went the ſame year into Italy, and there contracted with ſeveral Literati a friendſhip, which he cultivated afterwards. At his return to Paris he devoted himſelf entirely to the ſtudy of the Fathers and Divines; and made great collections of paſſages from both, with which he afterwards interſperſed his different works. About the year 1645, he was appointed Royal Cenſor of Books of Divinity; but it is not known how long he acted in that capacity (b). The approbation he gave in 1646 to a French Hiſtory of the Hoſpital of the Holy Ghoſt of Montpellier, drew upon him the indignation of ſeveral of his brethren, who bore an animoſity to him. They alſo accuſed him of ſaying in converſation before the Bachelors, that Clerks were not obliged, by any Canon Law, to repeat the Breviary. At laſt their artifices were ſo ſucceſsful, that they cauſed him to be expelled the College of Navarre (c). It was then he retired to Abbot d'Eſtrées, who lived in Laon College (d). That Abbot having been made Biſhop of Laon in 1653 was determined to ſerve his friend de Launoi; and thereupon gave him, at different times, two Canonries in his Cathedral; but he reſigned them a little after, upon pretence that he had no voice, and conſequently was not qualified for his employments. He refuſed other preferments, being void of all ambition, and contented with what he poſſeſſed. Below is his epitaph, which the Minims would not ſuffer to be engraved on his monument [A]. Theſe two editions were followed by three others at Frankfort, in 8vo, in the year 1602, 1615 and 1627. The work is intitled Hiſtoria Anatomica humani Corporis & ſingularum ejus partium, multis controverſiis & obſervationibus novis illuſtrata (5). i. e. " An anatomical hiſtory of the hu-

The word novis gives us to underſtand, that the Paris edition of 1600 was not the firſt; it having been preceded by that of Lyons 1593, in 8vo, which is but half as large. I have ſeen two tranſlations of the Paris edition the one by Francis Size, and printed at Paris in the year 1610 in 8vo, the other by Theophilus Gelée phyſician at Dieppe. It was printed at Paris in folio in the year 1613, with ſeveral other treatiſes of du Laurens (6) tranſlated by the abovementioned Gelée, or which had been already publiſhed in French by du Laurens (7), or had been collected from his lectures, when he uſed to read publickly to the ſurgeons of the Univerſity of Montpellier, in 1587, 1588. Theſe laſt treatiſes are upon the gout, the leproſy, and the venereal diſeaſe. All the french treatiſes I juſt now mentioned have alſo been publiſhed in Latin. They are inſerted in Tom. II of Du Laurens's works, Frankfort edition of 1621 folio, with the Annotationes in Artem parvam Galeni, & Conſilia Medica. The treatiſe on Criſes had been printed ſeparately in Latin at Franckfort, in the year 1596, and 1606 8vo, (8). No notice is taken in Lindenius renovatus of the Latin edition of all du Laurens works, made at Paris in two volumes, 4to, 1627, by Gui Patin, who gave a Latin tranſlation of ſome treatiſes which du Laurens had writ only in his mother tongue.

(5) See Lindenius renovatus, pag. 47. The Lyons edition of 1623, in 8vo, has been omitted.

(6) That on Criſes, divided into three books, with the general method relating to the prognoſtics and criſes of diſtempers, and that on the King's Evil, divided into two Books, the firſt whereof treats of the wonderful vertue of curing the King's Evil by the touch, conferred by the Divine Power on the Kings of France only; and the ſecond explains the nature of the King's Evil, &c.

The French verſion of the hiſtory of Anatomy, printed in 8vo at Paris, in the year 1610, has no plates, but Gelée's tranſlation in folio has. The Printer who omitted them gives the following reaſon, among others for it, that du Laurens added figures with no other view but to pleaſe certain people, not that he thought them very uſeful, but that they would ſerve to amuſe rather than inſtruct ſtudents. Farther, he himſelf declares, that he let the printer of the Latin edition take the plates or figures from thoſe to be found among the common Anatomiſts, ſuch as thoſe of the Sieurs Paré & Guillemeau, ſurgeons to our moſt Chriſtian Kings, or of Charles Stephens, doctor of phyſick in this Univerſity: ſo that if there be any errors in the figures, he deſires they may be laid to the charge of the printer and engraver; and ſays that he has explained himſelf ſufficiently in his hiſtory, ſo as not to want any help from figures; nothing being required but a ſight of the annual diſſections, without which no perſon can attain to a perfect ſkill in anatomy (9). As theſe particulars relate to the hiſtory of this work, I imagined the reader would not be diſpleaſed to find them here.

has borne several editions. They are mistaken who assert that he reaped advantage by Aquapendente's conversation [C]. His native place has not been justly expressed in Lindenius renovatus [D]. ANTHONY DU LAURENS, his youngest brother, was an Advocate in the King's Council, and died in the year 1647, at eighty three years of age. He married Anne Robert, daughter of the Advocate Anne Robert, who was living in 1662 [E]. Mr. DU LAURENS, Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris, was their son (b); and LOUISA DU LAURENS, wife to Mr. Baltazar Master of Requests, and Intendant of Justice in Languedoc, was their daughter (c). We are told in the Mercure Galant, that PETER DU LAURENS Doctor of the Sorbonne, formerly Grand Prior and Vicar General of the Order of Clugni, died Bishop of Bellai the 17th of January 1705, aged fourscore and nine years; and that he was grandson of Andrew du Laurens, first Physician to King Henry IV (d).

sure. Peruse the following words. All that the Sieur du Laurens has wrote by way of question, is an anatomy that is merely physiological. In his anatomy he has committed great errors; not those which Collado and Laurembergius have pointed out, and which are in his questions; but in the text of his anatomical history; which is so plainly demonstrated, that any man, who is ever so little versed in anatomy, will confess that he is not to be defended (10).

This Collado, or rather Colladon, has carried his censure much too far, He pretending that there was nothing good in du Laurens's anatomy. This very great prejudice and passion has been observed by John Sperlingen, professor of physick at Wittemberg. Hæc & plura ejusmodi Collado, says he, quæ non hic saltem, sed ubique contra Laurentium magno fervore scriptitat. Ubi ita se gerit, ut occulati videant omnes, non tam amore veritatis quam antiquitatis, cordato huic contradixisse viro. Sed non objicienda nova omnia, alius & ipse hic Colladonis liber è medio tollendus & è bibliothecis foret exterminandus. Quem tamen multa bona, multa acutè excogitata continere, non imus inficias. Interim etiam non omnia in Laurentio falsa, sed plurima vera, plurima non absque insigni legentium commodo scripta sunt. Fallit Collado, cum inquit: Laurentii Anatome tota mundis scatet, ut de ea verè Prophetæ querimoniam possis queri, omnis princeps ægrotat, à vertice ad plantam pedis, & non est in corpore toto sanitas; adeò omnes libri partes ineluibilibus errorum maculis imbutæ sunt, ut nescio, quâ creta aut cimelia absterge purgarique possint. Fallit & cum scribit: Docere vis, quæ non intelligis, quomodo id præstabis? non per te sanè, non enim potes dare quod non habes, sed κατὰ τὸ συμβεβηκὸς, instar duræ & stupidæ cotis, acutum reddere quæ ferrum valet, expers ipsa secandi. Non facies sanè tuorum librorum lectores doctiores, imò si tibi fidunt indoctiores: sed tum deprehensâ doctrinæ tuæ falsitate justo perciti zelo, veræ & genuinæ medicinæ auxiliatrices munus asserent, præmium clarioris scientiæ eruncatis tuis ex suo aliorumque animis erroribus perniciosissimis metent. Ne quid nimis, Collado! Amicè tractandi publici boni causa qui laborant. Næves si habent, & tegendi & detegendi illi. Errare humanum sed errata stylo atrocia lingua virulenta notare, ac è musca elephantem facere, inhumanum (11). i. e. "These and more of the same sort, which Colladon writes with great heat and passion, not only there, but every where against du Laurens; on which occasion he so behaves, that all sagacious readers will see, that he contradicted this judicious man, not so much out of a love of truth, as of antiquity. But all new things are not to be rejected, for otherwise this very book of Colladon must be thrown away, and banished from libraries: which, we at the same time own, contains many valuable and sagacious particulars. With regard to the compositions of du Laurens, all he has wrote is not false, but many things are true, and may be of very great benefit to the reader. Colladon imposes upon us when he writes as follows: The anatomy of du Laurens is quite full of errors, so that we may justly apply to it the complaint made by the prophet, every prince is sick from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot, and there is no health in any part of his body: every part of his work is polluted with spots, so very black, that no fuller's earth can possibly take them out. He likewise imposes upon us when he writes. You go about to teach, what you yourself do not understand; now how will you do this? Not by your instruction, for you cannot give what you yourself have not; but by accident; like a hard and stupid bone, which, though blunt, can yet give an edge to steel. The perusal of your books will not make your readers more learned, but on the contrary more ignorant, if they should believe what you say; till by finding out the falsity of your doctrine, they become fired with a just zeal, and resolve to join with those who profess true and genuine physick; and gain the prize of excellent science, by radicating your most pernicious errors, out of their own minds and those of other people. You dwell too long on this subject, Colladon! those ought to be treated in a friendly manner, who labour for the publick good. If they have errors, a veil should be thrown over them. To err is human; but to attack errors with a virulent pen, and to raise a molehill to a mountain, is barbarous".

[C] They are mistaken who assert, that he reaped advantage by Aquapendente's conversation.] We will illustrate this by the following extract of a letter of Guy Patin. "Mr. Hofman ... (12) observes somewhere, that du Laurens has published a certain anatomical truth or discovery, which would never have entered his mind, had he not heard it at Fabricio Aquapendente's, at whose table he eat for some years. Now this is absolutely false; the said Sieur du Laurens having never studied but at Paris under Lewis Duret, and that during seven years ... So that he never studied in Padua; which I am very certain of, I having been, for these twenty three years past, Physician to the family of Messieurs du Laurens, who are two Counsellors and a Master of Requests, whose father, who was the younger brother of Andrew du Laurens, died but ten years since, of a quartan ague, aged fourscore and seven years; and who formerly gave me all the informations I could desire (13)."

[D] His native place has not been justly expressed in Lindenius Renovatus.] The author of that book employs those words, Natus in Academia Monspelienſi (14). i. e. "Born in the University of Montpellier." This expression would have been improper, even though the mother of Andrew du Laurens had been delivered of him in a college at Montpellier. I am not certain that he was born in Montpellier, as the author (15) quoted in Freherus's Theatrum affirms. It is no conclusive argument to the contrary, that this Andrew had a brother (16) born at Arles; for it is no extraordinary thing for one man's children to be born in different towns. I therefore shall wait for a clearer proof of this point, as likewise of the following words in Lindenius renovatus, obiit in patria, which signify that Andrew du Laurens died in Montpellier; but in the mean time shall be almost persuaded that he was born in Arles, since Guy Patin calls him Arelatenſis, in the title-page of the edition he published in 1627.

[E] He married Anne Robert .... who was living in 1662.] Patin affirms, in a letter dated the 26th of December 1662 (17), that on this very day he had ordered extreme unction to be given her, she being fourscore and seven years of age; but he had said elsewhere (18), that she was but fourscore and one in 1661.

LAURENTIO (NICHOLAS) vulgarly called Cola de Rienzo, was, in the sixteenth Century, one of those men whom the providence of God employs from time to time, time, as a theatre or ſtage, on which men may behold the viciſſitudes and caprices of human life [A]. He was ſon to a mean Vintner and a Laundreſs. His application to ſtudy in his youth, and the natural ſtrength of his genius, made him very eminent. He became vaſtly eloquent; and could repeat by heart the fineſt paſſages in Cicero, Livy, Julius Cæſar, Valerius Maximus and Seneca. He was prodigiouſly fond of antient inſcriptions, and was very able to explain them. He got a Notary's place, which at that time was ſo honourable, that Gentlemen did not ſcruple to exerciſe it. The commiſſaries of the ſeveral diviſions or diſtricts of Rome having diſpatched him to wait on Pope Clement VI, who kept his See at Avignon, he made ſo eloquent a ſpeech, that he gained the eſteem and benevolence of the Pontiff in queſtion, and the admiration of that Court; which gave him the courage to declaim ſtrongly againſt ſuch great Lords in Rome as oppreſſed the citizens. Cardinal John Colonna was determined to make him ſuffer for this; but after conſidering the affair maturely, he diſcontinued the ill offices he was doing him with regard to the Pope. Laurentio grew more and more exaſperated againſt theſe petty tyrants of Rome; and he one day made ſo bold a ſpeech in the Capitol againſt them, that two boxes on the ear were given him when he had ended. The perſons who ſtruck him were a Lord of the Colonna family, at that time Chamberlain of Rome, and Thomaſo Fortifiocca, Secretary of the Senate. Laurentio diſſembled his reſentment, and continued to deliver his ſpeeches in the Capitol, and in various Churches; and to compoſe emblems, the whole in order to point out the evil adminiſtration of juſtice. The perſons concerned looked upon all this as ſport; and particularly when they obſerved that his ſpeeches were blended with facetious ſayings, and that he threatened ſome of them with capital puniſhment. In all probability they imagined, that, by reaſon of his wild extravagances, it would not be in his power to hurt them, but they were miſtaken; for taking advantage of the abſence of Stephen Colonna, who had marched out of Rome with his ſoldiers to fetch proviſions, he got together the people, made a ſpeech, enacted laws, drove all the great men out of the city, aſſumed the judiciary functions, and was declared Tribunus Auguſtus and deliverer of the people in 1346. The faction of the exiles were not powerful enough to make head againſt him, becauſe of their diviſions; whence he had an opportunity of managing things at pleaſure, and ſaw himſelf at the head of a new Roman Commonwealth, in whoſe name he wrote to the other States, to the Emperor, and the Pope himſelf. The better to confirm his authority, he ſentenced many perſons to death; and, among others, he hanged Martin de Porto, one of the petty tyrants of Rome. He received embaſſies from ſeveral Princes and Commonwealths; and boldly ſummoned the Pope to come and reſide in Rome with the College of Cardinals. He was ſo fortunate in the war he ſuſtained againſt the faction of the Nobles, that he ſuppreſſed it entirely; but he then acted as moſt of thoſe do, who take up arms upon the ſpecious pretence of liberty; it is not the tyranny they hate, but the tyrants; they are vexed to ſee other people, and not themſelves, exerciſe the ſupreme authority. Laurentio had no ſooner cruſhed the tyranny of others, but he himſelf turned tyrant; upon which he was treated as he had treated others; he was forced to fly, and hanged in effigy at Rome as a traitor. After having been concealed ſome time, he preſented himſelf before the Emperor, who gave him leave, but without adviſing him to it, to go and ſalute the Pope. He, at firſt, met with an unfavourable reception from him; but after having been impriſoned ſome months, he followed the Pope's Legate to Rome. He raiſed up his party again to ſo high a pitch, that he was enabled to renew the war againſt the Colonna's; but his rigorous treatment of the people, and his exactions, made him ſo odious, that they took up arms. He imagined that his eloquence would have the power to calm this ſtorm, as it had done on ſo many other occaſions, but was miſtaken; and it was to no purpoſe that he ſhewed himſelf to the people, and harangued them from the windows; they ſetting fire to his palace. He endeavoured to fly in the diſguiſe of a beggar; and was got almoſt out of danger, when he was diſcovered by a certain little man. Another thruſt him thro' the belly with a ſword; he was quite covered with wounds; his body was dragged through the ſtreets, and hung up by the feet (a). It continued two years in that condition, after which the Jews burnt it in the fields (b). Some of his writings are ſtill extant [B].

He was for ſome time Auditor or Judge in the Rota of Macerata, after which he devoted himſelf to the Church, and was a Prieſt, and Provoſt or Preſident of Mirandola. He died in 1694, at above fourſcore years of age. He publiſhed a work intitled, La Cicceide, which is of a very ſingular kind [A]. It is a collection of Sonnets, and ſome other kinds of Poems, in which he inveighs with the utmoſt ſeverity againſt Senior Arrighini (a), a native of Lucca, who had been his collegue in the Rota of Macerata. He deſcribes him as a man wholly made up of genitals (b). His verſification is extremely eaſy, natural and flowing. His Poems diſcover a ſurprizing fruitfulneſs of imagination, and lively and ingenious thoughts; but they all turn on a ſubject that is ſo very obſcene; and the whole is animated with ſo vindictive, and ſometimes ſo profane a ſpirit, that the readers of them may be juſtly offended. [A] He publiſhed a work entitled la Cicceide, which is of a very ſingular kind.] I have ſeen only the ſecond edition of it (1), which is of 1692, and the complete title of it is as follows: La Cicceide legitima: in queſta ſeconda impreſſione ordinatamente diſpoſta, notabilmente accreſciuta, e fedelmente rincontrata con gli Originali dell' Autore. i. e. "The Genuine Edition of the Cic-"ceide, properly digeſted, greatly enlarged, and faith-"fully compared with the Author's Originals. The "Second Edition." This book is divided into two parts; the title of the firſt being le Teſticolate, and of the ſecond le Sghinazzate. The perſon abuſed in this work is ſhadowed under the name of Don Ciccio. I I am to obſerve, that Ciccio is, by the Neapolitans, made uſe of to ſignify Franceſco, (Francis) and the Romans, inſtead of Ciccio, ſay Cecco. The chief deſign of the author is to prove that Don Ciccio is a Coglione, which is the burthen, if I may ſo call it, of all the 318 ſonnets, which compoſe the firſt part of the Cicceide. This is the center of the ſphere of its activity; and I believe that the ſecond part will make up the complement to the number 360, which is the moſt uſual diviſion of a circle. Nothing is wanting in this ſphere of ſlander; it has all its degrees, and they all terminate in the ſame point. Signior Lazarelli, in what manner ſoever he may begin, always ends with the coglioneria of Don Ciccio. It is the burthen of all his ſonnets. This is going very far. It would not have been poſſible for Voiture to write any thing like this in honour of the great Prince, to whom he wrote as follows, You who are a true Cæſar in genius and learning, a Cæſar in diligence, in vigilance, in courage, & per omnes caſus Cæſar, you have deceived the opinion &c. (2). Our Poet turns his Ciccio on every ſide, and exhibits him in every light,

He follows him from the inſtant of his conception, to his death; and goes ſtill farther, he jeſting on his coffin, his burial, his epitaph &c; he purſues him to Charon's boat, wherein he places him, and declares that he ſhall be ferried over gratis; and he even ſays that he has no occaſion of being wafted over. He ſuppoſes that Charon ſpeaks as follows to him:

He retrenched, in the ſecond edition, ſuch ſonnets as were thought the moſt profane, and had occaſioned the putting his book into the Index Expurgatorius. They related to the baptiſm, confirmation, and extreme unction of Ciccio, and ſome other tickliſh ſubjects. A manuſcript copy of them has been put into my hands, and I have been adviſed to inſert at leaſt one of them; in order that thoſe who cannot procure a ſight of the Cicceide, a work little known out of Italy, may form to themſelves an idea of Lazarelli's genius. I have made choice of the ſonnet which relates to extreme unction.

[B] There are ſome apologies or excuſes, in the preface of his book, which I ſhall take ſome notice of.] It ſeems to have been wrote by one of the author's friends, who proteſts, that he was extremely grieved on account of the firſt edition of his work; and that it was with reluctance he conſented to the ſecond, though it was in a better condition. His ſcruples were founded on certain alluſions to the ceremonies of the Church; and on the oppoſition that might be found between the duties of Charity, and a book that was grounded on ſlander. He adds that this work is only a collection of ſallies of wit, and poetical vein, notwithſtanding which the author's ſentiments are perfectly orthodox; that he ſubmits all thoſe pieces to the cenſure of his ſuperiors, and deteſts whatever they ſhall judge worthy of being condemned; that he hopes the reader will be ſo equitable, as to make a juſt diſtinction between what are merely witty conceits, and a deſign of offending; and in fine, that although he wrote with ſome licentiouſneſs, his actions were nevertheleſs pure. This is only a rude extract of his apology, and therefore I will ſet down the author's own words (6). E à dirà il vero è l'uno, e l'altro degli accennati

☞LEE (NATHANIEL), an eminent Engliſh Poet, was ſon of a Clergyman of the Church of England, and was educated at Weſtminſter School under Dr. Richard Buſby, from whence he was ſent to Trinity College in the Univerſity of Cambridge. He wrote eleven Plays [A], which were acted with great applauſe. He became diſtracted in his ſenſes, and was ſome years confined in the Hoſpital of Bethlem; and after he was diſmiſſed from thence, was never perfectly recovered, but died in the ſtreet in the night-time (a). Mr. Addiſon tells us (b), that "among our modern Engliſh Poets, "there is none who was better turned for tragedy than our author; if inſtead of favour- "ing the impetuoſity of his genius, he had reſtrained it, and kept it within proper bounds. "His thoughts are wonderfully ſuited to tragedy, but frequently loſt in ſuch a cloud of "words, that it is hard to ſee the beauty of them. There is an infinite fire in his works, "but ſo involved in ſmoke, that it does appear in half its luſtre. He frequently ſucceeds "in the paſſionate parts of the tragedy, but more particularly where he ſlackens his efforts, "and eaſes the ſtile of thoſe epithets and metaphors, in which he ſo much abounds."

The Earl of Rocheſter, in his alluſion to Horace's tenth Satyr of the firſt book, writes thus of this Tragedy:

"When Lee makes temperate Scipio fret and rave,
"And Hannibal a whining am'rous ſlave,
"I laugh, and wiſh the hot-brain'd ſuſtian fool
"In Buſby's hands; to be well laſh'd at School.

III. Gloriana, the Court of Auguſtus: a Tragedy, acted at the Theatre Royal 1676. Dedicated to the Ducheſs of Portſmouth. The Earl of Rocheſter, in a Satyr of his in imitation of Sir John Suckling's Seſſion of the Poets, writes thus of this Play.

"Nat. Lee ſtept in next, in hopes of a prize;
"Apollo remember'd he had hit once in thrice:
"By the Rubies in's face he could not deny,
"But he had as much wit as Wine could ſupply;
"Confeſs'd, that indeed he had a muſical note,
"But ſometimes ſtrain'd ſo hard, that it rattled i'th'
"throat.
"Yet own'd he had ſenſe; t'encourage him for't,
"He made him his Ovid in Auguſtus's Court."

IV. The Rival Queens: or, the Death of Alexander the Great: a Tragedy, acted at the Theatre Royal 1677. Dedicated to the Earl of Mulgrave. Mr. Dryden has a copy of commendatory Verſes upon this Play prefixed to it. V. Mithridates King of Pontus, A Tragedy, acted at the Theatre Royal 1678. Dedicated to the Earl of Dorſet. VI. Theodoſius, or, The Force of Love; a Tragedy acted at the Duke of York's Theatre. Dedicated to the Ducheſs of Richmond. VII. Cæſar Borgia; a Tragedy, acted at the Duke of York's Theatre 1680. Dedicated to the Earl of Pembroke. VIII. Lucius Junius Brutus, father of his Country; a Tragedy, acted at the Duke's Theatre 1681. Dedicated to the Earl of Dorſet. IX. Conſtantine the Great; a Tragedy, acted at the Theatre Royal 1684. X. The Princeſs of Cleve, a Tragic-Comedy, acted at the Queen's Theatre in Dorſet-Garden 1689. Dedicated to the Earl of Dorſet. XI. The Maſſacre of Paris; a Tragedy acted at the Theatre Royal 1690. Our Author joined with Mr. Dryden in writing the Tragedy of the Duke of Guiſe, and that of Oedipus. H.

☞LEIBNITZ (GODEFROY-WILLIAM DE), an eminent Mathematician and Philoſopher in the ſeventeenth Century, was born at Leipſic in Saxony June the 23d 1646, and ſon of Frederic Leibnitz Profeſſor of Ethics, and Secretary of the Univerſity of Leipſic, by Catherine Sehmuck, third daughter of a Doctor and Profeſſor of Law. He loſt his father (a) at ſix years of age; but his mother took a particular care of his education. He ſoon made a prodigious progreſs in polite Literature [A]; and at the age of fifteen years he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Philoſophy and Mathematics at Leipſic and Jena; and upon his return to Leipſic in 1663 maintained a theſis de Principiis Individuationis. The year following he was admitted Maſter of Arts. About this time he read with great attention the Greek Philoſophers, and endeavoured to reconcile Plato with Ariſtotle, as he afterwards did Ariſtotle with Des Cartes. He was ſo intent on theſe ſtudies, that he ſpent whole days in meditation in a foreſt near Leipſic. But the ſtudy of the Law was his principal view; in which Faculty he was admitted Bachelor in 1665. The year following he would have taken the degree of Doctor, but was refuſed it on pretence that he was too young, being but twenty years of age, but it is thought that he had raiſed himſelf ſeveral enemies by rejecting the principles of Ariſtotle and the Schoolmen. Upon this he went to Altorf, where he maintained a theſis de Caſibus Perplexis,

(a) He died Sept. 5, 1652.

[A] He ſoon made a prodigious progreſs in polite Literature.] He did not ſhew any particular inclination to one kind of ſtudy more than another, but applied himſelf to all with equal vigour. And as his father had left him a conſiderable and well choſen library, he began, when he was maſter enough of the Latin and Greek languages, to read them all in order, as the Poets, Orators, Hiſtorians, Civilians, Philoſophers, Mathematicians, and Divines. He had a particular taſte and talent for Poetry. He knew all the Poets by heart, and even in his old age he could have repeated Virgil almoſt word for word. He compoſed in one day a Poem of three hundred Latin Verſes without any Eliſion (1).

Perplexis [B], with ſuch applauſe, that he had the degree of Doctor conferred on him, and was offered a Profeſſorſhip extraordinary in Law, which he refuſed. Thence he went to Nuremberg, in order to viſit the learned men there, and was introduced into the acquaintance of ſeveral perſons engaged in the purſuit of the Philoſopher's ſtone [C]. The Baron de Boinebourg, firſt Miniſter of the Elector of Mentz, paſſing at that time thro' Nuremberg, and meeting Mr. Leibnitz at an entertainment, conceived ſo high an opinion of his abilities, that he adviſed him to apply himſelf particularly to the ſtudy of Law and Hiſtory, and promiſed to engage the Elector John Philip de Schonborn to ſend for him to his Court. Upon this Mr. Leibnitz removed to Francfort upon the Mein in the neighbourhood of Mentz. In 1668 he wrote a treatiſe, to induce the Poles to chooſe the Elector Palatine their King [D]; which ſo highly pleaſed that Elector, that he invited the author to his Court. But he was prevented from accepting this invitation by the Baron Boinebourg, who procured the Elector of Mentz to appoint him Counſellor of the Chamber of Review in his Chancery. Mr. Leibnitz was then but twenty two years of age. In 1672 he went to Paris to manage ſome affairs of the Baron; and in that city contracted a friendſhip with the learned men there, and applied himſelf with vigour to the ſtudy of the Mathematics. Having obſerved ſome defects in the Arithmetical Machine of Monſieur Paſcal, he invented a new one, the deſign of which he explained to Monſieur Colbert; and it was approved of by him and the Academy of Sciences, which offered him the place of Penſionary-Member. He might have ſettled to great advantage at Paris; but as it would have been neceſſary to embrace the Roman Catholic Religion, Mr. Leibnitz, who was born a Lutheran, refuſed all offers. In 1673, upon the death of the Baron de Boinebourg, he went to England, where he became acquainted with Mr. Oldenburg Secretary of the Royal Society, and Mr. John Collins Fellow of that Society [E]. Soon after this he received an account of the death of the Elector of Mentz, by which he loſt his penſion. Upon this he returned to France, whence he wrote a letter to the Duke of Brunſwick-Lunenburg, to inform him of his circumſtances. That Prince returned him a very kind anſwer, and as a pledge of his future favour appointed him Counſellor of his Court with a ſtipend, and gave him leave to continue at Paris till his Arithmetical Machine ſhould be compleated. In 1676 he returned to England, and thence went to Holland, in order to proceed to Hanover, where he propoſed to ſettle. Upon his arrival there, he applied himſelf to inrich the Prince's Library with the beſt books of all kinds. The Duke of Brunſwick-Lunenburg dying in 1679, his ſucceſſor Erneſt Auguſtus, then Biſhop of Oſnabrug, ſhewed our author the ſame favour as his predeceſſor had done, and ordered him to write the Hiſtory of the Houſe of Brunſwick. Mr. Leibnitz undertook it, and travelled over Germany and Italy, in order to collect materials; and returned to Hanover in 1690. In 1700 he was admitted a Member of the Royal Academy at Paris. The Elector of Brandenburg, afterwards King of Pruſſia, founded an Academy the ſame year at Berlin by the advice of Mr. Leibnitz, who was appointed perpetual Preſident, though his affairs would not permit him to reſide conſtantly at Berlin. However he furniſhed their Memoirs with ſeveral curious pieces in Geometry, polite Literature, Natural Philoſophy, and even Phyſic. He projected another Academy of the ſame kind at Dreſden, and communicated the plan to the King of Poland in 1703. This deſign would have been executed, if it had not been prevented by the confuſions in Poland. He was engaged likewiſe in a ſcheme for an univerſal language [F]. His writings had long

[C] Introduced into the acquaintance of ſeveral perſons engaged in the purſuit of the Philoſopher's Stone.] Being deſirous to be initiated in their myſteries, he ſelected out of books of Chemiſtry ſeveral dark terms and expreſſions, from which he formed a Letter, which was unintelligible to himſelf, and addreſſed to the Director of that ſociety; requeſting to be admitted into it upon the proofs which he gave of his great learning. They not doubting, but that the writer of that letter was an Adept or very near one, admitted him with great honour into their Laboratory, and deſired him to perform the office of Secretary, offering him a penſion (2).

[D] In 1668 he wrote a Treatiſe to induce the Poles to chooſe the Elector Palatine their King.] This Treatiſe was publiſhed at Francfort upon the Mein under the following title: Specimen Demonſtrationum politicarum pro eligendo Rege Polonorum, novo ſcribendi genere ad claram Certitudinem exactum. Auctore Georgio Ulicovio, Lituano.

[E] Applied himſelf with vigour to the ſtudy of the Mathematicks.] He owns, that he principally owed the progreſs which he made in that ſtudy, to the writings of Paſcal, and Gregory St. Vincent, and eſpecially to the excellent book of Huygens de Horologio oſcillatorio.

[F] In 1673 . . . . he went to England, where he became acquainted with Mr. Oldenburg, Secretary of the Royal Society, and Mr. John Collins, Fellow of that Society.] It was by the communication and correſpondence of theſe Gentlemen, that he received the firſt hints of the invention of the method of Fluxions from Mr. Iſaac Newton's letters, who had diſcovered that method about the year 1664 or 1665. As there aroſe afterwards a diſpute concerning the right to that invention, we ſhall give the reader the following account of it (3). The method of Fluxions and the Calculus Differentialis are the ſame method of Analyſis under two different names. Sir Iſaac Newton, and the Engliſh Mathematicians after him, call it the Method of Fluxions; but Leibnitz gave it the name of Calculus differentialis, in which he has been followed by almoſt all the Mathematicians abroad. The Marquis de l'Hoſpital publiſhed the elements of it under the title of Analyſe, des infiniment petits, i. e. the Analyſis of infinitely ſmall quantities. Sir Iſaac Newton's Philoſophiæ Naturalis principia mathematica, printed at London 1687, in 4*to.* is almoſt wholly founded upon the method of Fluxions; though he has not made uſe of that method to demonſtrate the great and ſurprizing prizing Theorems, which he has exhibited in that work. However we find there the principles of Fluxions in the ſecond Lemma of the ſecond book, where thoſe principles are demonſtrated, but always in a ſynthetical manner. He adds to that Lemma the following Scholium: In literis, quæ mihi cum Geometrâ peritiſſimo G. G. Leibnitio annis abhinc decem intercedebant, cum ſignificarem me compotem eſſe methodi determinandi maximas & minimas, ducendi Tangentes, & ſimilia peragendi; quæ in terminis ſurdis æquè ac in rationalibus procederet, & literis tranſpoſitis hanc ſententiam involventibus [Datâ æquatione quotcunque fluentes quantitates involvente, Fluxiones invenire, & vice verſa] eandem celarem: reſcripſit Vir clariſſimus ſe quoq; in ejuſmodi methodum incidiſſe, & methodum ſuam communicavit à meâ vix abludentem præterquam in verborum & notarum formulis. Utriuſque fundamentum continetur in hoc Lemmate. By this paſſage Sir Iſaac Newton gives us to underſtand, that in the Letters, which he wrote to Leibnitz ten years before, that is, June 13th and October 24th 1676 (†), he had informed him of his method, before Leibnitz had mentioned his own; which he did not do till eight months after, viz. June 21ſt 1677 (‡). Beſides, as it appears from Sir Iſaac Newton's letter of October 24th 1676, that he had been engaged five years before (§), that is, in 1671, in writing a Treatiſe, in which the method of Fluxions and that of Series were joined together; by referring to this letter, he gives us to underſtand, that the method of Fluxions was known to him at leaſt in 1671, ſix years before Leibnitz had diſcovered his method (*). Thus he aſſerted his right to the firſt invention of this method, and appealed in a manner to the judgment of Leibnitz himſelf, to whom theſe particulars were very well known, and who had nothing to object upon this occaſion in the letter, which he wrote to Sir Iſaac Newton in 1693, wherein he complimented him upon his Principia. He ſays in it, that it appeared from this work, that Sir Iſaac had a method of Analyſis much ſuperior to the common Analyſis; and only adds, that himſelf had alſo an Analyſis, which was applied to the higher Geometry with great ſucceſs. Mirificè ampliaveras Geometriam tuis ſeriebus, ſed edito Principiorum opere oſtendiſti patere tibi, quæ Analyſi receptæ non ſubſunt. Conatus ſum ego quoque, Notis commodis adhibitis, quæ Differentias & ſummas exhibent, Geometriam illam, quam tranſcendentem appello, Analyſi quodammodo ſubjicere, nec res male proceſſit. He claims to himſelf the invention of the Calculus Differentialis, but without any prejudice to the right, which Sir Iſaac Newton had to the method of Fluxions. Leibnitz had publiſhed in the Acta Eruditorum of Leipſick for the year 1684 (*), the elements of the Calculus Differentialis, that is, the Algorithme of that Calculus, which contained the application of it to Addition and Subtraction, to Multiplication and Diviſion, to powers and roots under this title: Nova methodus pro Maximis & Minimis, itemque Tangentibus, quæ nec fractas nec irrationales quantitates moratur, & ſingulare pro illis Calculi genus, per G. G. L. The Brothers Bernoulli, famous Mathematicians, having afterwards obſerved the uſe, which Leibnitz made of this method, for the reſolving of the moſt difficult Problems, applied themſelves to the diſcovery of the ſecret, and by the Encouragement of Leibnitz himſelf arrived at it (†); ſo that this new Calculus was already famous in 1695. At this time Dr. John Wallis, who had publiſhed in the ſecond tome of his Mathematical works, extracts of the letters of Sir Iſaac Newton of June 13th and October 24th 1676, wrote to him, that he had been informed from Holland, that his method of Fluxions was received there with applauſe under the name of Leibnitz's Calculus Differentialis; and urged him to publiſh thoſe two letters intire. He repreſents to him, that it would be neglecting too much his own reputation and that of the Engliſh nation, to bury in his ſtudy pieces of ſuch importance, and to wait till others ſeized an honour, which was his right. He adds, that when he had received the account abovementioned, he had endeavoured to do him juſtice in an addition to the preface to the firſt Tome of his Mathematical works. The addition is as follows: In ſecundo Volumine . . . habetur Newtoni Methodus de Fluxionibus (ut ille loquitur) conſimilis naturæ cum Leibnitii (ut hic loquitur) Calculo differentiali (quod qui utramque methodum contulerit, ſatis animadvertat, ut ut ſub loquendi formulis diverſis) quam ego deſcripſi Algebræ cap. 91. &c. præſertim cap. 95. ex binis Newtoni literis (aut earum alteris) Junii 13, & Octob. 24. 1676. ad Oldenburgum datis, cum Leibnitio communicandis, iisdem ferè verbis, ſaltem leviter mutatis, quæ in illis Literis habentur, ubi Methodum hanc Leibnitio exponit, tùm ante decem annos, nedum plures, ab ipſo excogitatam. Quod moneo, ne quis cauſetur, de hoc Calculo differentiali nihil a nobis dictum eſſe. The writers of the Acta Eruditorum of Leipſic gave an extract of the two firſt Tomes of Dr. Wallis's Mathematical works in their journal of June 1696 (†), and inſinuated that he treated in a very free manner the foreign Mathematicians; but they did not object to what he had ſaid, that Sir Iſaac Newton "had explained to Leibnitz in 1676 the method of Fluxions, which he had "invented ten years before, or even earlier ſtill," that is, in 1665 or 1666. They only remarked, that Dr. Wallis ſhould have been more ample upon the Calculus differentialis, and have obſerved, that Leibnitz had that Calculus for above twenty years before, that is, in 1676 or 1677, when Sir Iſaac Newton and he held a correſpondence by means of Mr. Oldenburg; and that this was a fact acknowledged by Sir Iſaac himſelf. Cæterum ipſe Newtonus non minus candore quam præclaris in rem Mathematicam meritis inſignis, publice & privatim agnovit, Leibnitium tum cum (interveniente celeberrimo Viro Henrico Oldenburgio Bremenſi, Societatis Regiæ Anglicanæ tunc Secretario) inter ipſos, ejuſdem jam tum Societatis ſocios, commercium intercederet, id eſt, jam ferè ante annos viginti & amplius, Calculum ſuum differentialem ſeriesque infinitas, & pro iis quoque Methodos generales habuiſſe; quod Walliſius, in Præfatione operum factæ inter eos communicationis mentionem faciens, præteriit, quoniam de eo fortaſſe non ſatis ipſi conſtabat. They obſerve afterwards, that Dr. Wallis would undoubtedly have done more juſtice to the German Mathematicians, if he had known them better, &c. The Doctor had no ſooner ſeen this article in the Acta Eruditorum, but he wrote to Leibnitz (†), to aſſure him, that if he had not treated at large of his Calculus Differentialis, it was really becauſe he knew nothing of it before, and had not even heard of the name of it, when one of his friends wrote to him from Holland, that this Calculus made a great deal of noiſe there, and that it was very near the ſame with Newton's method of fluxions, which gave him occaſion juſt to mention it in his Preface. Leibnitz wrote to him a very civil anſwer (‡), and aſſures him, that he was extremely well ſatisfied with him. De te autem queri, ſays he, nunquam mihi in mentem venit, quem facile apparet noſtra in Actis Lipſienſibus prodita non ſatis vidiſſe. Dr. Wallis wrote him a letter of thanks (*), at the cloſe of which he ſays, that though the Method of Fluxions and that the Differential method appear to him to be the ſame, yet this ought not to leſſen the honour due to thoſe, who were the inventors. Et ni fallor, (ſic ſaltem mihi nuntiatum eſt) Newtoni doctrina fluxionum, res eadem (vel quam ſimillima) quæ vobis dicitur Calculus differentialis; quod tamen neutri præjudicio eſſe debet. Leibnitz did not deny this in his anſwer (*). Methodum Fluxionum profundiſſimi Newtoni, ſays he, cognatum eſſe Methodo meæ Differentiali, non tantum animadverti, poſtquam opus ejus & tuum prodiit, ſed etiam profeſſus ſum in Actis Eruditorum, & alias quoque monui. Id enim Candori meo convenire judicavi, non minus quam ipſius merito. Itaque communi nomine deſignare ſoleo, Analyſeos Infiniteſimalis, quæ latius quam Methodus Tetragoniſtica patet. Interim quemadmodum & Vietæa & Carteſiana Methodus Analyſeos ſpecioſæ nomine venit, diſcrimina tamen nonnulla ſuperſunt; ita fortaſſe & Newtoniana & mea differunt in nonnullis. He afterwards mentions the reflexions, which had led him by degrees to the invention of his method; but does not take notice in what reſpect it differed from that of Sir Iſaac Newton. This was what Dr. Wallis was extremely deſirous of knowing, as appears from a letter, which he wrote ſoon after to Leibnitz (†). Optaverim, ſays he, ut tibi vacet tuum Calculum Differentialem, & Newtono ſuam Fluxionum Methodum, juſto ordine exponere, ut quid ſit utrique commune, & quid interſit diſcriminis, & utrumque diſtinctius intelligamus. Leibnitz wrote an anſwer to Dr. Wallis; and there paſſed ſeveral letters between thoſe Gentlemen, but without touching upon that point. Dr. Wallis publiſhed all theſe letters in 1699 in the third volume of his Mathematical works; and inſerted among them, with the conſent of Sir Iſaac Newton and Leibnitz, the letters which they had written to each other by means of Mr. Oldenburg, and among the reſt thoſe above cited. Though Dr. Wallis had given the world to underſtand, that Sir Iſaac Newton had invented his method in 1665 or 1666, he would not determine the time when Leibnitz invented his, nor inquire which of them two was the firſt inventor. But Mr. Nicholas Facio Duillier proceeded further; for in his Lineæ breviſſimi deſcenſus Inveſtigatio Geometrica duplex: cui addita eſt Inveſtigatio Geometrica ſolidi rotundi, in quo minima fiat reſiſtentia, printed at London in 1699, he declares Sir Iſaac Newton to have been the firſt inventor, and inſinuates that Leibnitz whom he calls the ſecond inventor, had made uſe of the lights of Sir Iſaac Newton. Newtonum primum, ſays he (*), ac pluribus annis vetuſtiſſimum hujus calculi Inventorem, ipſâ veri evidentiâ coactus, agnoſco; à quo utrum quicquam mutuatus ſit Leibnitius ſecundus ejus Inventor, malo eorum quam meum ſit judicium, quibus viſæ fuerint Newtoni Literæ aliique ejuſdem manuſcripti codices. Leibnitz thought, that he ought not to leave unanſwered this aſſertion, which detracted ſo much from his reputation. He wrote againſt Mr. Facio a memoire inſerted in the Acta Eruditorum for the year 1700; in which he affirms, that he had not taken his Calculus from Sir Iſaac Newton, and appeals even to the teſtimony of Sir Iſaac himſelf. Certè, ſays he (†), vir egregius aliquoties locutus amicis meis ſemper de me bene ſentire viſus eſt, neque unquam, quod ſciam, querelas jecit; publicè autem ita mecum egit, ut iniquus ſim, ſi querar. Ego vero libenter ejus ingentia merita oblatis Occaſionibus prædicavi, & ipſe ſcit unus omnium optimè ſatiſque indicavit publicè, cum ſua Mathematicæ Naturæ principia publicaret anno 1687, nova quædam inventa Geometrica, quæ ipſi communia mecum fuere, neutrum luci ab altero acceptæ, ſed meditationibus quemque ſuis debere, & a me jam decennio ante expoſita fuiſſe. Certè, adds he, cum Elementa Calculi mea edidi anno 1684, ne conſtabat quidem mihi aliud de inventis ejus in hoc genere, quam quod ipſe olim ſignificaverat literis, poſſe ſe Tangentes invenire non ſublatis irrationalibus; quod Hugenius quoque ſe poſſe mihi ſignificavit poſtea, etſi cæterorum iſtius calculi adhuc expers. Sed majora multo conſecutum Newtonum, viſo demum libro Principiorum ejus, ſatis intellexi. Calculum tamen differentialem tam ſimilem ab eo exerceri, non ante didicimus, quam cum non ita pridem magni Geometræ Johannis Walliſii operum volumina primum & ſecundum prodiere, Hugeniuſque curioſitati meæ favens locum inde deſcriptum ad Newtonum pertinentem mihi maturè tranſmiſit. Leibnitz would not determine the queſtion, whether Sir Iſaac Newton or himſelf was the firſt or ſecond Inventor of this method: he only aſſerts equally the invention to both. Quam, ſays he afterwards (§), ante Dominum Newtonum & me nullus, quod ſciam, Geometra habuit; uti ante hunc maximi nominis Geometram nemo ſpecimine publicè dato ſe habere probavit; ante Dominos Bernoullios & me nullus communicavit. Mr. Facio did not ſtop here; he ſent to the authors of the Acta Eruditorum his reply, with a defence of his treatiſe of the Lineæ breviſſimi deſcenſus Inveſtigatio againſt Mr. John Bernoulli; but thoſe authors ſuppreſſed what related to Leibnitz, and only remarked in general, that the averſion they had for diſputes among Men of Letters, had induced them to retrench what was perſonal in Mr. Facio's memoire (‡). This put an end to the conteſt; and it is probable, that there would not have been any more diſpute upon this point, if a paſſage of the authors of the Acta Eruditorum had not given occaſion to that, which roſe at firſt between Mr. John Keill and Leibnitz, and afterwards between Leibnitz and Sir Iſaac Newton himſelf. It was as follows. In 1704 Sir Iſaac Newton publiſhed at the end of his Optics a treatiſe of the Quadrature of Curves, which he had written ſeveral years before. As this treatiſe is founded upon the method of Fluxions, Sir Iſaac accompanied it with an introduction, in which he explains that method, and adds, that he had invented it in 1665 and 1666. Conſiderando igitur, ſays he, quod quantitates æqualibus temporibus creſcentes & creſcendo genitæ, pro velocitate majori vel minori, qua creſcunt ac generantur, evadunt majores vel minores; methodum quærebam determinandi quantitates ex velocitatibus motuum vel incrementorum quibus generantur; & has motuum vel incrementorum velocitates nominando Fluxiones & quantitates genitas nominando Fluentes, incidi paulatim annis 1665 & 1666 in Methodum Fluxionum, quâ hic uſus ſum in Quadraturâ Curvarum. The authors of the Acta Eruditorum of Leipſic gave an account of this book of Sir Iſaac Newton in their Journal of January 1705 (3); and having taken occaſion to explain the differential method of Mr. Leibnitz, they compared it with Sir Iſaac's method of Fluxions: Ingenioſiſſimus deinde Autor, ſay they, antequam ad Quadraturas Curvarum (vel potius Figurarum Curvilinearum) veniat, præmittit brevem Iſagogam. Quæ ut melius intelligatur, ſciendum eſt, cum magnitudo aliqua continuè creſcit, veluti Linea (exempli gratia) creſcit fluxu puncti, quod eam deſcribit, incrementa illa momentanea appellari differentias, nempe, inter magnitudinem, quæ antea erat, & quæ per mutationem momentaneam eſt producta, atque hinc natum eſſe Calculum differentialem, eique reciprocum Summatorium; cujus Elementa ab Inventore Dn. Godefrido Gulielmo Leibnitio in his Actis ſunt tradita, variique uſus tum ab ipſo, tum à Dnn. Fratribus Bernoulliis, tum & Dn. Marchione Hoſpitalio (cujus nuper extincti immaturam mortem omnes magnoperè dolere debent qui profundioris Doctrinæ profectum amant) ſunt oſtenſi. Pro differentiis igitur Leibnizianis D. Newtonus adhibet ſemperque adhibuit, Fluxiones, quæ ſint quam proxime ut fluentium augmenta æqualibus temporis particulis quam minimis genita; iiſque tum in ſuis Principiis Naturæ Mathematicis, tum in aliis poſtea editis eleganter eſt uſus; quemadmodum & Honoratus Faber in ſuâ Synopſi Geometrica motuum progreſſus Cavallerianæ Methodo ſubſtituit. It was this compariſon that occaſioned the diſpute. For as it is undoubted that Father Fabri is not the inventor of his method, but that he took it from Cavallieri, only changing the expreſſions; it was thought that the authors of the Acta Eruditorum deſigned to intimate, that Sir Iſaac Newton was not the inventor of the method of Fluxions, but that he took it from Mr. Leibnitz. Mr. John Keill, being perſuaded that the authors of the Acta Eruditorum had this deſign, undertook Sir Iſaac Newton's defence; and in a piece, which he wrote de Legibus Virium Centripetarum, addreſſed to Dr. Edmund Halley, and publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions for September and October 1708 (4), aſſerted, not only that Sir Iſaac had firſt invented the method of Fluxions, as appeared by his letters publiſhed by Dr. Wallis; but that Mr. Leibnitz had taken this method from him, only changing the name and notation. Hæc omniaque ſequuntur, ſays he, ex celebratiſſimâ nunc dierum Fluxionum Arithmeticâ, quam ſine dubio primus invenit Dominus Newtonus; ut cuilibet ejus Epiſtolas à Walliſio editas legenti facilè conſtabit. Eadem tamen Arithmetica poſtea mutatis nomine & notationis modo, à Domino Leibnitio in Actis Eruditorum edita eſt. Leibnitz wrote a letter to Dr. Hans Sloane, then Secretary of the Royal Society, dated March the 4th 1711, in which he required in effect, that Mr. Keill ſhould make him ſatisfaction for the injury, which, he ſaid, had been done to him. He proteſted, that "he was "ſo far from aſſuming to himſelf the method of Sir "Iſaac Newton, after having only changed the name "and notation, that he was abſolutely ignorant of the "name of the Method of Fluxions, and the notation "uſed by Sir Iſaac, till they appeared in the mathe-"matical works of Dr. Wallis." He deſired therefore the Royal Society to oblige Mr. Keill to diſown publicly the bad ſenſe, which his words might bear. This letter was communicated to the Royal Society; and Mr. Keill, to juſtify himſelf to Sir Iſaac Newton, ſhewed him the extract of his book of the Quadratures of Curves in the Acta Eruditorum. He deſired the Society at the ſame time not to condemn him without hearing him, and to give him leave to explain and defend what he had advanced. This was the more readily granted him, as Sir Iſaac and ſeveral other members of the Society found the ſame ſenſe as he had done in the compariſon of the Acta Eruditorum. Upon this Mr. Keill wrote to Dr. Sloane a letter, in which he obſerved, "that when he had aſſerted, that "Mr. Leibnitz had publiſhed as his own Sir Iſaac "Newton's method, after having changed the name "and notation, he did not mean, that the name, "which Sir Iſaac had given to his method, or the "notation, which he made uſe of, were then "known to Mr. Leibnitz; but only that Sir Iſaac was "the firſt inventor of the method of Fluxions or diffe-"rential

" rential method; and that the letters, which he had " written to Mr. Oldenburg, and which had been " ſent to Mr. Leibnitz, furniſhed light enough to a " man of Mr. Leibnitz's penetration, to diſcover the " principles of that method. But that not having " found the name, which Sir Iſaac Newton gave his " method, and the notation uſed by him, it was na- " tural for him to invent a new name and a new man- " ner of notation." Mr. Keill added, " that the au- " thors of the Acta Eruditorum had obliged him to " publiſh what he had aſſerted, by their having affirm- " ed in the extract of the book of Quadratures, that " Mr. Leibnitz had invented the differential method, " in the room of which Sir Iſaac Newton had ſubſti- " tuted his Fluxions. That he acknowledged with " pleaſure the great obligations, which the learned " world had to Mr. Leibnitz, and his profound ſkill " in the mathematics; but that as he had ſo great a " fund of his own, there was no occaſion to adorn him " with the ſpoils of others. And that having obſerved, " that Mr. Leibnitz's countrymen gave him commen- " dations, which did not belong to him, he thought " that it would not be an inſtance of miſtaken zeal for " the Engliſh nation, if he endeavoured to maintain " Sir Iſaac Newton's right." He then entered upon the ſubject, and undertook to ſhew from divers writ- ings of Sir Iſaac, " that he was the firſt and true inven- " tor of the method of Fluxions or the differential " method; and that the two letters of Sir Iſaac, which " Mr. Leibnitz received from Mr. Oldenburg, con- " tained hints of that method clear enough to enable " him to diſcover it." He concluded with ſaying, " that among the great ſervices, which Mr. Leibnitz " had done with regard to mathematics, his having " firſt publiſhed this method was one; and that all " lovers of that ſcience were obliged to him, becauſe " he had been unwilling, that ſo uſeful an invention " ſhould be longer concealed. And he did not doubt, " but that what he had written would juſtify his zeal " for his country, and furniſh a convincing proof, " that he had not aſſerted raſhly or out of a ſpirit of " calumny in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, what he " now had demonſtrated with ſo much clearneſs and " evidence." This letter having been read to the Royal Society May the 24th 1711, they ordered a copy of it to be ſent to Mr. Leibnitz, who found new matter of complaint in it; and in a ſecond letter, which he wrote to Dr. Sloane, dated at Hanover December the 29th 1711, he repreſented, that Mr. Keill had attacked his candour and ſincerity more openly than before; adding, that it was not ſuitable to a man of his age and experience to engage in a conteſt with an upſtart, who was unacquainted with what had paſſed ſo long before, and acted without any authority from Sir Iſaac Newton, who was the party concerned. That it was in vain for Mr. Keill to pretend to juſtify his proceeding by the example of the Acta Eruditorum, ſince in that Journal no injuſtice had been done to any man, but every one had received what was his due. That " himſelf and his friends had ſeveral times " ſhewn, that they conſidered Sir Iſaac Newton as the " inventor of Fluxions; but that himſelf had no leſs " right to the invention of the differential method, as " Mr. Huygens, a moſt able and impartial judge, " had publicly declared. That however he had not " haſtened to aſſert it as his own; and that after the diſ- " covery, it was a long time before he publiſhed it, in or- " der that no perſon might complain, that he had an- " ticipated them." He concluded with deſiring, that the Royal Society would enjoin Mr. Keill ſilence, not doubting but that what he had written was diſap- proved by Sir Iſaac Newton himſelf, who was well acquainted with what had paſſed formerly, and to whoſe judgment he was ready to ſubmit. Mr. Keill ſeeing himſelf treated as an upſtart, who was not in- formed of what had paſſed formerly, appealed to the regiſters of the Royal Society, and affirmed, that they would find there convincing proofs of what he had ad- vanced. Sir Iſaac Newton likewiſe being diſpleaſed at the compariſon in the Acta Eruditorum, and that Mr. Leibnitz ſhould have ſaid, that in that Journal every one had received what was due to him, left the Society to act as they ſhould think proper; who granted therefore to Mr. Keill what he deſired. They appointed a certain number of their members, as well Foreigners as Engliſh, to examine the regiſters, and eſ- pecially the papers of Mr. John Collins, who had a correſpondence with the moſt eminent mathematicians of his time, both in England and abroad. As ſoon as one of his correſpondents had imparted to him any diſco- very, he communicated it to others. In ſhort he was the Merſennus of England. The Society ordered the Committee to lay before them all the papers relating to the point in diſpute, and ſubjoin to them their own judgment; which was at laſt given in theſe words: " We have conſulted the letters and letter-books in " the cuſtody of the Royal Society, and thoſe found " among the papers of Mr. John Collins, dated be- " tween the years 1669 and 1677 inclusive; and " ſhewed them to ſuch, as knew and avouched the " hands of Mr. Barrow, Mr. Collins, Mr. Olden- " burg, and Mr. Leibnitz; and compared thoſe of " Mr. Gregory with one another, and with co- " pies of ſome of them taken in the hand of Mr. Col- " lins; and have extracted from them what relates to " the matter referred to us; all which extracts here- " with delivered to you, we believe to be genuine and " authentic; and by theſe letters and papers we find,

" I. That Mr. Leibnitz was in London in the be- " ginning of the year 1673, and went thence in or " about March to Paris, where he kept a correſpond- " ence with Mr. Collins by means of Mr. Oldenburg, " till about September 1676, and then returned by " London and Amſterdam to Hanover. And that Mr. " Collins was very free in communicating to able Ma- " thematicians what he received from Mr. Newton " and Mr. Gregory.

" II. That when Mr. Leibnitz was the firſt time in " London, he contended for the invention of another " Differential Method properly ſo called; and notwith- " ſtanding that he was ſhewn by Dr. Pell, that it was " Mouton's (*) method, perſiſted in maintaining it to " be his own invention, by reaſon that he had found " it by himſelf, without knowing what Mouton had " done before, and had much improved it. And we " find no mention of his having any other Differential " Method than Mouton's, before his letter of the 21ſt of " June 1677, which was a year after a copy of Mr. " Newton's letter of the 10th of December 1672 had " been ſent to Paris to be communicated to him, and " above four years after Mr. Collins began to commu- " nicate that letter to his correſpondents, in which let- " ter the method of Fluxions was ſufficiently deſcribed " to any intelligent perſon.

(*) See the book intitled, Obſervationes Diametrorum Solis & Lunæ apparentium, &c. Auctore Gabriele Mouton, Lugdunenſi, Sacerdote in Eccleſiâ Collegiatâ S. Pauli. Lyons 1670 in 4to.

" III. That by Mr. Newton's letter of the 13th of " June 1676 it appears, that he had the method of " Fluxions above five years before the writing of that " letter. And by his Analyſis per Æquationes numero " Terminorum infinitas, communicated by Dr. Barrow " to Mr. Collins in July 1669, we find that he had " invented the method before that time.

" IV. That the Differential Method is one and " the ſame with the Method of Fluxions, excepting the " name and mode of notation; Mr. Leibnitz calling " thoſe quantities Differences, which Mr. Newton calls " Moments or Fluxions; and marking them with the " letter d, a mark not uſed by Mr. Newton. And " therefore we take the proper queſtion to be, not who " invented this or that method, but who was the firſt " inventor of the Method. And we believe, that thoſe, " who have reputed Mr. Leibnitz the firſt inventor, " knew little or nothing of his correſpondence with " Mr. Collins and Mr. Oldenburg long before; nor " of Mr. Newton's having that method above fifteen " years before Mr. Leibnitz began to publiſh it in " the Acta Eruditorum of Leipſick.

" For which reaſons we reckon Mr. Newton the " firſt inventor; and are of opinion that Mr. Keil, " in aſſerting the ſame, has been no ways injurious to " Mr. Leibnitz. And we ſubmit to the judgment of " the Society, whether the extract and papers now " preſented to you, together with what is extant to " the ſame purpoſe in Dr. Wallis's third volume, may " not deſerve to be made public."

Theſe Papers were preſented to the royal ſociety April 24th 1712, which ordered them to be print- ed, with the report of the committee, and every thing that could be found in the Acta Eruditorum, which might ſerve to give light into the hiſtory of this diſ- pute. This collection appeared at the end of Decem- ber under the title of Commercium Epiſtolicum D. Johannis Collins & aliorum de Analyſi promotâ: juſſu Societatis Regiæ in lucem editum. in 4to pagg. 112. It was never ſold at bookſellers ſhops, and only a certain number number of copies was printed off, in order for preſents. An extract of it was given in the Philoſophical tranſactions, which was afterwards tranſlated into French, and printed at London under this title; Extrait du Livre intitulé, Commercium Epiſtolicum Collinii & aliorum de Analyſi promota; publié par ordre de la Societé Royale, a l'occaſion de la Diſpute elevée entre M. Leibnitz & D. Keill, ſur le Droit d'Invention à la Methode des Fluxions, par quelques-uns appellée, Methode Differentielle. In 8vo, pagg. 38. This extract is inſerted in the VII Tome of the Journal Literaire. Mr. Leibnitz was at Vienna, when he heard of the publication of the Commercium Epiſtolicum. " I was " at Vienna, ſays he (5), when I was informed of the " publication of the book; but being aſſured, that it " muſt contain malicious falſities, I did not think proper " to ſend for it by the poſt, but wrote to Mr. Bernoulli, a Gentleman, who perhaps in all Europe has " ſucceeded beſt in the knowledge and uſe of this " Calculus, and who was abſolutely neuter, to give me " his ſentiments. Mr. Bernoulli wrote me a letter " dated at Baſil June 7th, 1713, in which he ſaid, " that it appeared probable, that Sir Iſaac Newton " had formed his Calculus after having ſeen mine, " ſince he had frequent occaſion in his works, to " make uſe of this Calculus, though there appears " no trace of it; and that he had even committed " ſome errors, which ſeemed incompatible with a " true knowledge of that Calculus. One of my friends " publiſhed this letter with reflections; and as I had " enough of other affairs to employ me, I was unwilling to enter farther into this, eſpecially as Sr. " Iſaac Newton had not ſaid any thing himſelf. I " thought it ſufficient therefore to have oppoſed to the " clamours of his adherents the judgment of a perſon of Mr. Bernoulli's learning and impartiality". Theſe two Latin pieces were publiſhed in Germany in a looſe ſheet, dated July 29th 1713. And it is remarkable, that the writer of the letter, which Mr. Leibnitz aſcribes above to Mr. Bernoulli, ſpeaks here of Mr. Bernoulli in the third perſon, and cites him with a compliment: quemadmodum, ſays he, ab eminente quodam Mathematico dudum notatum eſt; which might make it ſuſpected, that it was not written by Mr. Bernoulli. Mr. Leibnitz ſuppreſſed the citation, when he publiſhed this letter in French under Mr. Bernoulli's name in the Nouvelles Literaires of December 28 1715. A friend of Mr. Leibnitz ſent from Germany theſe two pieces to the authors of the Journal Literaire, with Remarks of his writing upon the diſpute between Mr. Leibnitz and Sir Iſaac Newton. A letter written from London, and inſerted in the firſt Tome of that Journal, gave occaſion to thoſe remarks; the author of which Remarks objects to the letter, as not giving an exact account of the diſpute between Mr. Leibnitz and Sir Iſaac Newton, and undertakes to give a true relation of what had paſſed. He aſſerts, that when Sir Iſaac Newton publiſhed his Philoſophiæ naturalis Principia Mathematica in 1687, he did not underſtand the true Differential Method (6); and pretends, that he took it from Mr. Leibnitz. Dr. John Keill oppoſed to all theſe pieces an anſwer printed at London in French, intitled, Réponſe de M. Keill, M. D. Profeſſeur d' Aſtronomie Savilien, aux Auteurs des Remarques ſur le Different entre M. de Leibnitz and M. Newton, publiées dans le Journal Literaire de la Haye de Novembre & Decembre M. DCC. XIII. There was but a few copies of this printed; but it was afterwards inſerted in the IV Tome of the Journal Literaire. Mr. Chamberlayne made an attempt about this time to reconcile Mr. Leibnitz and Sir Iſaac Newton; for which purpoſe he intimated his deſign to the former, who was then at Vienna. Mr. Leibnitz thanked him for his obliging offer in a letter dated April 28th 1714 (7), in which he declares, that he had not given occaſion to this diſpute, and complains, that the Royal Society and Sir Iſaac Newton himſelf had taken Dr. Keill's part againſt him; and without conſulting him, had made themſelves Judges, and condemned him by a pretended ſentence of the ſociety. Sir Iſaac Newton, ſays he, has procured a book to be publiſhed, which was written purpoſely to diſcredit me, and ſent it into Germany, France, and Italy, as in the name of the Society. He adds, that learned men among the French, Italians, and other nations extremely diſapproved of this manner of proceeding, and were amazed at it; and that he hoped, that in the Society itſelf every one would not approve of it. For my ſelf, continues he, I have always acted in the moſt civil manner towards Sir Iſaac Newton; and though it appears now, that there was great reaſon to doubt, whether he knew my invention before he had it of me, I had ſpoken, as if he had diſcovered of himſelf ſomething like my method, But being abuſed by ſome ill adviſed flatterers, he has ſuffered himſelf to be engaged in attacking me in a very ſenſible manner. Judge now, Sir, from which ſide the ſteps neceſſary to put an end to this conteſt ought firſt to be made. Mr. Chamberlayne communicated this letter to Sir Iſaac Newton, who anſwered in a few words (8), that he had no ſhare in what Mr. Facio had written againſt Mr. Leibnitz; that Mr. Leibnitz had attacked his reputation in 1705, by intimating in the extract of the treatiſe of Quadratures, that he had borrowed from Mr. Leibnitz the method of Fluxions; that Dr. Keill had only defended him; and that the paſſage of the Acta Eruditorum was not known to him, till the coming of Mr. Leibnitz's firſt letter againſt Dr. Keill, in which Mr. Leibnitz demanded, in effect, that he ſhould retract what he had publiſhed in the introduction to the treatiſe of Quadratures, viz. that he had invented the Method of Fluxions in 1665 and 1666: and laſtly, that if Mr. Chamberlayne could point out to him any thing, in which he had injured Mr. Leibnitz, he would endeavour to give him ſatisfaction, but that he would not retract things, which he knew to be true; and that he believed likewiſe, that the Committee of the Royal Society had done no injuſtice to Mr. Leibnitz in the affair of the Commercium Epiſtolicum. The Royal Society being informed, that Mr. Leibnitz complained of having been condemned without being heard, though they had not taken any party in this conteſt, and being willing to prevent the diſputes, which might ariſe upon it, declared on the 20th of May 1714, that they did not pretend, that the report of their committee ſhould paſs for a deciſion of the ſociety, and ordered this declaration to be inſerted in their journal. Mr. Chamberlayne ſent a copy of it to Mr. Leibnitz with Sir Iſaac Newton's letter, and Dr. Keill's anſwer to the pieces inſerted in the Journal Literaire. Mr. Leibnitz having ſeen the declaration of the Royal Society, aſſured Mr. Chamberlayne (9), that he was very well ſatisfied with the Society's conduct with regard to him, but thought, that Sir Iſaac Newton's was written in no very civil manner; and he ſeemed to make little account of Dr. Keill's piece. As to the Letter, ſays he, which you ſent me a copy of, and which is written with very little civility, I conſider it pro non ſcripta, as well as the piece printed in French. I am not of an humour to put myſelf in a paſſion againſt ſuch people. Since it ſeems, that there are ſtill other letters relating to me among thoſe of Mr. Oldenburg and Mr. Collins, which have not been publiſhed, I could wiſh, that the Royal Society would order them to be communicated to me. When I ſhall return to Hanover, I ſhall be able to publiſh alſo a Commercium Epiſtolicum, which may be of ſervice to the hiſtory of learning. I ſhall be ready to publiſh as well thoſe letters, which may be urged againſt me, as thoſe which favour me, and I ſhall leave the judgment of them to the publick. This letter having been read to the Royal Society, Sir Iſaac Newton obſerved, that, the laſt words, which we have tranſcribed, were injurious to the Committee, ſince they ſuppoſed, that they had not made a diſintereſted choice of the papers, which the Society had ordered them to collect. He added, that as he had no ſhare in the Commercium Epiſtolicum, but had left the Committee perfectly free to collect and print what they thought proper, he did not think it right for Mr. Leibnitz to publiſh himſelf a Commercium Epiſtolicum. Upon this he produced two letters, which had been written to him; one by Mr. Leibnitz in 1693, and the other by Dr. Wallis in 1695; and ſaid, that though theſe letters were very favourable to him, he had waved the communicating of them to the Committee, that he might not ſeem to become himſelf a witneſs in his own cauſe. Theſe two letters having been examined before the Society by Members of the Society, who knew the hands of the writers of the letters, they were read and depoſited among the archives of the Society (10). Sir Iſaac Newton remarked alſo the danger of ſending to Mr. Leibnitz the originals even of the letters of Mr. Oldenburg and Mr. Collins, which he ſeemed to deſire; but ſaid that atteſted copies might be ſent to him. He ſaid, that if Mr. Leibnitz had letters to produce in his favour, and would ſend the originals to ſome of his friends in England, land, to be ſhewn to the Royal Society, and examined by perſons who knew the hands, the originals ſhould be returned after authentic copies were taken, and that then theſe letters might be publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, or in Germany, as Mr. Leibnitz ſhould think proper. The affair ſtood in this ſituation when the Abbé Conti, a noble Venetian, came to England in 1715. He had written againſt the Signior Nigriſoli, who endeavoured to revive the Hypotheſis of Plaſtic Natures, and had imagined a certain Seminal Light, to which he aſcribed the generation of living beings. The Abbé conſulted Mr. Leibnitz concerning the opinions of his Antagoniſt, and Mr. Leibnitz wrote to him a Letter (*), in the Poſtſcript to which, he congratulates him upon his arrival in England. "I am glad, ſays he (†), that you "are in England; there are great advantages to "be made there, and it muſt be owned, that there "are Men of diſtinguiſhed abilities in that country; "but they are fond of paſſing for almoſt the only "inventors in the world, and this is manifeſtly what "they will not ſucceed in. It does not appear, that "Sir Iſaac Newton had before me the Infinitefimal "Characteriſtic and Algorithme, as Mr. Bernoulli has "very rightly judged; though it would have been "extremely eaſy to have attained to it, if he had "turned his thoughts that way, as it would have "been very eaſy for Apollonius to have attained to "the Analyſis of Des Cartes upon Curves, if he had "turned his Thoughts that way. Thoſe who have "written againſt me having made no ſcruple to at-"tack my Candor by forced and ill-grounded inter-"pretations, they ſhall not have the pleaſure of ſeeing "me anſwer the ſlight reaſons of people, who act "in ſo ill a manner, and beſides that deviate from "the point. The queſtion is concerning the differ-"ential method, and they turn it upon Series, in which "Sir Iſaac Newton preceded me without doubt; but "I diſcovered at laſt a general method for Series; and "after this I had no longer an occaſion to have re-"courſe to his Extractions. They would have done "better to have publiſhed letters entire, as Dr. Wallis "did with my conſent; and he had not the leaſt "diſpute with me, as theſe perſons would perſuade "the world. My adverſaries have publiſhed in the "Commercium Epiſtolicum of Mr. Collins only what "they thought capable of their falſe interpretations. "I became acquainted with Mr. Collins in my ſecond "voyage to England; for in my firſt (which was "but for a very ſhort time, becauſe I came with a "publick miniſter) I had not the leaſt knowledge of "the improvements of Geometry, and had neither "ſeen nor heard any thing of the correſpondence "between Mr. Collins and Mr. Gregory and Mr. New-"ton, as my letters exchanged with Mr. Oldenburg "at that time and for ſome time after will ſufficient-"ly prove. But in my ſecond voyage Mr. Collins "ſhewed me part of his correſpondence; and I ob-"ſerved, that Mr. Newton owned alſo his igno-"rance in ſeveral points, and ſaid among other "things, that he had not diſcovered any thing with "regard to the dimenſion of the celebrated Curve-"Lines, except the dimenſion of the Ciſſoide. But "all this has been ſuppreſſed. I am ſorry, that ſo "able a man as Sir Iſaac Newton has drawn upon "him the cenſure of intelligent perſons by having "too much regard to the ſuggeſtions of ſome flatter-"ers, who have been deſirous of raiſing a conteſt "between him and me." Mr. Leibnitz then attacks Sir Iſaac Newton upon his Philoſophy, eſpecially his opinions about Gravity, Vacuum, the Intervention of God for the conſervation of his creatures, &c. He accuſes him of reviving the Occult Qualities of the Schools, or of ſuppoſing Miracles perpetually, &c. This Poſtſcript was much talked of at Court, and ſome perſons of diſtinction greatly ſollicited Sir Iſaac Newton to write an anſwer. The Abbé Conti omitted nothing to engage him to it. But they could not prevail upon him to ſurmount his natural averſion to all kinds of diſputes or perſonal conteſts. At laſt King George I. having one day aſked, When Sir Iſaac Newton's anſwer to Mr. Leibnitz was to appear? Sir Iſaac could not excuſe himſelf any longer. He addreſſed his anſwer dated February 26th old ſtyle to the Abbé Conti, when ſent to Mr. Leibnitz, and wrote to him at the ſame time (11), that he had read with great attention and without the leaſt prejudice the Commercium Epiſtolicum, and the little piece, which contains the Extract; that he had alſo ſeen at the Royal Society the original papers of the Commercium Epiſtolicum, and ſome other original pieces relating to it. From all this, ſays he, I infer, that if all the digreſſions are cut off, the only point is, whether Sir Iſaac Newton had the method of Fluxions or Infinitefimals before you; or whether you had it before him. You publiſhed it firſt, it is true; but you have owned alſo, that Sir Iſaac Newton had given many hints of it in his letters to Mr. Oldenburg and others. This is proved very largely in the Commercium and the extract of it. What anſwer do you give? This is ſtill wanting to the publick, in order to form an exact judgment of the affair. He adds, that Mr. Leibnitz's own Friends waited for his anſwer with great impatience, and that they thought he could not diſpenſe with anſwering, if not Dr. Keill, at leaſt Sir Iſaac Newton himſelf, who had given him a defiance in expreſs terms, as he would ſee in Sir Iſaac's Letter. He informed him at the ſame time, that the King had deſired him to give him an Account of the whole affair. Mr. Leibnitz anſwered Sir Iſaac Newton in a letter, which he addreſſed to the Abbé Conti; but at the time when the Abbé waited to receive that letter, he received a ſhort letter (12), in which Mr. Leibnitz informed him, that he had ſent it to Mr. Remond at Paris, who would take care that he ſhould receive it. I have taken this way, ſays he, in order to have indifferent and intelligent witneſſes, of our diſputes; and Mr. Remond will communicate it to others. I have ſent him at the ſame time a copy of your letter and of that of Sir Iſaac Newton. After this you will be able to judge whether the unjuſt Chicane of ſome of your new friends perplexes me very much. Sir Iſaac Newton thought it wrong, that Mr. Leibnitz ſhould call in for witneſſes of that diſpute, perſons, who probably had not read the Commercium Epiſtolicum. He thought, that London, as well as Paris, might furniſh indifferent and intelligent witneſſes. He reſolved therefore to carry the diſpute no further; and when Mr. Leibnitz's anſwer came from France, he refuted it by Remarks, which he communicated only to ſome of his friends. Mr. Leibnitz died ſix months after, that is, November 14th 1716; and as ſoon as Sir Iſaac Newton heard of his death, he publiſhed at London the Poſtſcript and Letter of Mr. Leibnitz to the Abbé Conti, with his own Letter to the Abbé, and the Remarks. To the Remarks was prefixed the following Advertiſement, explaining the ſubject and occaſion: Cum D. Leibnitius adduci non poſſet, ut vel Commercio Epiſtolico reſponderet, vel probaret quæ pro lubitu affirmabat, cumque præcedentes Epiſtolas in Galliam prius mitteret, quam earum tertia in Angliam veniret, & prætenderet ſe hoc facere, ut teſtes haberet, & alias etiam adhiberet contumelias: Newtonus minimè reſcripſit, ſed obſervationes ſequentes in Epiſtolam illam tertiam ſcriptas cum amicis ſolummodo communicavit. To theſe Pieces was added Mr. Raphſon's Hiſtory of Fluxions, as a kind of ſupplement. They were publiſhed in the ſame languages, in which they were written, viz. thoſe of Mr. Leibnitz in French, and thoſe of Sir Iſaac Newton in Engliſh. The two laſt were tranſlated into French, and printed alſo at London. Mr. Des Maizeaux has reprinted them in the ſecond Tome of his Recueil, together with ſome other letters of Mr. Leibnitz upon the ſame ſubject. In 1720 Dr. John Keill publiſhed at London in 4to the following piece: *Joannis Keill M. D. & R. S. long before made him famous over all Europe [H]. Beſides the office of Privy Counſellor of Juſtice, which the Elector of Hanover had given him, the Emperor, at the deſire of Anthony Ulric Duke of Brunſwick, appointed him in 1711 Aulic Counſellor; and the Czar made him his Privy Counſellor of Juſtice with a penſion of a thouſand ducats, after a converſation with him at Torgaw at the time of the marriage of the Princeſs cenſione præmiſſâ inſignis Controverſiæ inter Leibnitium & Keillium de primo Inventore Methodi Fluxionum, & Judicio primarii, ut ferebatur, Mathematici ſubjuncto, iterum impreſſum. In the preface it is obſerved, that in the Elogium of Mr. Leibnitz publiſhed in the Acta Eruditorum for July 1717, his friends had declared, "that he had reſolved to publiſh, in anſwer to the "Engliſh Commercium Epiſtolicum, one of his own, "larger than that; and that a few days before his "death he ſignified to Mr. Wolfius, that he would "really confute the Engliſh, who had attacked his "reputation; and that as ſoon as he was at leiſure "from his Hiſtorical labours, he would give the world "ſomething in Analyſis, which was not expected, "nor had any affinity with the diſcoveries hitherto "publiſhed by Newton or any other perſon." But in the preface abovementioned, it is remarked, that it appears from Mr. Leibnitz's letters to the Abbé Conti, dated February 26th, 171$\frac{5}{6}$, and April 9th, 1716, that he had no Commercium Epiſtolicum to publiſh. And with reſpect to new inventions, which had no affinity with theſe, they were nothing to the point in queſtion.

[G] He was engaged likewiſe in a Scheme for an univerſal Language.] Dr. Wilkins Biſhop of Cheſter, and Dalgarme had been engaged in ſuch a deſign; but our author when he was in England, had told Mr. Boyle and Mr. Oldenburg, that he did not believe, that theſe great men had come to the point. They might enable Nations, who did not underſtand each other, to correſpond eaſily together; but they had not obtained the true real characters, which would be the beſt inſtrument of the human mind, and would extremely aſſiſt both the reaſon and memory, and the invention of things. Theſe characters ought to reſemble, as much as poſſible, thoſe of Algebra, which are very ſimple and expreſſive, and are never ſuperfluous or equivocal, but whoſe varieties are grounded on reaſon. Mr. Leibnitz ſpeaks in ſome place of an Alphabet of human thoughts, which he was contriving: it is very probable, that this alphabet had relation to his univerſal language (13).

[H] His writings had long before made him famous over all Europe.] Beſides thoſe already mentioned he wrote the following. I. Nova Methodus diſcendæ docendæque Juriſprudentiæ. Francfort 1668 in 12mo. II. Corporis Juris reconcinnandi Ratio. Mentz 1668 in 12mo. III. Marii Nizolii de veris Principiis & verâ ratione Philoſophandi contra Pſeudophiloſophos, cum Præfatione & Notis G. G. Leibnitzii. Francfort 1670 in 4to. This work had been printed in 1553; but was entirely forgot, when Mr. Leibnitz thought proper to republiſh it, in order to expoſe the obſtinacy of thoſe, who were zealouſly attached to Ariſtotle, and whom Nizolius treats with great ſeverity, and ſays, that the regard which had been for ſo long time paid to that Philoſopher was only a proof of the multitude of Fools and the duration of Folly. Mr. Leibnitz has added critical notes, in which his only deſign is to ſeek the truth, without carrying his reſpect for Nizolius beyond what he deſerves. And he has ſubjoined a letter to Thomaſius, his former maſter, concerning the method of reuniting the new Philoſophy with the old. IV. Sacroſancta Trinitas per nova inventa Logica defenſa. 1671. Monſieur de Boinebourg having communicated to Mr. Leibnitz a letter of Wiſſowatius Nephew of Fauſtus Socinus, in which he endeavoured to recommend the Socinian notions, our author anſwered in this tract the arguments urged in favour of them. V. Confeſſio Naturæ contra Atheos. Mr. Spitzelius inſerted this piece in his treatiſe againſt the Atheiſts. VI. Nova Hypotheſis Phyſica, qua Phænomenorum natura plerorumque cauſæ ab unico quodam univerſali motu in globo noſtro ſuppoſito repetuntur, ſeu Theoria motus concreti & abſtracti. Mentz 1671. It was reprinted at London. He admitted in this work a Vacuum, and thought that matter was ſimple extenſion, abſolutely indifferent to reſt and motion; but he afterwards changed his opinion. Mr. Knoor de Roſenroth tranſlated this book into German and joined it to his tranſlation of Sir Thomas Brown's Pſeudodoxia Epidemica printed at Nuremburg in 1680 in 4to, under the name of Chriſtophorus Peganius. VII. Notitia Opticæ Promotæ. This piece, which he addreſſed to Spinoza, and in which he teaches a new method of poliſhing Teleſcope-Glaſſes, is publiſhed in the poſthumous works of the latter. VIII. Cæſarini Furſtnerii de jure Suprematûs ac Legationis Principum Germaniæ. 1677. in 12mo. The Plenipotentiaries of the crowned heads appointed to negotiate the peace at Nimeguen having refuſed to treat the miniſters of the Sovereign Princes of Germany, who were not Electors, in the ſame manner with the miniſters of the ſovereign Princes of Italy, Mr. Leibnitz wrote in favour of the former this work, in which he took the name of Cæſarinus, to ſhew that he was in the Emperor's intereſts, and that of Furſtnerus, to ſhew, that he was likewiſe in the intereſt of the Princes, Furſt in High Dutch ſignifying Prince. This book did him great honour. IX. Entretiens de Philarete & d'Eugene ſur la Queſtion du temps agitée à Nimegue, touchant le droit d'Ambaſſade des Electeurs & des Princes d'Empire, in 12mo. This is an abridgment of the preceding work. X. De Arte combinatoria, Francfort 1690 in 4to. This was printed without his knowledge: he had written it when he was very young in 1665, and it had been already publiſhed at Leipſic in 1668. XI. De la Tolerance des Religions: Lettres de M. de Leibnitz, & Reponſes de M. Peliſſon. Paris 1692 in 12mo. Mr. Leibnitz is for toleration in theſe Letters, and Mr. Peliſſon in his anſwers is againſt it. XII. Codex Juris Gentium Diplomaticus, in quo Tabulæ Authenticæ Actorum publicorum, pleræque ineditæ vel ſelectæ continentur. Hanover 1693 in fol. This curious work, in which the ſeveral pieces are digeſted into order of time, begins with the year 1096 and ends in 1499. XIII. In 1693 he publiſhed a little treatiſe concerning the ſtate of Germany, ſuch as it might be ſuppoſed to have been before we have any account in Hiſtory; and he gave it the name of Protogæa, a ſhort Eſſay of which we have in the Acta Eruditorum of Leipſic for January 1693. This treatiſe was to precede the Hiſtory of the Houſe of Brunſwick. XIV. Noviſſima Sinica Hiſtoriam noſtri temporis illuſtrantia. 1697 in 8vo. He ſhews in this book the advantages which might be made from the miſſionaries being allowed to continue in China. XV. Lettre ſur la connexion des maiſons de Brunſwick & d'Eſte. 1698. and tranſlated into Italian by the Abbé Guidi. Mr. Leibnitz wrote this letter on occaſion of the marriage of the Duke of Modena with the eldeſt daughter of John Frederick Duke of Brunſwick-Lunenbourg. XVI. Acceſſiones Hiſtoricæ, quibus utilia ſuperiorum Temporum Hiſtoriis illuſtrandis Scripta monumentaque nondum hactenus edita, inque iis ſcriptores diu deſiderati continentur. Leipſic 1698 in 4to. XVII. Acceſſionum Hiſtoricarum Tom. 2. continens potiſſimum Chronicon Alberici Monachi Trium-fontium. Hanover 1698 in 4to. XVIII. Specimen Hiſtoriæ Arcanæ, ſive Anecdota de Vitâ Alexandri VI. Papæ. Hanover, 1696 in 4to. This fragment, to which Mr. Leibnitz has written a preface, was extracted from an hiſtory of that Pope written by John Burchard his maſter of the Ceremonies. Our author had only this piece in his hands, when he publiſhed it; but he afterwards procured the intire life, and was preparing to publiſh it when he died. XIX. Mantiſſa Codicis Juris Gentium Diplomatici. Hanover 1700 in fol. XX. Scriptores Rerum Brunſwicenſium illuſtrationi inſervientes, antiqui omnes & Religionis Reformatione priores. Hanover in fol. three volumes; the firſt publiſhed in 1707, the ſecond in 1710; and the third in 1711. XXI. Eſſais de Theodicée ſur la Bonté de Dieu, la Liberté de l'Homme, & l'Origine du Mal. Amſterdam 1710 in 8vo. two volumes.

Princeſs of Wolfenbuttel with the ſon of that Prince. He undertook at the ſame time to eſtabliſh at Vienna an Academy of Sciences; but his ſcheme was not executed. It is ſaid that the plague was the occaſion of it. However the Emperor, as a mark of his favour, ſettled on him a penſion of two thouſand florins, and promiſed him another of four thouſand florins, if he would come and reſide at Vienna. He would have complied with this offer, if he had not been prevented by death. Upon his return to Hanover in 1714 he found that the Elector, who was then raiſed to the throne of Great Britain, had appointed Mr. Eckhard for his collegue in writing the Hiſtory of Brunſwick. This work was interrupted by others, which he wrote occaſionally. The laſt affair he was engaged in was his volumes. This work contains, 1. A long preface. 2. A Preliminary diſcourſe concerning the agreement of Faith with Reaſon. 3. An eſſay upon the goodneſs of God, the free-will of Man, and the origin of Evil, divided in three parts. 4. A Latin piece entitled, Cauſa Dei aſſerta per Juſtitiam ejus, cum cæteris ejus perfectionibus cunctiſque Actionibus conciliatam. 5. Some reflections upon a book of Mr. Hobbes concerning Free-will, Neceſſity and Chance. 6. Some remarks upon a book of Dr. William King, Archbiſhop of Dublin, de Origine Mali. In this work his deſign is to anſwer the objections urged by Mr. Bayle with regard to the goodneſs of God, the liberty of man, and the origin of evil. In the Diſcourſe concerning the agreement of Faith with Reaſon, he has the following paſſage: "We want no revelation to know, "that there is a ſole principle of all things, infinitely good, and infinitely wiſe. Reaſon teaches us "the exiſtence of that principle by infallible demonſtrations; and conſequently all the objections taken from the uſual courſe of things, wherein we "obſerved ſeveral imperfections, are grounded only "upon falſe appearances. For if we could underſtand "the univerſal harmony of the world, we ſhould ſee, "that thoſe things, which we are apt to blame, are "connected with the wiſeſt plan that could be choſen; in a word, we ſhould ſee, and not believe only, that what God has done is the beſt. By ſeeing I mean here what is known a priori by the cauſes; "and by believing what we judge only by the effects, "though the one be as certainly known as the other. "To which we may apply what St. Paul ſays (2 "Cor. v. 7.) that we walk by Faith, and not by "Sight. For the infinite Wiſdom of God being "known to us, we judge that he had good reaſons "to permit natural and moral Evil; and we judge "ſo by the effects or à poſteriori, that is, becauſe it "exiſts. Mr. Bayle owns this truth; and therefore "he ſhould have been contented with it, without "pretending that there ſhould be no falſe appearances "againſt it. It is juſt as if one ſhould require, that "there ſhould be no dreams, nor any deception in "opticks." He then obſerves, that the paſſages of ſeveral authors, quoted by Mr. Bayle, do not prove that there are any unanſwerable objections againſt any revealed doctrine. As for what concerns the Fathers, they did not abſolutely reject the uſe of reaſon; on the contrary, in their diſputes with the Heathens, they applied themſelves to ſhew that Paganiſm was contrary to reaſon, and that Chriſtianity had a great advantage over it even in that reſpect. In the Eſſay upon the goodneſs of God, the Free-will of Man, and the Origin of Evil, he undertakes to anſwer ſeveral difficulties, which concern not only revealed, but alſo natural Religion. God, ſays he, is the firſt reaſon of things; for things that are limited, (as every thing is, which we ſee and know by experience,) are contingent, and have nothing in them, that renders their exiſtence neceſſary; it being manifeſt that time, ſpace, and matter, which are uniform in themſelves, might have received quite different motions and figures, and in a different order. We muſt therefore look for the reaſon of the exiſtence of the world, which is the whole collection of contingent things, in that ſubſtance, which carries the reaſon of its exiſtence along with it, and is conſequently neceſſary and eternal. That cauſe muſt alſo be intelligent; for this world, which actually exiſts, being contingent, and an infinite number of other worlds being equally poſſible; the cauſe of the world muſt have conſidered all thoſe poſſible worlds to pitch upon one; which could not be done but by an underſtanding, that has the ideas of all poſſible things. This intelligent cauſe muſt be infinite in all reſpects, and abſolutely perfect in power, wiſdom, and goodneſs, ſince it tends to every thing that is poſſible. And becauſe all things are linked and connected together, there can be no reaſon to admit more than one firſt Cauſe. Its underſtanding is the ſource of Eſſences, and its will is the origin of Exiſtences. This is our author's proof of one only God, with his perfections, and of the origin of things. That ſupreme wiſdom, attended with an infinite goodneſs, could not but chooſe the beſt. If the works of God were not the beſt, ſomething better might have been done; which is inconſiſtent with his infinite wiſdom. If among all poſſible worlds, there was not one that is the beſt, God would have produced none. I call world the whole ſyſtem and collection of things that exiſt; leſt it ſhould be ſaid, that many worlds might exiſt at different times and in different places. For all of them muſt be accounted but one world, or, if you will, one Univerſe. And ſuppoſing that all places and times are filled up, it will be true ſtill that they might have been filled up after an infinite manner of ways, and that there is an infinity of poſſible worlds, whereof God muſt needs have choſen the beſt, ſince he does nothing without acting according to the ſupreme reaſon. If it be ſaid, that the world might have been without ſin and miſery, I deny that ſuch a world would have been the beſt. For all things are linked together in each poſſible world: the univerſe, whatever it may be, is all of a piece, like an ocean: the leaſt motion produces its effect to any diſtance, though that effect becomes leſs ſenſible in proportion to the diſtance. So that God has ſettled every thing beforehand, once for all, having foreſeen prayers, good and evil actions, &c. and every thing ideally contributed before its exiſtence to the reſolution that was taken about the exiſtence of all things; inſomuch that no alteration can be made in the univerſe (no more than in a number) without deſtroying its Eſſence, or, if you will, its numerical individuality. And therefore if the leaſt evil that happens in the world, was wanting in it, it would not be this world, which, all things duly conſidered, was accounted the beſt by the wiſe Creator who choſe it. It is true, one may imagine ſome poſſible worlds without ſin and miſery; but thoſe worlds would be in other reſpects very much inferior to ours in Good. I cannot make you ſenſible of it by entering into particulars; for can I know and repreſent to you infinites? Can I compare them together? But you ought to believe ſo, as well as I, ab effectu, ſince God has choſen this world ſuch as it is. Beſides, we know that an Evil does frequently produce a good thing, which would not have happened, had it not been for that Evil. Nay, two evils have frequently occaſioned a very good thing:

A little acidity, acrimony, or bitterneſs is ſometimes more pleaſant than Sugar. Colours are heightened by ſhadows; and a diſſonance well placed renders harmony more beautiful. We deſire to be frighted by Rope-dancers, who are ready to fall; and to ſhed tears at the repreſentation of a tragedy. Does any one ſufficiently reliſh the happineſs of health, who has never been ſick? Is it not generally neceſſary, that a little Evil ſhould render a Good more ſenſible, and conſequently greater? It will be ſaid, that evils are very great and numerous, if compared with good things. But it is a miſtake. Want of attention is the only thing that leſſens our happineſs; and it is neceſſary, that this attention ſhould be raiſed by a mixture of evil. Let us ſupply by reflection what is wanting in our perception, to be more ſenſible of our happineſs. Were it not for the knowledge of a future life, I be-his diſpute with Dr. Samuel Clarke, which was put an end to by Mr. Leibnitz's death, which was occaſioned by the gout and ſtone November the 14th 1716, he being then ſeventy years of age (b). He was of a moderate ſtature, and of a thin habit of body. He lieve moſt people would be willing at the point of death to begin a new life, upon condition, that they ſhould enjoy as much good, and undergo as many evils, eſpecially if they were of another kind. They could be contented with a change, without requiring a more happy condition. Whoever conſiders the weakneſs and frailty of human bodies, muſt needs admire the wiſdom and goodneſs of the author of nature, who made them ſo laſting, and renders our lives ſo tolerable. It is no wonder if men are ſometimes ſick; but it is a wonder they are not always ſo. This conſideration ought to raiſe in us a greater admiration for the mechaniſm of our bodies, which though frail and ſubject to corruption, are capable of maintaing themſelves; for nature cures us rather than phyſic. But that very frailty is a conſequence of the nature of things; unleſs any one ſhould ſay, that this ſort of creatures, which are endowed with reaſon, and cloathed with fleſh and bones, ſhould not be in the world. But it would be an imperfection, which ſome ancient Philoſophers would have called Vacuum Formarum, a Vacuum in the order of ſpecies. Thoſe, who far from complaining of nature and fortune, appear well pleaſed with them, though their condition be none of the beſt, ſeem to me the wiſeſt. For, not to ſay that ſuch complaints are ill-grounded, it is an actual rebellion againſt Providence. No man ought to be very ready to join with the male-contents in the ſtate wherein we live; and none ought to appear diſcontented in the city of God, ſince it cannot be done without great injuſtice. Thoſe books, that treat of the miſery of mankind, ſuch as that of Pope Innocent III. are none of the moſt uſeful. We increaſe our evils by reflecting upon them, inſtead of conſidering the good things, which are far more numerous. Much leſs ſhould we value a ſort of books, like that of Abbé Eſprit, concerning the falſity of human Virtues. Such a book is only proper to make us put an ill conſtruction upon every thing, and to render men ſuch as they are repreſented by that author. However it muſt be confeſſed that there are ſeveral diſorders in this life, which particularly appear by the proſperity of many wicked perſons; and the unhappineſs of many good men. But it ought to be conſidered, that the wicked are frequently puniſhed in this world, and that virtue will be for ever rewarded in another life. It will be objected, that even after this life, miſery will prevail above happineſs, ſince there are but few elect; which appears inconſiſtent with the goodneſs of the Supreme Being. In anſwer to this difficulty, granting that the number of thoſe, who are to be tormented in hell, will be incomparably greater than that of the bleſſed, the evil will ſtill appear like nothing, if compared with the good, conſidering the true extent of the city of God. The antients had a narrow notion of the works of the author of nature; and St. Auguſtin, for want of knowing the modern diſcoveries, was not a little perplexed, when he undertook to juſtify the prevalency of evil. It was in former times a common opinion, that the earth was the only part of the world furniſhed with inhabitants; nay, the antients were afraid of admitting any Antipodes. They believed, that the reſt of the world did only conſiſt of ſome ſhining globes and chryſtalline ſpheres. But in our days it will be acknowledged that there is an innumerable multitude of globes, as large or larger than ours, which may be inhabited by rational creatures, though it does not follow that they are men. Our earth is only a planet, that is, one of the ſix principal ſatellites of our ſun. And becauſe all fixed ſtars are ſo many ſuns, it is plain, that the earth is a very inconſiderable part of the univerſe, ſince it is only an appendix of one ſun. Perhaps all the ſuns are inhabited by happy creatures; at leaſt we have no reaſon to believe that many of their inhabitants will be damned. Beſides, conſidering that there is no reaſon to affirm, that there are ſtars every where, it may very well be, that there is a vaſt ſpace beyond the region of the ſtars. Whether it be the Empyreal Heaven, or not, that immenſe ſpace, which ſurrounds all that region, may be filled with glory and happineſs. It may be conceived like an ocean, which receives the rivers of all happy creatures, when they have attained to their perfection in the ſyſtem of the ſtars. What will then become of the conſideration of our globe and its inhabitants? Will it not be a thing incomparably leſs than a Phyſical point, ſince our earth is like a point, with reſpect to the diſtance of ſome fixed ſtars? And therefore the proportion of that part of the univerſe, which we know, being left in a kind of nothingneſs, if compared to what is unknown to us; and all the evils, that can be objected, being only in that kind of nothingneſs; it may very well be, that all evils are almoſt nothing in compariſon with all the good things, that are in the univerſe. Mr. Leibnitz proceeds to enquire into the cauſe of evil, that it is in the ideal nature of creatures, inaſmuch as nature is comprehended in the eternal truths that are in the divine underſtanding, independently of the will of God. It muſt be conſidered, ſays he, that there is an Original Imperfection in Creatures before ſin, becauſe the creatures are eſſentially limited. Hence it is that they know not every thing, and may be miſtaken, and commit other faults. The Region of Eternal Truths in the divine underſtanding ought to be placed in the room of Matter, when the queſtion is to know the true cauſe of things. That region is the Ideal Cauſe of evil, (if one may ſay ſo) as well as of good; but properly ſpeaking, the formal part of evil has no efficient cauſe; it conſiſts in a Privation. Though natural Evil or miſery, and moral Evil or ſin be not neceſſary, yet they are poſſible by vertue of thoſe eternal truths. And becauſe that immenſe Region of truths contains all poſſibilities, there muſt be an infinite number of poſſible worlds; evil muſt come into many of them, and even the beſt of them all muſt contain ſome. This is what determined God to permit evil. That ſupreme Being could not be ſaid to act according to his wiſdom and goodneſs and all his perfections, if he did not chooſe what is abſolutely the beſt, though moral evil be involved in it by the ſupreme neceſſity of eternal truths. Mr. Leibnitz's concluſion upon this head is, that God wills all manner of good antecedently, the beſt conſequently as an End, and natural evil as a means; and that he only permits moral evil, as being connected and linked with what is beſt. And therefore the conſequent Will of God is only permiſſive with reſpect to ſin. In the next place Mr. Leibnitz anſwers the objections grounded upon the Phyſical Concourſe of God with the creatures, and thoſe that concern the liberty of man. He places that liberty in ſpontaneity and choice, and not in an indetermination or Indifference of Æquilibrium. Such an Æquilibrium, ſays he, is impoſſible, and abſolutely contrary to experience. Whoever examines himſelf, will find that there is ſome cauſe or reaſon that determines the will, though we are not always ſenſible of it, no more than we are ſenſible when we go out of a door, why we ſet the right foot before the left, or the left before the right. There is always a prevailing reaſon, that inclines the will, without neceſſitating it. The will is never moved but by the repreſentation of a good, which prevails above the contrary repreſentation. Every body owns it with reſpect to God, good Angels, and the bleſſed Souls, without pretending that they are not free. God does not fail to chooſe what is beſt, but he is not forced to it; and there is no neceſſity in the object of his choice, for another ſeries of things is equally poſſible. His choice is free and independent upon neceſſity, becauſe he chooſes the beſt world among many that are poſſible, and his will is only determined by the prevailing goodneſs of the object. And therefore it is not an imperfection in God, nor in the Angels and bleſſed Souls. On the contrary, it would be a great imperfection, or rather a manifeſt abſurdity, if it were otherwiſe,

He was ſhort-ſighted. In order to fix what he thought proper in his memory, he wrote it down, and never read it over again. His memory was ſo ſtrong, that even in his old age he could repeat Virgil exactly. He was naturally of a very warm temper, which he generally took care to reſtrain in a proper manner. He was very ſenſible of the honour of being conſidered as one of the greateſt men of Europe. He was ſollicitous to procure the otherwiſe, even in men, and if they could act without any reaſon inclining them to it. No inſtance can be given of ſuch a liberty, and when any body reſolves upon a thing out of humour, to ſhew that he is a free agent, the pleaſure or the advantage, which he thinks to reap from that affectation, is one of the reaſons that move him to it. Every thing is certain and determinate beforehand in man, as every where elſe; and an human ſoul is a kind of Spiritual Automaton; though contingent actions in general, and free actions in particular, are not neceſſary of an abſolute neceſſity, which would be inconſiſtent with contingency. XXII. De Origine Francorum Diſquiſitio. Hanover 1715 in 8vo. In this work Mr. Leibnitz aſſerts that the Franks or French came from Pomerania and the banks of the river Oder. He was attacked in Germany by Mr. Grundlingicis, Profeſſor of the Univerſity of Hall, and in France by Father Tournemine, the Jeſuit. XXIII. L'Anti-Jacobite. 1715. Two diſputes, which Mr. Leibnitz had with the learned men of England, are the principal ſubject of this collection. One of theſe diſputes is merely hiſtorical, and turns upon a queſtion of fact, whether himſelf or Sir Iſaac Newton was the true or at leaſt the firſt inventor of Fluxions. The other diſpute is concerning the Newtonian Philoſophy, attacked by Mr. Leibnitz, and defended by Dr. Samuel Clarke. Mr. Des Maizeaux, the editor of this collection, has prefixed to it a long and curious preface containing a particular account of thoſe diſputes. In the Journal des Savans Mr. Leibnitz has the following pieces. 1. Extrait d'une Lettre touchant le Principe des Horloges portatives de ſon Invention. Printed in the Journal of March the 25th 1675. 2. Lettre écrite d'Hanovre le 18 Juin 1677 contenant la Relation & la Figure d'un Chevreuil coëffé d'une maniere fort extraordinaire. In the Journal of July the 5th 1677. 3. Obſervation nouvelle de la maniere d'eſsrayer ſi un nombre eſt primitif. In the Journal of February the 28th 1678. 4. Lettre touchant la quadrature d'un portion de la Roulette. In the Journal of May the 23d 1678. 5. Lettre ſur la queſtion, ſi l'Eſſence du Corps conſiſte dans l'Etendüe. In the Journal of June 18th 1691, and January 5th 1693. 6. De la Chainette, ou Solution d'un Probleme fameux, propoſé par Galilée, pour ſervir d'Eſſai d'une nouvelle Analyſe des infinis avec ſon Uſage pour les Logarithmes, & une Application à l'avancement de la Navigation. In the Journal of March 31 1692. 7. Lettre ſur quelques Axiomes de Philoſophie. In the Journal of June 2, 1692. 8. *Nouvelles Remarques touchant l'Analyſe des tranſcendantes differentes de celles de la Geometrie de M. but never went to Sermons; and when he was upon his death-bed, his coachman, who was his favourite ſervant, deſiring him to ſend for a Miniſter, he refuſed, ſaying, he had no occaſion for one (c). He was never married. He had ſome thoughts of entering into that ſtate when he was fifty years old; but the perſon whom he deſigned to marry deſiring ſome time to conſider of it, Mr. Leibnitz had an opportunity to do the ſame, and concluded, that marriage was very good, but that a man of ſenſe ought to conſider of it all his life (d). He had in his youth a natural ſon, who afterwards lived with him, and ſerved him in a great many points, and had a conſiderable ſhare in his confidence. He went by the name of William Dinniger, and extremely reſembled Mr. Leibnitz. This particular we are informed of by the author of the Recueil de Litterature (e), who likewiſe aſſerts, that Mr. Leibnitz refuſed the place of Keeper of the Vatican Library offered him by Cardinal Caſanata, while he was at Rome. Mr. Lœflerus, ſon of his ſiſter by the mother's ſide, was his ſole heir, whoſe wife died ſuddenly with joy at the ſight of ſo much money left them by their uncle (f). Dr. Chriſtopher Matthew Pfaffius affirms (g), that our author was of Mr. Bayle's opinion, though he ſeemed to attack it in this Theodicée; and that he confeſſed to him in a letter, that his own ſcheme would rather ſupport than deſtroy Mr. Bayle. Mr. Le Clerc obſerves (h) that he had formed the ſame judgment of Mr. Leibnitz with Dr. Pfaff. But Father Tournemine the Jeſuit aſſures us, that Dr. Pfaff and Mr. Le Clerc were miſtaken, and that Mr. Leibnitz had written to him, that the Theodicée contained his real ſentiments (i). Mr. William Molyneux in a letter to Mr. Locke dated at Dublin March the 16th $169\frac{6}{7}$ ſpeaking of our author's Reflections on Mr. Locke's Eſſay on human Underſtanding, writes thus: "He is "certainly an extraordinary perſon, eſpecially in Mathematics; but really, to ſpeak "freely of him, in relation to what he may have to ſay to you, I do not expect any "great matters from him; for methinks (with all deference to his great name) he has "given the world no extraordinary ſamples of his thoughts that way, as appears by two "Diſcourſes he has printed, both in the Acta Erudit. Lipſiæ, the firſt Anno 1694, pag. "110. de primæ Philoſophiæ Emendatione, &c. the other Anno 1695, pag. 145, Speci-"men Dynamicum, which truly to me is, in many places, unintelligible." Mr. Locke in his anſwer to Mr. Molyneux, dated at Oates April the 10th 1697, writes thus: "To "anſwer your great freedom with the like, I muſt confeſs to you, that Mr. L——'s great "name had raiſed in me an expectation, which the ſight of his paper did not anſwer; "nor that diſcourſe of his in the Acta Eruditorum, which he quotes, and I have ſince "read, and had juſt the ſame thoughts of it, when I read it, as I found you have. "From whence I only draw this inference, that even great parts will not maſter any "ſubject without great thinking, and even the largeſt minds have but narrow ſwallows." And in another letter dated at Oates May the 3d 1697 Mr. Locke, having quoted a paſſage from a letter written to him from Holland concerning Mr. Leibnitz, proceeds thus: I ſee you and I and this Gentleman agree pretty well concerning the man; and this ſort of fidling makes me hardly avoid thinking, that he is not that very great man as has been talked of him.

tiones variæ de Linguis & Origine vocabulorum, necnon de concinnando Dictionario & perpoliendâ Linguâ Germanicâ. p. 594. 7. Obſervatio de ſuperſtitionibus quibuſdam Sclavorum. p. 693. 8. Obſervatio de variis Ludis. p. 642. 9. Excerpta ex Litteris Leibnitzii. p. 111. In the Mémoires de Litterature of father Deſmolets, Tome VIII. p. 211. we have a piece of our author entitled, Lettres à M. Arnaud, où il lui expoſe ſes ſentimens particuliers ſur la Metaphyſique & ſur la Phyſique. His Reponſe aux objections du P. Tournemine contre la Diſſertation de M. Leibnitz ſur l'Origine des Francois is publiſhed with his Diſſertation de Origine Francorum at the end of a work of John George Eccard, entitled, Leges Francorum & Ripuariorum, cum additionibus Regum & Imperatorum variis, Francfort 1720 in fol. The additions to the diſſertation of Mr. Leibnitz are by the Editor. Mr. Leibnitz had tranſlated that work into French, and ſent a MS. copy to Monſieur Remond to be preſented to the Marquis de Torci, and even to King Lewis XIV. if that miniſter ſhould think proper. This tranſlation is printed in Mr. Des Maizeaux's Recueil des Pieces de Meſſieurs de Leibnitz, Clarke, Newton, &c. printed at Amſterdam 1700 two Tomes in 8vo. The Reponſe aux objections du P. Tournemine abovementioned is publiſhed likewiſe in the Bibliotheque Germanique, Tom. VII. p. 13. He wrote alſo the Hiſtory of Balaam, in which he endeavours to prove, that what is related of that Prophet did not happen really, but in a dream. Michael Gottlieb Hanſchius has collected with care every thing, that Mr. Leibnitz had ſaid in different paſſages of his works upon the principles of Philoſophy, and formed a complete Syſtem, under the title of, G. G. Leibnitii Principia Philoſophiæ more Geometrico demonſtrata cum excerptis & epiſtolis Philoſophicis & ſcholiis quibuſdam ex Hiſtoriâ Philoſophicâ. Francfort. 1728 in 4to. At the end of Mr. Toland's Poſthumous works printed at London in 1726, we find a piece of Mr. Leibnitz, entitled, Annotatiunculæ ſubitaneæ ad Librum de Chriſtianiſmo myſteriis carente, conſcriptæ 8. Auguſti 1701. He wrote likewiſe in French reflexions upon Mr. Locke's Eſſay on Human Underſtanding, printed in the Familiar Letters of between Mr. Locke and ſeveral of his Friends, and in the third volume of Mr. Des Maizeaux's Recueil de diverſes Pieces ſur la Philoſophie, la Religion Naturelle, &c. In 1734, and 1735, there was publiſhed a collection of his Letters by Mr. Chriſtian Kortholt at Leipſic in two volumes in 8vo. under the following title; Vir illuſtris Godefridi Guil. Leibnitii Epiſtolæ ad diverſos, Theologici, Juridici medici, Philoſophici, Mathematici, Hiſtorici, & Philologica argumenti. E. MSS. Auctoris, cum Annotationibus ſuis primum divulgavit Chriſtian. Kortholtus, A. M. Ordinis Philoſophici in Academia Lipſienſi Aſſeſſor, & Collegii minoris Principum Collegiatus. The Editor promiſes another volume at leaſt, for he has in his hands a great many original Letters of Leibnitz, which he had obtained lately. Mr. John Bernoulli has promiſed to furniſh him with ſome, which treat of very important ſubjects; and Mr. Nettelbladt, Profeſſor of civil Law at Gryphſwald, has engaged to recover thoſe, which lie concealed in Sweden. He has hopes likewiſe of receiving others from divers parts of Germany, and alſo from England. T.

LELAND (JOHN) an Engliſhman, born in London, applied himſelf ſo aſſiduouſly to the ſearch of Engliſh Antiquities, and was judged ſo well qualified to ſucceed in them, that Henry VIII honoured him with a very conſiderable penſion and the title of Antiquary, an employment which began and ended in him. That he might well diſcharge the duties of it, he viſited all the counties in England, examined all the remains of antient monuments; peruſed the manuſcripts of convents and colleges, and having ſpent ſix years in his perambulation, and collected all the materials he could poſſibly meet with, he undertook ſeveral conſiderable works [A]; but he had not time to finiſh, nor even to get them in any forwardneſs. The Court did not pay him his ſalary; and whether it were on this account, or for ſome other reaſons, he fell into ſo deep a melancholy as deprived him of his ſenſes [B], in which ſad condition he died. His manuſcripts are in the Bodleian Library. They conſiſt of a huge heap of undigeſted materials [C], which at the ſame time ſhew the greatneſs of his capacity. This appears ſtill more evidently, by a work which he compleated [D], and which deſerves to be printed (a). Camden was accuſed of having made a great uſe of Leland's manuſcripts (b); a circumſtance which was refuted by Dr. Smith.

I muſt not omit that he ſtudied at Paris under Sylvius; that he began in 1534 his perambulations in ſearch after Engliſh Antiquities; that he abjured the Church of Rome ſome time before his death; and that he died the 18th of April 1552 (c).

☞ LELAND or LEYLAND (JOHN)). We ſhall add ſome particulars to Mr. Bayle's article of this learned writer [A]. He was born in London (a); but in what pariſh or year, appears not (b). In his younger years being deprived of his relations, he was taken into the protection of Mr. Thomas Myles, a great favourer of learning, who not only exhibited to his wants, but likewiſe took care to have him inſtructed in grammar under the famous William Lily, maſter of St. Paul's School at London (c); from whence he was ſent to Chriſt's College in the Univerſity of Cambridge (d). He afterwards removed to Oxford, and ſpent ſeveral years in All-Souls College there (e). He went to Paris, where he made a great progreſs in learning under Budæus, Faber, Paulus Æmilius, Ruellus, and Francis Sylvius (f). Upon his return to England he entered into holy Orders, and became Chaplain and Antiquary to King Henry VIII (g), and Rector of Poppeling in the Marches of Calais. He was afterwards appointed Library-Keeper to his Majeſty; and in 1533 had a Commiſſion from him under the Broad Seal, whereby he was impowered to ſearch after Engliſh Antiquities, and view the Libraries of all Cathedrals, Abbies, Priories, Colleges, &c. as alſo all places, wherein records, writings, and ſecrets of Antiquity were repoſited. For this purpoſe having obtained in 1536 a diſpenſation for non-reſidence upon his Living of Poppeling, he ſpent above ſix years in travelling

The Editor in his preface obſerves, that Leland deſigned to have written four Books concerning the illuſtrious men of Britain, but was prevented by death from finiſhing and publiſhing them. He informs us likewiſe, that Dr. Thomas Gale had an intention to have publiſhed this work, and to have illuſtrated it by the means of that of Boſton of Bury. And the ſame deſign was undertaken by Dr. Thomas Tanner, the late Biſhop of St. Aſaph. XIII. An Itinerary throughout moſt parts of England: a manuſcript in 4to. Mr. Harriſon in page 63 of his ſecond edition of his Deſcription of Britain writes of this work thus: For ſo moth-eaten, mouldie, and rotten are thoſe books of Leland, which I have, and beſide that his Annotations are ſuch and ſo confounded, as no man can (in a manner) pick out any ſenſe from them by a leaf together. Wherefore I ſuppoſe, that he diſperſid and made his Notes intricate of ſet purpoſe; or elſe he was loth that anie man ſhould eaſilie come to that knowledge by reading, which he with his great charge and no leſs travell attained unto by experience. But Mr. Hearne (3) remarks upon this paſſage: "This great Antiquary [Leland] was of a noble, ge- "nerous, and publick ſpirit, and could not be guilty "of any ſuch pitiful, mean trick, as this, which is "mentioned by Harriſon, who methinks ſhould have "ſtudiouſly avoided all unbecoming reflections upon "ſo great a man, from whom he borrowed the moſt "valuable and moſt judicious paſſages in his ſaid "Deſcription of Britain, his own remarks being ge- "nerally very mean and trivial.... Nor do I think, "that Harriſon would have ſpoke contemptuouſly of "theſe papers, had it not been out of a deſign to "advance the credit of his own obſervations; which "is a crime that ſome of our modern writers have "been guilty of, when they have had occaſion to "ſpeak of Leland." travelling about England, and collecting Antiquities. At the time of the diſſolution of the monaſteries, he ſaw with great regret what havock was made of antient monuments of learning; and that, if no remedy ſhould be taken, they would all periſh. Upon this he wrote a letter to Secretary Cromwell dated July the 16th for his aſſiſtance in bringing to light many antient authors, and in ſending them to the King's Library; adding, that "it would be a great profit to Students, and honour to this Realm; whereas "now the Germans perceiving our deſidiouſneſs and negligence, do ſend daily young "ſcholars hither, that ſpoileth them, and cutteth them out of Libraries, returning home, "and putting them abroad as monuments of their own country." April the 3d 1542 he was preſented to the Rectory of Haſely near Oxford; and in the beginning of April 1543 was preferred by the King to a Canonry of King's College, now Chriſt-Church in Oxford; and about the ſame time he was collated to the Prebend of Eaſt Knoll and Weſt Knoll near Saliſbury in Wiltſhire. But he loſt the Canonry in Chriſt Church in 1545, upon the ſurrender of that College to the King, and inſtead thereof had no penſion allowed him, as the other Canons had, but preferment elſewhere. At laſt having made a vaſt collection of Antiquities, he retired to his houſe in the pariſh of St. Michael le Querne in London; "where ſpending about ſix years more in compoſing ſuch books "as he had promiſed to the King, he did at length (upon a foreſight that he was not "able to perform his promiſe, or, as the Roman Catholics ſay, that he had degenerated "from the antient Religion) fall diſtracted and loſt his ſenſes." This his diſtemper being made known to the King and his Council, King Edward VI; by his Letters Patents dated March the 5th 1550, granted the cuſtody of him by the name of John Laylond Junior of St. Michael's Pariſh in le Querne, Clerk, to his brother John Laylond Senior, and for his maintenance to receive the profits of Haſely, Poppeling, Eaſt Knoll and Weſt Knoll abovementioned (h). He died April the 18th 1552 (i), and was interred in the Church of St. Michael le Querne (k). He was univerſally eſteemed an excellent Orator and Poet, and was well ſkilled in the Greek, Latin, French, Italian, Spaniſh, Britiſh, Saxon, Welch, and Scotiſh tongues (l). His enemies, as Polydore Virgil, Dr. John Caius, &c. uſed to repreſent him as a vain-glorious perſon, who promiſed more than he was able to perform; and others ſaid, that his poetical wit made him ſo conceited, that it was the chief cauſe of his phrenſy (m).

years after by his gift, when he had made uſe of them in compiling his Deſcription of Leiceſterſhire, into the Bodleian library at Oxford, together with the Itinerary. As for other of his collections, they came after the death of Sir John Cheke into the hands of William Lord Paget and Sir William Cecil, but to whom from them, does not appear. Perhaps among theſe collections were thoſe, which came afterwards into Sir Robert Cotton's hands, and the Itinerary, which came into the poſſeſſion of Mr. Burton. Camden made a conſiderable uſe of his collections in the writing of his Britannia (4); as Sir William Dugdale has likewiſe done in compiling his Antiquities of Warwickſhire and his Baronage of England. John Bale was alſo greatly aſſiſted in his book de Scriptoribus Britanniæ by our author's work on the ſame ſubject. Mr. John Bagford in a letter to Mr. Hearne relating to the antiquities of London, and dated at the Charter-Houſe, Feb. 1. 171⅘, and prefixed to the firſt Volume of Mr. Hearne's edition of Leland's Collectanea, obſerves that what had been formerly done by Leland with reſpect to the antiquities of London, "ſeems now to be loſt, though "it muſt be owned, that many authors, that have "written of the antiquities of England ſince his time, "have made frequent uſe of his works, he alone laying the foundation of what hath ſince been diſcovered. For I do not in the leaſt queſtion, but that "moſt of his writings, after his death, firſt came into the hands of Reginald Wolfe, the Printer, at "whoſe houſe, I believe, Leland died, which was at "that time ſituated in the Pariſh of St. Michael in "the Querne, though afterwards he removed into the "Pariſh of St. Faith's. I take this Wolfe to have "been one of the firſt builders of a houſe in St. Paul's "Church-yard, and to have been not only the firſt "projector of the two Tomes of the Chronicles of England (which commonly go under the name of Raphael Hollinſhead and William Harriſon) out of Leland; but alſo to have been the firſt deſigner of a "large map of England by the ſketches he had taken "from Leland's New year's gift; though nothing of "the like nature was afterwards done till the time of Saxton in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The ſe-"cond edition of Hollinſhead is continued by John "Stow; and I muſt be ſo free in my thoughts to tell "you, that (to ſay nothing of what Camden borrow-"ed from him) it is my opinion, that Stow had in "his poſſeſſion Leland's antiquities of London, and "for want of Learning moſt grievouſly mangled the "work on purpoſe to make it his own. This hint "I have taken partly from the benefit of your laſt "converſation, when you was pleaſed to read to me "what Leland has upon the ſame ſubject; and partly "from my own reflection upon the Qualifications of "Stow, who certainly was not capable of making ſuch "a collection; and therefore I cannot but conclude "that he muſt have been beholden to Leland; which "I think is likewiſe confirmed from hence, that in his "Survey of London he makes very little mention of "Leland, although in his Annals he often takes notice "of him". I had formerly, continues Mr. Bagford, a much greater veneration for Stow, before you acquainted me, that Leland had wrote the antiquities of this city, (of which he was a native) under the Britains, Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans, and ſo down to the time himſelf lived in; by which work we might have ſeen what diſcoveries he had made from antient authors, moſt of which are ſince loſt, and might likewiſe have had the benefit of divers uſeful remarks, grounded upon his own obſervations on the antient buildings of the Romans in this famous City; which remarks could not be expected from Mr. Stow, who was little acquainted with the Coins and other antiquities of the Romans. The beſt account we have from him is that relating to Monumental inſcriptions in Churches; which brings to my mind a folio Manuſcript, I have ſeen, of thoſe in Chriſt-church (formerly the Gray-Friars) within New-Gate, which were not inſerted in the firſt impreſſion of the Survey. I gather from the hand, that this very book was collected by Leland; and it happened therefore very luckily, that the inſcriptions in it were afterwards added in the edition ſet out by Stow.

Several editions (1) of it are mentioned in Lindenius renovatus; but no notice is there taken of the firſt, which was that of Antwerp apud Gulielmum Simonem 1559 8vo. The work conſiſted then but of two books; and was dedicated, by the author, to Matthias Gallomontanus ab Heeſuwiick, apud Metelliburgum Antiſtes. The ſecond edition, printed by Plantin, at Antwerp in the year 1564, in 8vo, contains four books; and was dedicated, by the author, to Eric King of Sweden. We are told in the preface, that Lemnius intended to add two books more to the four in queſtion.

LEMNOS, an iſland in the Ægean Sea, near Thrace, and Mount Athos [A], was famous on many accounts. It was ſo called from the great Goddeſs named Lemnos, and to whom young maidens were ſacrificed (a). The Sinti, a people of Thrace, were the firſt who inhabited it (b). There were but two cities in it, the one called Hepheſtia, and the other Myrana (c). Its labyrinth was one of the four edifices of that kind, mentioned by the antients [B]. The inhabitants of Lemnos were the firſt who forged weapons of war (d); which doubtleſs was one of the reaſons which obliged the Poets to feign that Vulcan, being precipitated from heaven to earth, fell into this iſland, where he met with a very kind reception, and ſet up a forge (e) [C]. [A] Near ... mount Athos.] A great number of authors have obſerved, that the ſhadow of this mountain extends as far as the iſland of Lemnos. Lemnos ab Atho LXXXVII. mill. paſſuum. Circuitu patet CXII. M. D. paſſ. Oppida habet, Hephæſtiam & Myrinam, in cujus forum ſolſtitio Athos ejaculatur umbram (1). i. e. "Lemnos is fourſcore and ſeven miles "from Athos, and an hundred and twelve miles in "circumference. Hephæſtia and Myrina are its towns, "into whoſe Forum Athos projects its ſhadow, at the "Solſtice." We find by theſe words of Pliny, that mount Athos was 87 miles from the iſland of Lemnos, and Solinus ſuppoſes it but a mile leſs (2). However, this does not agree with the obſervations of Belon, an eye-witneſs, and conſequently more worthy of credit than Pliny. I will copy his words. "The iſland is "more extended in length than in breadth, from "Eaſt to Weſt; ſo that when the ſun ſets, the ſhadow "of mount Athos, which ſtands above eight leagues "from thence, falls on the harbour, and over a point "of the iſland, on the left ſide of Lemnos, a circum-"ſtance we obſerved the 2d of June: for mount Athos "is ſo high, that though the ſun was not very low, "nevertheleſs the ſhadow touched the left angle of the "iſland (3)." Here is a teſtimony that ought to perſuade us, that the antients had reaſon to extend the ſhadow of this mountain, as far as the iſland of Lemnos, but that they were not well acquainted with the meaſure of that extent. The diſtance would be about thirty five French leagues (4), were we to compute according to the eighty ſeven miles of Pliny. But how great a ſubſtraction muſt we make, ſince Belon ſpeaks of only a little above eight leagues? We will here quote a paſſage which will ſhew that Plutarch had committed the ſame miſtake as Pliny. I am ſenſible that neither of us has been in the iſle of Lemnos; yet both of us have frequently heard the following verſes.:

Mount Athos ſhall project its mighty ſhade,
And ſcreen the ox, in Lemnos's iſland fix'd.

For the ſhadow of this mountain reaches to the ſtatue of a brazen ox ſtanding in Lemnos, extending itſelf over the ſea no leſs than ſeven hundred ſtadia; not that the mountain which projects the ſhadow is of that height as to cauſe it; but becauſe the diſtance of the light makes the ſhadow of bodies many times greater than the bodies themſelves (5). Plutarch's 700 ſtadia make 87500 paces; he conſequently makes the interval or diſtance greater than either Pliny or Solinus. According to Apollonius, it was equal to the ſpace that a ſhip can ſail from day-break to noon. Salmaſius proves that, according to the uſual computation of the antient Geographers, this ſignifies two hundred and fifty ſtadia (6); whence we may infer, that Apollonius leſſened, by more than one half, which the other authors compleat between mount Athos and the iſland of Lemnos, and that he yet ſuppoſes it much greater than Belon found it; eight French leagues containing but one hundred and ſixty ſtadia. Note Apollonius obſerves, that the ſhadow of mount Athos extended as far as the city of Myrina.

the air, he would have been killed (12). But he himſelf ſays in Homer, that Juno precipitated him, and that Eurynome and Thetis, the daughters of Oceanus, caught him, and ſaved his life (13). He declares in another part of the Iliad (14), that Jupiter took him by the foot, and threw him out of heaven; and that having taken up a whole day in falling, he fell into the iſland of Lemnos at ſun-ſet; that he was almoſt dead, and that the inhabitants took him up. Homer, it will be objected, ſhould have been a little more careful not to contradict himſelf; but what he ſays does not imply a contradiction, he only relating two different adventures. Valerius Flaccus ſuppoſes that Vulcan fell on the ſhore of Lemnos; that the inhabitants ran the inſtant they heard his voice, and furniſhed him with every thing he wanted, ſo that he retained, from that time, a great affection for this iſland.

We will now mention a circumſtance, which ſhews the long duration of the moſt fabulous traditions. Belon who travelled in Turkey in the year 1548, ſays, " that there is no inhabitant of Lemnos but knows " ſomething relating to Vulcan. And in like manner as the little children of the iſland of Corſula " will relate the hiſtory of the Dolphin, as though it " happened but a little before; ſo every body in the " iſland of Lemnos relates the adventures of Vulcan, " but differently; for ſome ſay that he and his horſe " broke their thighs by a fall; and that he was ſpeedily cured by the virtue of the earth on which he " fell (17)."

(17) Belon, Obſervat. lib. 1. chap. 29. pag. 68.

[D] The place where he fell was remarkable for a kind of earth that was endued with great virtues, and it cured Philoctetes when bit by a ſerpent.] Philoſtratus relates an incident that differs greatly from the common tradition. He ſays that Philoctetes did not ſuffer in Lemnos the bitter pains which have been ſo much ſpoke of. This brave man, adds he (18), " was " inſtantly cured by the Lemnian earth, which is taken " from the very ſpot where Vulcan fell antiently from " heaven; for that earth has the vertue to ſooth and " heal all kinds of violent and furious diſeaſes, and to " ſtop all bloody fluxes; but it does not cure the bite " of ſerpents except that of the hydra." Here follow ſome particulars which I extract from the obſervations of Peter Belon, who travelled into that country about the middle of the ſixteenth century. " The antients, " ſays he (19), had a kind of earth that was accounted an " excellent remedy for many diſeaſes, and is at this " day as much uſed as ever. The Latins call it Terra " Lemnia, or Terra ſigillata, and the French Terre " ſellée. This earth is ſo great a rarity, that thoſe " Embaſſadors who return from Turkey, generally " bring ſome of it away, in order to make preſents of " it to perſons of high diſtinction; it being good, " among other properties, againſt the plague and " defluxions of every kind. Druggiſts indeed ſell " what is called Terra ſigillata, but it is generally " adulterated; the iſland of Lemnos being the only " country where it is to be found." He gives (20) the figure of ſeveral ſeals which are employed to mark that earth, and adds (21), " that the whole crew of " a ſhip which was come from Lemnos to Conſtanti- " nople, aſſured him, that it was impoſſible to get any " except by the Under-Baſhaw of the iſland; and that " thoſe who were deſirous of ſeeing it in its natural " ſtate muſt go thither, the inhabitants being forbid " to export any, on pain of loſing their heads. They " declared farther, that if any of the inhabitants " ſhould ſell only a ſmall cake of it, or any was found " in his houſe unknown to the Governor, he was fined " a large ſum of money; for no perſon is allowed to " diſtribute or give any except the Under-Baſhaw in " queſtion, who farms the iſland, and pays a tribute " for it to the Grand Signior." Belon got himſelf conducted to the place whence that earth is taken, and ſaw nothing but an oblique hole (22), that was ſtopped; and it was impoſſible for him to get it opened, that being done but once a year, the 6th of Auguſt, on which occaſion great ceremonies are obſerved and preparations made. " This earth, continues Belon (23), " ſhews how greatly ceremonies inhance the value of " things that are mean and inconſiderable in themſelves; for notwithſtanding that the earth in queſtion " is endued with ſuch great virtue, yet was it ſo common " that any perſon might go and procure any of it, it " would be deſpiſed, were it not for the great ceremo- " nies I ſpeak of: ſo that if any other vein of earth, " like that of Cochino, had been found in another " part of the iſland in queſtion, I do not doubt but " that the Greeks would ſcruple to uſe it, unleſs the " (*) Caloyers had been preſent at the digging it, and " performed the uſual ceremonies; and though they " had got ſome from Cochino abovementioned, they " yet would ſcruple to uſe, or give it to other people, " had it not been dug the ſixth of Auguſt: they imagining that part of its virtue proceeds from the ceremonies which are practiſed by men on thoſe occaſions; and would even think that it had no vertue, " unleſs they themſelves ſaw it dug up." Nothing can be more judicious than theſe obſervations of Belon, who gives the two examples following. " There " are great quantities of the Iris's growing on the " mountains of Macedonia, and were to be ſold at a " dear price; yet it was thought that no perſons " ſhould be allowed to gather it but ſuch as were made in the iſland of Lemnos [E], whilſt the Greeks were beſieging Troy. Some other reaſons gave riſe to the fiction I related concerning Vulcan; for it was ſaid, that in antient times ſtrong flames uſed often to iſſue from the ground in the iſland of Lemnos [F], and particularly on the ſummit of Mount Moſchylus. Two maſſacres were perpetrated in that iſland, which gave occaſion to ſome proverbs (f). The firſt of thoſe maſſacres is that which I mentioned under the article HYPSIPYLE; and this country would in a certain time have been quite depopulated, had not the Argonauts prevented it. The women had murthered all the men, and did not intend to give a reception to the firſt comers; for hearing that a veſſel was come to their iſland, they ran armed to the ſhore, fully determined to oppoſe the invaſion (g); but when they found theſe were not the

" chaſte; and that the earth muſt be ſprinkled, three " months before with holy-water, in order to pacify " it. And ſeveral other ceremonies, which Theo- " phraſtus has deſcribed, were to be practiſed (24)." He then takes ſome notice of the antient ceremonies relating to the earth of Lemnos. " As early as Dioſ- " corides, who wrote before Galen, it was a cuſtom " to mix he-goat's blood with earth, in order to make " cakes of it. The reader is to know, that ſome ce- " remonies uſed to be performed in killing the he-goats " conſecrated to Venus, who, as the fables relate, " makes the Lemnian women ſmell rank like goats; " and their huſbands having expreſt a diſguſt at them, " they all, with one common conſent, killed all the " men in that iſland. For this reaſon, the Prieſteſs " uſed to ſeal thoſe cakes with a ſeal on which was " the image of a goat, whence they took their Greek " name Sphragida ægos, which ſignifies a goat's ſeal ... " Galen being deſirous to know the truth of what " was related concerning this earth, as he returned " from Troy, called then Alexandria, a colony inha- " bited by the Romans, in his way to Rome, he paſt " by Lemnos, and enquired whether they ſtill had the " cuſtom of mixing goat's blood with earth before it " was ſealed. But he being on the very ſpot in " queſtion, in Lemnos, found that this cuſtom had " been laid aſide. He gives an account of what was " performed when he was there; and relates that a " Prieſteſs threw, here and there, ſome wheat and " barley on the ground, and practiſed certain other " ceremonies according to the cuſtom of that country; " after which ſhe filled a waggon with this earth, and " had it carried with her into the city of Hephæſtia. " Galen relates this, and much more, which we will " not relate for brevity ſake (25)." With regard to the modern ceremonies, he tells us, what had been confirmed to him by above ſix hundred men, who had ſeen them ſolemnized all their life-time. " The chief per- " ſons both Greeks and Turks, with their Prieſts and " Friars, meet together. The Greeks then go to the " little chapel called Sotira, and there ſolemnizing " Maſs, after the Grecian manner, accompanied with " prayers, they all go together accompanied by the " Turks, and aſcend the hill which is but two bow- " ſhot from the chapel; and cauſe the earth to be dug up, " by fifty or threeſcore men, till they have found out " the vein, and are come to it; and when they are " got to the earth, the Greek Monks fill ſmall bags " with it made of beaſt's ſkins, and theſe they give " to the Under-Baſhaw or Vayvod; and when they " have taken enough for that time, the diggers imme- " diately cloſe or ſhut up the earth; after which the " Under-Baſhaw ſends the greateſt part of the earth " that was taken up to the Grand Signior at Conſtan- " tinople, and ſells the reſt to Merchants ... Thoſe " who are preſent when the earth is drawn out of its " vein, may every one take a little for their reſpective " uſes, but dare not ſell it. The Turks are leſs ſcru- " pulous than the Greeks and many other nations. " They ſuffer the Greek Chriſtians to ſay their prayers " on the ſealed earth in their preſence, and they " themſelves joyn with them. And if what the oldeſt " inhabitants relate be true, the cuſtom of ſelecting " one day only in the year, was introduced at the time " that the Venetians were poſſeſſed of Lemnos, and " the iſlands of the Ægean ſea (26)." Stephen Alba- carius, whom Buſbequius ſent purpoſely into the iſland of Lemnos, in order that he might inform himſelf of all thoſe particulars, was more fortunate than Belon, he aſſiſting in the ceremonies. See the relation he wrote of it to that illuſtrious Embaſſador. See alſo the Egeo redivivo, ò ſia Chorographia dell' Achipelago of Francis Placentia, Profeſſor of Geography at Modena (27).

The Argonauts accepted of the condition, and fulfilled it in ſo delightful a manner, that one would have concluded they had laid aſide all thoughts of of fire and arms, was owing to the falling of lightning on a tree, in the iſland of Lemnos. This he ſays on ſome words of Lycophron, where the fire is called Lemnian (34). Almoſt the ſame things have been related of mount Moſychlus as of Ætna. [G] Provided they would promiſe, upon oath, to lie with them]. As this circumſtance is contrary to the decorum which Poets commonly obſerve in their relations, it will be proper for me to produce a proof for it, in the words of the original. The Greek paſſage therefore is as follows: Αἰσχύλος ἐν ὑψιπύλῃ ἐν ὅπλοις φησὶν αὐτὰς ἐπελθούσας χειμαζομένοις τοῖς Ἀργοναύταις, μέχρις οὗ ὅρκον ἔλαβον παρ' αὐτῶν ἀποβᾶσι μιγήσεσθαι αὐταῖς. Σοφοκλῆς δὲ ἐν Λημνίαις καὶ μάχην ἰσχυρὰν αὐτὰς συνάψαι φησίν (38). Theſe words ſignify, that the Lemnian women took up arms; and would not leave off threatning the Argonauts buffeted by the ſtorm, till they had ſwore that they would lie with them. Euripides even ſays, that they really fought with great vigour. This incident cannot appear probable to any but thoſe who well weigh the circumſtances; but if we conſider, on one hand, that theſe women in queſtion had deſtroyed all the males who were in the iſland; and, on the other, that they reſolved on ſuch a maſſacre, merely becauſe their huſbands, unable to bear with their ill ſmells, had got concubines (39), the thing will appear extremely probable. One cannot wonder that the Lemnian women ſhould have been ſo indiſcreetly forward in their advances, and that the Argonauts ſhould have diſcovered ſo little tenderneſs and galantry. The military dreſs and warlike air of theſe women, was far from being alluring objects. The reflexion on the maſſacre they had juſt before perpetrated on their fathers, huſbands, ſons, and brothers, was adapted to inſpire no other paſſion but horror. Beſides, the conſideration of the motive of this ſlaughter, muſt neceſſarily have proved an obſtacle to the love, with which the Argonauts might otherwiſe have been fired for them; and this motive was no other but the diſtaſte of the Lemnians, ariſing from the ill ſmell of the Lemnians, which proceeded from their breath; but ſome are of opinion, that it came from their armpits, which we commonly call, to ſmell rank; and the antients, to ſmell like a he-goat. Lactantius, on the fifth book of Statius's Thebaid, follows this opinion; he calling the ſmell of the Lemniades, hircinum oderem, a goatiſh ſmell. Dion Chryſoſtom ſays alſo to the ſame purpoſe, in his 33d oration, Λημνίων ταῖς γυναιξὶ, τὴν Ἀφροδίτην ὀργισθεῖσαν λέγουσι διαφθεῖραι τὰς μασχάλας. As he related that Venus, being exaſperated againſt the wives of the Lemnians, infected their arm-pits (40). All things duly weighed, one may eaſily perceive that the antients did not tranſgreſs the laws of veriſimilitude, in ſuppoſing that it was with reluctance, Jaſon's companions could be prevailed upon to promiſe, upon the Lemnian ſhoar, what they would have aſked for, and offered, in other places. The women who parleyed with them, deſerved to be told what was ſaid by Catullus againſt one Rufus, who was ſurprized to meet with none but cruel fair-ones.

There are ſome people who, by conſidering too attentively theſe circumſtances, will perhaps be of opinion, that the rules of probability would have been better followed, if the ſame conduct had been aſcribed to the Argonauts which Auguſtus obſerved, when Fulvia propoſing peace or war to him (43), he made choice of the latter. But it is certain that veriſimilitude has been ſufficiently obſerved in the epiſode of Lemnos; the choice the Argonauts made being the moſt natural. Their ſhip lay in the road, and was buffeted by a ſtorm; of the expedition to Colchos; but Hercules, who had remained in the ſhip, reprimanded them for giving a looſe to pleaſure in the manner they had done, and obliged them to return on board [H]. According to ſome writers, they paſſed two or three years with the women of Lemnos, and the iſland was repeopled by this means. The other maſſacre was, when all the children which the Lemnians had by their Athenian concubines were ſlain [I]. I ſhall ſpeak of this in a remark. This iſland was very much infeſted by ſtorm: they had occaſion for a port in Lemnos, and it was highly neceſſary for them to land there: but this they could not do without coming to a battle, and they had already experienced the valour of the Lemnian women; they having fought with very great bravery, and had not been conquered. It was neceſſary, either to renew the attack, or retire, or take an oath to indulge all the wanton wiſhes of the women in queſtion. To retreat would be ignominious, whether before the deciſion of a ſecond battle; or, after freſh attempts as unſucceſsful as the former. Could any ſucceſs be hoped for (would all Greece ſay) from the expedition of Colchos ſince our Heroes have fallen in the iſland of Lemnos, where they were repulſed by ſilly women, and obliged to fly? The ſtorm defeated all their hopes with regard to ſucceſs, in caſe of a new battle. The only thing that remained then was, to ſubmit to the neceſſity of the oath which was required. And perhaps they imagined that the cauſe of the occaſion of the Lemnians was over, or in a great meaſure abated; and that, whatever might happen, they might ſoon be able to free themſelves from the ungrateful yoke, ſince nothing particular was enjoyned them, either as to time or other circumſtances. Such might be the conſiderations which obliged them to take an oath; and we are not to believe that they once thought of equivocations or mental reſervations, or the right or privilege which diſpenſes thoſe perſons from the obſervance of on oath, extorted by force, and metu cadente in conſtantem virum. The reader will find, by the following remark, that they were very true to their promiſe.

[H] Hercules, who had remained in the ſhip, reprimanded them, . . . and obliged them to return on board.] One may juſtly wonder that Hercules, loving the fair ſo paſſionatlely as he did, ſhould not have diverted himſelf, in the iſle of Lemnos, after the ſame manner as his companions; for altho' the Lemnian women, for the reaſons already mentioned, could not be very temping, yet one ſees no reaſon why he ſhould be more delicate than the reſt of the Greeks who were with him. It will be anſwered, that the oath they required carried ſome ſuſpicion along with it; and that ſince they did not look upon a bare promiſe as a ſufficient tye, he concluded that they muſt be extremely diffident of the power of their charms; that here was ſomething concealed; and that it was not worth their while to go on ſhore. But once again, how came Hercules, (than whom no one could be more luſtful) to be more ſcrupulous than his companions? I will own that I know not how to anſwer this difficulty, and muſt therefore take up with the bare matter of fact. Apollonius declares, " that Hercules could never be prevailed up-
" on to go aſhore on the Iſland, but kept con-
" ſtantly on board the ſhip Argo, that he might have " a juſt title to cenſure his companions, who gave " too great a looſe in the pleaſures they took with
" the Lemnian women, and laid aſide all thoughts of " their enterprize; which he did with ſo much the " greater freedom, as he himſelf was not liable to
" the cenſure in queſtion (44)." According to Valerius Flaccus, our young heroes were ſo entirely devoted to the adminiſtring conſolation to theſe Lemnian widows, that they thought no more of returning on board their ſhip. They quite forget themſelves in the iſland; they are delighted with the game; Hercules muſt be obliged to drag them thence by dint of reproaches; and to addreſs himſelf, in very ſevere terms, to Jaſon, the Chieftain of the enterprize.

I obſerved elſewhere (46), that the beſt prize fell to Jaſon's ſhare; the Queen of the iſland falling in love with him, and indulging him the fondeſt marks of her tenderneſs and paſſion. The remonſtrances of Hercules awakened the heroes; they returned on board, without once regarding the plaints and lamentations of the Lemnian women (47). Ovid (48) ſuppoſes that they continued two years with them; but Apollonius informs us that they made a much ſhorter ſtay, which ſeems more probable; for had they ſpent two years in thoſe delights, there had been no need of ſounding Orpheus's Lyre to draw them thence; that lyre whoſe power was ſo great, that even ſtones obeyed its harmony (49). Now it was neceſſary to have recourſe to the machine; for otherwiſe they could never have tore themſelves from the Lemnian women.

tadel of Athens. They were so laborious in cultivating the country which was given them, that the soil which before was extremely ungrateful, was by them rendered extremely fruitful, for which reason the Athenians drove them from it. This is the only reason that Hecatæus the historian assigns for it; but they themselves would not own this injustice. They asserted that their children of both sexes (55) going to fetch water from the nine fountains, had met with very ignominious treatment from the Pelasgi, who, not contented with that insult, prepared to make an inroad, and were convicted of it. The Athenians asserted, that it was at their option to put them to death; and that they had shewn a great deal of clemency, in only driving them out of the country. The Pelasgi withdrew to different places, and particularly to the isle of Lemnos. They sought for opportunities to revenge themselves; and knowing the times on which the Athenians solemnized their festivals, they lay in ambush for those Athenian women, who were celebrating the festival of Diana in Brauron, and carried off a great number whom they made their concubines. They had a great many children by them, and taught them the language and manners of the Athenians. These children grew proud, and disdained to associate with those who were born of Lemnian mothers; and if any among them happened to fight with a child, who was a Pelasgian both by father and mother, they all ran to his assistance, and affected a superiority in every respect. The Pelasgi observing this, concluded that as these bastards might, from their infancy, unite together against legitimate children, and pretend to command over them, they would one day grow very formidable: they therefore put them all to death, and afterwards killed their Athenian concubines. This was followed by a remarkable sterility, which extended itself to their wives, their fields and their flocks. They then applied themselves to the oracle for some relief, when Apollo commanded them, to make the Athenians all the satisfaction that should be demanded. They went to Athens, and declared that this was their intention; but when a country was demanded of them, resembling a table that was spread in the Prytaneum, and covered with dainties of every kind, they replied, we will comply, when a ship shall come, in twenty four hours, from your country to ours, by a north wind. These imagined they had not bound themselves by any promise, considering the situation of Athens with respect to Lemnos. Miltiades, several years after, seized upon the Thracian Chersonesus, whence he set sail towards Lemnos; and declared to the inhabitants, that the condition contained in their promise was fulfilled, and consequently that they must quit the country. The Hephæstians obeyed, but the Myrinians made a resistance, alledging that the Chersonesus was not Attica; but Miltiades besieged them, and forced them to surrender; this is what we are told by Herodotus (56). This relation is not exactly like, in all respects, to that of Cornelius Nepos, with regard to the conquest of the island of Lemnos; for this last historian (57) supposes that Miltiades, before he subdued the Chersonesus, directed himself to the Lemnians, to summon them to retire voluntarily elsewhere, and that they made him the abovementioned answer; that having conquered the Chersonesus, he returned to Lemnos, and demanded the performance of what had been stipulated; and that the Lemnians not having dared to resist, gave up the island to him. Cornelius Nepos calls them Carians, and not Pelasgi. It appears from several passages of Thucydides, that the inhabitants of Lemnos sided with the Athenians during the Peloponnesian war. They at that time spoke the same language, and governed by the same laws as the Athenians (58).

(55) Herodotus observes, that neither the Athenians, nor the rest of the Greeks had slaves in those days.

Note, Herodotus observes, that the Greeks gave the name, Lemnian action, to a heinous crime, because of the massacre of the Athenian concubines &c. and the barbarity with which the Lemnian women had dispatched their husbands, without even sparing King Thoas. This is the true sense of the words of this historian; and it is without reason that a learned Critic finds some faults in them (59). Verba Herodoti, ubi de Thoante sermo est, omnino mendosa sunt. Ἐνταῦθα ἔδοξέ σφισι κλείνειν τὰς παῖδας σὺς ἐκ τῶν Ατλικέων γυναικῶν. Ἀπὸ τύτυ δὲ τῦ ἔργυ καὶ τῦ προλέγυ τύτυ τὸ ἐργάσανλο αἱ γυναῖκες, τὰς ἅμα Θόανλι ἄνδρας σφελέας ἀποκλείναται, νενόμισαι ἀνὰ τὴν ἑλλάδα τὰ σχέτλια ἔργα πάνλα Λήμνια καθέεσθαι (60). Nemo enim de Thoante hoc tradidit. Igitur duæ voces, ἅμα Θόανλι, aut glossemata sunt, aut corrupta est prior, & legendum: παρὰ Θόανλ☉. Barthius does not express his idea very clearly; for we do not know what he means by these words, Nemo de Thoante hoc tradidit. Does he mean, that no author has related that the Lemnian women, favoured or assisted by Thoas, dispatched their husbands? But this is not Herodotus's meaning. Does he mean that all authors are agreed, that Thoas was not killed; and therefore that there is an error in the passage of Herodotus, if it be pretended that Thoas is here included in the number of the Lemnians who were killed by the women? In that case he is mistaken; since some authors say, that the women having discovered that Hypsipyle had not killed her father Thoas, they made so narrow a search after her, that they found her, and put her to death (61).

(59) Barth. in Statium Theb. lib. 5. ver. 328. pag. 167. tom. 3.

Erasmus has committed some errors, in epitomizing Herodotus's relation. He says (62), in the first place, that the Lemnians carried off the Athenian women, during the celebration of a festival of Minerva at Brauron. He should have said Diana, and not Minerva. He adds, in the second place, that the Athenian concubines would not suffer their sons to marry the legitimate daughters of the Lemnians. Now Herodotus does not say this, but supposes that those bastards were killed before they had attained a marriageable age. Erasmus's third error is, his asserting that, after this massacre, the Lemnians were affected with barrenness, pestilence, and many other evils. Herodotus mentions only the barrenness of the earth, and that of women Πιεζόμενοι δὲ λιμῷ τε καὶ ἀπαιδίῃ. Pariter fame & liberorum orbitate vexati (63). Fourthly; Erasmus charges him most falsely with saying, that these evils partly gave rise to the proverb Lemnia mala. Fifthly; that the other circumstance which gave rise to this proverb was, that the Lemnian women, unable to bear the stench of their husbands, murthered them all, being assisted by Thoas. It is true indeed that Herodotus vouches occasionally, as one of the reasons of the proverb, the slaughter which the Lemnian women made; but he does not say that their husbands stunk; and affirms that Thoas met with the same unhappy fate as the rest. Benedict, in his paraphrase of Pindar, is grosly mistaken; for, instead of saying that the Lemnians were incommoded with the stench of their wives, he affirms that the latter were incommoded with the stench of their husbands. Quinetiam in Lemnium venerunt (Argonautæ) .. & cum Lemniadibus mulieribus, quæ maritos omnes eorum graveolentia offensæ occiderant, rem habuerunt (64). This error has not been corrected in the edition of Pindar, printed at Oxford in 1698. The Scholiast, from whom Benedict had taken a passage (65), not long before, might have kept him from falling into Erasmus's snare. Moreri falls into it headlong, though he did not copy all the errors of that learned man; and indeed he has only taken a very small number of incidents which he met with in his Adages. The Pelasgi, says he (66), carried off the Athenian women, and had children by them whom they afterwards killed, observing they had inclinations contrary to theirs. And they killed their husbands by the assistance of Thoas. It is plain to every one, that this is assigning in too indefinite and too unlikely a manner, the motive which prompted the Lemnians to murder their husbands. It is likewise plainly telling us, that the action of these women was after the massacre of the bastards; as extravagant a falsity as the pretended assistance of Thoas.

Bacchus and Diana were there had in great veneration; but not Venus [L], who, on the other hand, did not love that country. She had received a ſignal affront there, it being in the iſland of Lemnos that Vulcan expoſed her linked with the God Mars (b); and gave all the Gods a ſight of her, as catched in the amorous act; however Homer is not of that opinion; he ſuppoſing heaven to be the ſcene of this adventure (i). The Perſians took this iſland in the reign of Darius ſon of Hyſtaſpes, and placed a Governor over it who treated the people with great inhumanity (k). It was ſubdued long after by Miltiades (l), on which occaſion Herodotus tells us an incident which cannot be made to agree with that of Plutarch [M]. I will alſo quote Plutarch, though he differs from Pliny, with reſpect to the kind of bird which the Lemnians worſhipped. [L] Bacchus and Diana were there had in great veneration, but not Venus.] Thoas King of Lemnos, was the ſon of Bacchus and Ariadne (70); and therefore it is no wonder that the worſhip of Bacchus ſhould be well eſtabliſhed in this iſland. It was in the temple of this God that Hypſipyle concealed her father, the night of the maſſacre (71). Strabo informs us, that the myſteries of Samothrace and thoſe of Lemnos reſemble the ceremonies obſerved by the Bacchantes (72). Farther, this iſle was ſo fruitful in wine, that this circumſtance alone might make it be conſidered as a country conſecrated to the God in queſtion. Quintus Calaber calls it ἀμπελόεσσαν, abounding in wines (73), and travellers relate, that it very juſtly deſerves this epithet to this day (74). With reſpect to the worſhip of Diana, I ſhall content myſelf with pointing out the place where Plutarch relates that the Lemnians, being drove from their iſland, carried with them wherever they went the image or ſtatue of Diana, which they had carried off from Brauron (75). I likewiſe will obſerve that they ſtamped the figure of this Goddeſs on their Terra ſigillata. See Salmaſius in his Exercitationes Plinianæ in Solinum, pag. 1156. All authors; who mention the brutal fury with which the Lemnian women were fired againſt their huſbands, obſerve, that the ſtench which made them ſo diſtaſteful, was owing to Venus's anger, at her being ſo much neglected and deſpiſed in that iſland! See Apollodorus (76), Hyginus (77), the Scholiaſt on Apollonius (78), &c. Barthius has committed another error. He is of opinion that the Lemnians, in proceſs of time, conſecrated an image of Venus, which was one of the moſt perfect ſtatues of antiquity. Venerem etiam Lemniam, ſays he (79), inter pulcherrima ſimulacra cultam poſtea, diſcimus ex Luciani Imaginibus. Item Lemniam Minervam, à Lemniis dedicatam, quod omnium fuerit Phidiæ operum elaboratiſſimum, Pauſaniæ Atticis. i. e. "Lucian's images inform us, that the "Venus of Lemnos was afterwards adored among the "moſt beautiful ſtatues: we learn alſo from Pauſanias's "Atticks, that the inhabitants of Lemnos dedicated a "Lemnian Minerva, which was the moſt elaborate "of all Phidias's works." He has reaſon to ſay that the Minerva, which was Phidias's maſter-piece, was dedicated by the Lemnians. Pauſanias affirms that it was therefore ſirnamed the Lemnian. See the 28th chapter of his firſt book: but Barthius is in the wrong to diſtinguiſh it from the image mentioned by Lucian, and pretend that Lucian ſpoke of a Lemnian Venus. He has mentioned the Minerva of that name. This cannot be doubted, when we take notice of the remark he has made, viz. that it was the moſt excellent work Phidias ever made, and to which he ſet his name (80).

[M] Herodotus tells us an incident, which cannot be made to agree with that of Plutarch.] This laſt mentioned author relates, that the Tyrrhenians having ſeized on the iſlands of Lemnos, and of Imbros, carried off the Athenian women from Brauron, and had children by them. This race was drove from thoſe iſlands by the Athenians, who looked upon them as half barbarous. The race or people in queſtion failed towards Peloponneſus, and went aſhore at Tenarus, where they did good ſervices to the Lacedemonians, in the war againſt the Heilotes, for which they were rewarded with their freedom, and liberty to marry into the Lacedemonian families; but not the privilege of ſerving publick offices, or being admitted into the council. This excluſion made the people in queſtion be ſuſpected of deſigning to embroil the ſtate; upon which their perſons were ſecured, and they were confined cloſe priſoners, till ſuch time as proofs ſhould be got to prove them guilty of the plot. Now their wives having obtained leave to viſit them, changed clothes with their huſbands, by which means they got out of confinement, and left the wives in their room. Having poſſeſſed themſelves of mount Taygetus, they joined the Heilotes, and became ſo formidable to the Lacedemonians, that it was thought proper to capitulate with them. Their wives were reſtored to them, they were furniſhed with money and ſhips; and a promiſe made, that they ſhould be acknowledged as relations, and as a colony of Spartans, wherever they might ſettle. They accepted of theſe conditions, and part of them went and ſettled at Melos, and the reſt in Crete. The latter, after fighting ſeveral battles, poſſeſſed themſelves of Lyctus, with ſome other cities; and thence the inhabitants of Lyctus pretended, that they, by the mother's ſide, were related to the Athenians; and looked upon themſelves as a Lacedemonian colony (81). This is Plutarch's relation. Thoſe whom he calls Tyrrhenians, and a little lower Pelaſgi, are the ſame people as thoſe whom Herodotus calls Pelaſgi. Theſe two names belong to the ſame people (82); and we are not to imagine, that thoſe authors who have ſaid, that the iſle of Lemnos was inhabited by the Tyrrhenians (83), differ from thoſe who ſay it was poſſeſſed by the Pelaſgi. Hitherto then there is no difference between Herodotus and Plutarch; but when the latter affirms, that the poſterity of the Athenian women, carried off from Brauron by the Tyrrhenians, who had ſettled in the iſlands of Lemnos and Imbros; that this poſterity, I ſay, were drove from thoſe iſlands by the Athenians, he does not agree with Herodotus, who aſſerts, that the Lemnians themſelves killed all the children which thoſe Athenian women brought them. Theſe two hiſtorians differ greatly with reſpect to the æra; one of them (84) declares that Miltiades drove out the Lemnians; and the other makes this expulſion to be of much more remote antiquity, or at leaſt confounds what he ought to have ſeparated. The hiſtory of theſe women, who procured liberty to their huſbands, relates, in Herodotus, to a period that is much earlier than Miltiades, and has not the circumſtances obſerved by Plutarch.

Moreri (o) cites him as an author who ſpeaks pretty circumſtantially of it. Lemnos is now called Stalimene. The Turks beſieged it in 1475, but were forced to raiſe the ſiege. It was on this occaſion that a maiden named Marulla (p) diſplayed her great courage; a circumſtance which Moreri has mentioned (q), but he falſely ſuppoſes that ſhe lived in the fourteenth Century. He adds (r) that Mahomet II diſpoſſeſſed the Venetians of that iſland; but this is not expreſſing himſelf with accuracy, ſince he became maſter of it only by a treaty of peace in the year 1478 (s). The Venetians reconquered it in the year 1656; and the Turks recovered it the ſucceeding year, after a long ſiege. I forgot to mention the flower called Lychnis. See the margin.

nauts, were drove from that iſland by the Pelaſgi who carried off the Athenian women from Brauron. They retired to the country of the Lacedemonians, and informed them, that they were the deſcendants of the Argonauts; and that having been drove from their country, they returned to their anceſtors, and deſired leave to live with them. The Lacedemonians calling to mind that Caſtor and Pollux had ſhared in Jaſon's expedition indulged a very gracious reception to theſe fugitives; gave them lands, and incorporated them into their tribes. Theſe refugees married other wives, after yielding to other men thoſe whom they had brought from the iſle of Lemnos. They ſoon grew proud; would govern others, and commit very heinous actions, upon which they were caſt into priſon; and a reſolution was taken to put them to death, but their wives ſaved them, by changing their clothes in the manner abovementioned. The deſign was ſtill continued of putting them to death; but Theras, who was preparing to found a colony, interceded for them; and promiſed to take them along with him, and by that means prevent all fears of further dangers from them. His requeſt was granted; moſt of theſe people diſperſed themſelves; and the reſt followed Theras, who founded a colony in the iſland which went by his name (86). It is to be obſerved that he had been preceptor to Euriſthenes and Procles, the ſons of Ariſtodemus, one of the chiefs of the Heraclidæ, who returned to Peloponneſus (87); and conclude from thence, that he flouriſhed ſix hundred years, or thereabouts, before Miltiades. It is alſo to be remarked that the Scholiaſt on Pindar (88) relates the incident very near the ſame as Herodotus; and that both obſerve that Battus ſprung from one of the Lemnians of Theras's colony, founded the city of Cyrene.

It would be unjuſt for any perſon to aſſert that this is foreign to my ſubject. Two reaſons would refute this reproach; firſt, becauſe, as a critick, I am bound to ſhew the variations between Herodotus and Plutarch; and ſecondly, as an hiſtorian, I am obliged to collect the adventures of the inhabitants of the iſland of Lemnos.

☞LENFANT (JAMES), a learned French writer in the eighteenth Century, was born at Bazoches in Beauſſe April the 13th 1661. He was ſon of Paul Lenfant, Miniſter at Chatillon ſur Loin, who died at Marbourg in June 1686, by Anne Dergnouſt of Preſſinville, who died at Berlin December the 6th 1692. Our author ſtudied Divinity at Saumur, where he lodged at the houſe of James Cappel, Profeſſor of Hebrew, by whom he was always highly eſteemed; and afterwards went to Geneva to continue his ſtudies there. He left that city towards the end of the year 1683, and went to Heidelberg, where he received impoſition of hands for the Miniſtry in Auguſt 1684. He diſcharged the duties of his function there with great reputation, as Chaplain of the Electreſs Dowager of Palatine, and Paſtor in ordinary to the French Church. The deſcent of the French into the Palatinate obliged Mr. Lenfant to depart from Heidelberg in 1688. Two letters which he had written againſt the Jeſuits, and which are inſerted at the end of his Preſervatif, would not permit him to continue at the mercy of a ſociety, whoſe generoſity is not very remarkable. He left the Palatinate therefore in October 1688 with the conſent of his Church and Superiors, and arrived at Berlin in November following. Though the French Church of Berlin had already a ſufficient number of Miniſters, the Elector Frederick, afterwards King of Pruſſia, appointed Mr. Lenfant one of them, who begun his functions there on Eaſter-day March the 21ſt 1689, and continued them in that Church thirty nine years and four months, diſtinguiſhing himſelf to great advantage by his writings [A]. In 1705 he married Emilia Gourgeaud de Venours, a young Lady of a good family in Poitou; but had no children by her. His merit was ſo

II. Lettres choiſies de St. Cyprien. Amſterdam 1688 in 8vo. It is a Latin tranſlation of Father Malebranche's Recherche de la Verité. It appears from a letter of Mr. Lenfant to Mr. du Sauzet publiſhed in the Nouvelles Litteraires of February 15, 1716, that this Tranſlation was finiſhed in 1683; but that it was not printed till 1691 on account of ſome diſorder, which happened in the affairs of the Bookſeller, who had undertaken the impreſſion. He was Preacher to the late Queen of Pruſſia, Charlotta Sophia, who was eminent for her admirable ſenſe and extenſive knowledge. After her death he became Chaplain to the late King of Pruſſia. He was Counſellor of the Superior Conſiſtory, and Member of the French Council, which were formed to direct the general affairs of that Nation. In 1710 he was choſen a Member of the Society for propagating the Goſpel eſtabliſhed in England; and March the 2d 1724 was elected Member of the Academy of Sciences at Berlin. In 1707 he took a journey to Holland and England, where he had the honour to preach before Queen Anne; and if he had thought proper to leave his Church at Berlin, for which he had a great reſpect, he might have had a ſettlement at London with the title of Chaplain to her Majeſty. In 1712 he took a journey to Helmſtad, in 1715 to Leipſick, and in 1725 to Breſlaw. His deſign was to ſearch for rare books and manuſcripts neceſſary for the compiling the hiſtories which he was writing. He was honoured with ſeveral from the Electreſs of Brunſwic-Lunebourg Princeſs Palatine; the Princeſs of Wales, now Queen of Great Britain; the Count de Fleming; Monſieur Dagueſſeau,

A new edition reviſed, corrected, and conſiderably enlarged, was printed at Amſterdam 1728 in two volumes in 4to. Father Niceron tells us (1), "that there are few Hiſtories written ſo exactly and judiciouſly as this; and "though compiled by a Proteſtant, it does not ſhew "the leaſt ſign of partiality." Biſhop Burnet in the preface to his third volume of the Hiſtory of the Reformation gives the following character of it. "There "is another Hiſtory written in French, and which, I "hope, is ſoon to appear in our own language, which "I cannot recommend more than it deſerves. It is "Mr. Lenfant's Hiſtory of the Council of Conſtance, in "which that excellent perſon has with great care, and "a ſincerity liable to no exception, given the world "ſo true a view of the ſtate of the Church and of "Religion, in the age before the Reformation, that I "know no book ſo proper to prepare a man for read-"ing the Hiſtory of the Reformation, as the attentive "peruſal of that noble work. He was indeed well "furniſhed with a collection of excellent materials, "gathered with great fidelity and induſtry by the "learned Dr. Vander Hart, Profeſſor of Divinity in "the Univerſity of Helmſtadt, and procured for him "by the noble zeal and princely bounty of that moſt "ſerene and pious Prince Rodolph Auguſt, the late "Duke of Brunſwic-Wolfembuttle, who ſet himſelf "with great care, and at a vaſt charge to procure from "all places the copies of all papers and manuſcripts, "that could be found, to give light to the proceed-"ings of that great aſſembly. That collection a-"mounted to ſix volumes in folio. From theſe "authentic vouchers the Hiſtory of that Council is now "happily compiled. And if that learned author can "find materials to give us as full and as clear a "Hiſtory of the Council of Baſil, as he has given of "that Conſtance, I know no greater ſervice can be "done to the world. For by it Popery will appear "in its true and native colours, free from thoſe pal-"liating diſguiſes, which the progreſs of the Refor-"mation, and the light, which by that has been "given the world, has forced upon thoſe of that com-"munion. We have the celebrated Hiſtory of the "Council of Trent written with a true ſublimity of "judgment and an unbiaſſed ſincerity. But how well "and how juſtly ſoever the Hiſtory, which Father "Paul gave the world of that Council, is eſteemed, I "am not afraid to compare the late Hiſtory of the Coun-"cil of Conſtance even to that admired work, ſo far at "leaſt, as that if it will not be allowed to be quite "equal to it, yet it may be well reckoned among the "beſt of all that have written after that noble pattern, "which the famous Venetian Friar has given to all "the writers of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory." It was tranſlated into Engliſh by Mr. Stephen Whatley, and printed at London 1730 in 4to. He haſtened the finiſhing it as much as poſſible, and as if he had foreſeen his approaching death. He had reviſed the copy of the firſt volume, and was actually reading over that of the ſecond, when he was ſeized with the apoplexy. If he had not been prevented by this, he would have continued his Hiſtory to about the year 1460, whereas it concludes with the beginning of the year 1454. To this Hiſtory is added Monſieur Beauſobre's Diſſertation upon the Adamites of Bohemia. XXXIII. He left behind him remarks on ſeveral works, and ſome tracts.

Dagueſſeau, Chancellor of France; and a great number of learned men, both Proteſtants and Papiſts, among the latter of whom was the Abbé Bignon. It is not certain whether it was he, who firſt formed the deſign of the Bibliotheque Germanique, which began in 1720; or whether it was ſuggeſted to him by one of the ſociety of learned men, which took the name of Anonymous. They ordinarily met at his houſe. When the King of Poland was at Berlin, in the end of May and beginning of June 1728, Mr. Lenfant dreamt, that he was ordered to preach. He excuſed himſelf that he was not prepared; and not knowing what ſubject he ſhould pitch upon, was directed to preach upon theſe words, Iſaiah xxxviii. 1. Set thine houſe in order, for thou ſhalt die, and not live. He related this dream to ſome of his friends, but ſaid nothing of it to his wife for fear of alarming her. It is not known whether this dream made any impreſſion on him; for he was not at all credulous or ſuperſtitious; but it is certain, that he made the utmoſt haſte to finiſh his Hiſtory of the war of the Huſſites and the Council of Baſil. On Sunday July the 25th following he had preached in his turn at his Church upon Matth. vii. 24, 25. but on Thurſday following, which was the 29th of the ſame month, he was ſurprized with a ſlight attack of the palſy; but on the 4th of Auguſt he was ſeized with a more violent fit of that diſtemper, of which he died on the 7th of that month, aged ſixty ſeven years, four months, and ſix days. His body was interred at Berlin Auguſt the 9th at the foot of the pulpit of the French Church, called Werder-Church, from the quarter, where it is ſituated, in which Church our author ordinarily preached ſince the year 1715, when his Pruſſian Majeſty appointed particular Miniſters to every Church, whereas before they were all ſerved by the ſame Miniſters in their turns. His ſtature was a little below the common height. His eye was very lively and penetrating. He did not talk much, but always extremely well. Whenever any diſpute aroſe in converſation he ſpoke without any heat; a proper and delicate irony was the only weapon he made uſe of on ſuch occaſions. He loved company, and paſſed but few days without ſeeing ſome of his friends. But his writings loſt nothing by this. He returned to his labour with new vigour, and never wrote better than when he had been enlivened with an agreeable converſation. He was a ſincere friend, and an enemy to no man. He was remarkable for a diſintereſted and generous diſpoſition. He had the reputation of an excellent Preacher, and was really ſo. His voice was good; his pronunciation diſtinct and varied; his ſtyle clear, grave, and elegant without affectation; and he entered into the true ſenſe of a text with great force (a).

(a) See the Memoire Hiſtorique de la Vie, de la Mort, & des Ouvrages de Mr. Lenfant, printed in the Biblioth. Germanique, tom. 16. pag. 115. and prefixed to his Hiſtoire de la Guerre des Huſſites & du Concile de Baſle, edit. Utrecht 1731, in 4to.

LENTULUS (SCIPIO) was a Neapolitan, who quitted the Church of Rome, and embraced the Proteſtant Religion in the ſixteenth Century. He was Miniſter at Chiavenne in the country of the Griſons; and employed his pen in defending an edict which the Griſon Leagues publiſhed in 1570 againſt the Sectariſts (a) [A]. Theſe did not fail to attack this edict, with thoſe arguments for toleration, which the Proteſtants themſelves alledged againſt Roman Catholics, in countries where perſecution was practiſed; but our Lentulus anſwered thoſe arguments. He compoſed an Italian Grammar that was printed in Geneva in the year 1568 (b).

[A] He . . employed his pen in defending an edict . . . againſt the Sectariſts.] In the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque, this work of Lentulus is mentioned as a book which was not yet printed. Ejuſdem liber de jure Magiſtratuum in puniendis hæreticis, quo Sylvii cujuſdam Epiſtolam hæreticis patrocinantem refutat nondum editus. This is found in page 744 of that epitome, Zurich edition 1583. In fine, the work was printed at Geneva by John le Preux anno 1592 in 8vo. The title of it is this: Reſponſio orthodoxa pro Edicto Illuſtriſſimorum D. D. trium fœderum Rhetiæ adverſus hæreticos, & alios Eccleſiarum Rheticarum perturbatores promulgato; in qua de Magiſtratus authoritate & officio in coercendis hæreticis, ex verbo Dei diſputatur. I know ſome people, who having read in the catalogue of the Bodleian library, that Lentulus's apology for the edict of the Griſon leagues was printed in 1502, racked their imaginations to find out what this ſect could be, which occaſioned the enacting of this league among the Griſons, in the beginning of the XVI century. A great number of books were turned over; and even perſons were conſulted who had fine libraries, and who ſtarted a thouſand conjectures. At laſt, the true date of the edition of the apology was diſcovered; and a freſh inſtance was given of the confuſion, into which the errors of the preſs throw authors on a thouſand occaſions. Voetius obſerves, that the ſectariſts, condemned by the edict of the Griſon leagues were Arians, or worſe than Arians; and that Lentulus gave the particulars of their blaſphemous Tenets in his preface (1). He likewiſe obſerves (2), that Lentulus's orthodox anſwer pro Edicto &c. refuted the complaints, which an anonymous author had publiſhed in 1570 againſt the edict of the Griſons, and that it was publiſhed in 1573. This differs widely from what is found in the epitome of Geſner.

Poſſevinus, but a few months before, had been made a Jeſuit at twenty ſix years of age (3); and I therefore do not wonder that this title ſhould not be given him, by the hiſtorian who furniſhes me with the following paſſage. The Pope having ſignified to the Duke of Savoy, that it would be neceſſary to employ force, in order to convert the hereticks of the valleys of Piedmont, it was reſolved, in his Highneſs's council, to comply with the Pope's advice; but that, to keep up ſome ſhew of a regularity in proceeding, ſome perſon, who was well qualified to point out, and convince the people in queſtion of their errors, ſhould be ſent into the vallies; and that they ſhould proceed to ſuch meaſures as were needful, according to the ſucceſs which this perſon ſhould meet with; and, for the affair in queſtion, they made choice of Anthony Pouſſevin, commander of St. Anthony de Foſſano (4), a man of great reputation among them, but whoſe actions ſhewed he was not the man they took him him for. His highneſs gave him his letters patents, dated the ſeventh of July, which declared him as ſent to eſtabliſh preachers of the Chriſtian Doctrine in his dominions; and particularly in his vallies of Piedmont, with proviſions neceſſary for their maintenance. Commanding, for this end, all perſons bearing eccleſiaſtical or civil offices; all ſyndicks, communities, and in general all his ſubjects, to afford him all the aſſiſtance neceſſary for the execution of the ſaid commiſſion (5). This man having ſet out from Nice, where his Highneſs was, went directly to Cavour .... and having aſſembled the people in the chief Church of the town, he went up into the pulpit; read the Letters of his commiſſion, by way of text; explained them by enlarging and exaggerating on what he intended to do in the neighbouring vallies, viz. to convince and confound the miniſters; to drive them away; to ſet up in their room perſons who ſhould preach up the Pope; to prove that the maſs was good, to oblige all the inhabitants of thoſe vallies to go to it; and to denounce extirpation with reſpect to all thoſe who ſhould refuſe obedience to his commands (6). He went and did the ſame in Bubiano in the valley of Luſerne, and in Luſerne the capital of the valley, ... and commanded the leaders of the Proteſtants to attend him, the 26th of July. He came into the aſſembly, together with a great number of the nobility, magiſtrates, and other principal men of the religion he profeſſed, when he laid before them the reaſons of his coming, and cauſed the letters of his commiſſion to be read; he afterwards cauſed to be read the letters and petitions which the Proteſtants had writ to his royal Highneſs, and his council, which he had brought back with him, and demanded of them, Whether they owned the ſending of ſuch pieces or writings, and whether they would obſerve what they had promiſed in them. They anſwered yes (7). He then offered ſome reaſons to prove the maſs; when the proteſtant Miniſters having propoſed their difficulties to him, "he "broke with the utmoſt fury into exclamations and "abuſive language; at which the perſons who accompanied him ſeemed very much grieved and aſhamed, "to ſee that a man of ſo much reputation among "them, had not been able to produce one ſingle reaſon in defence of their religion; nor any thing to "point out, to the other party, their errors; and beſides, had behaved in ſo immoderate and abuſive a "manner. Coming a little to himſelf he ſaid, that "he was not come to diſpute with the proteſtant clergymen, but to drive them away, and ſettle other preachers in their room, purſuant to the commiſſion he had received for that purpoſe; and without hearing any "thing, or making the leaſt anſwer, he commanded "Mr. Anthony Malingre, Notary of Bagnol, to draw "up in form his command to the Syndicks of the "ſeveral communities; and in their perſons, to all the "other inhabitants of the ſaid places reſpectively, to "drive away all the Lutheran Miniſters who preached "there, without hearing them any more either in public or private; and farther, to receive and hear the "preachers he ſhould ſettle among them, as ſoon as "the Proteſtant Miniſters ſhould be gone away; and "to provide them with proper dwellings and maintenance, under the penalties contained in his Highneſs's edicts; ordering them to report to him the "reſult of their deliberation in three days (8)." The Syndicks gave in their anſwer, to which he replied, "the fifth of Auguſt, by a long letter, informing them, "that his commiſſion implied a tacit authority to drive "away the Proteſtant Miniſters, ſince he was commanded to ſettle other preachers, which it would not be "poſſible for him to do, ſo long as the Proteſtant Miniſters ſhould be there, who would be for ever contradicting what his preachers ſhould ſay and do. This letter "was filled with ſtrong exhortations to the Proteſtants, "to go over to the Church of Rome; with many promiſes to thoſe perſons who ſhould do this ſpontaneouſly, and without conſtraint. He ſubjoined to this letter another writing, by which he endeavoured to repair "part of the breach he had made in his reputation, "in the aſſembly of the 27th of July; for he had collected ſome few paſſages of the holy Scriptures, and "a few more from the Doctors of the antient Church "to prove ſome parts of the Maſs, and likewiſe the "practice of celibacy among the Clergy. But Scipio Lentulus, a Neapolitan, Paſtor of St. John's "Church, wrote a learned anſwer to him, which was "printed a little after; and wherein he ſhews how "greatly Pouſſevin was miſtaken in the arguments "produced by him; and how widely the new Romiſh "Church had deviated, in ſuch things, from the right "way (9).

No one ought to be ſurprized, upon pretence that Lentulus himſelf had been formerly perſecuted, at his writing an apology for the edict which the Griſons had publiſhed againſt the Heretics; nothing being more common than to hear perſons who fled for the ſake of Religion, ſounding the alarm againſt Sectariſts.

"The moſt reverend Pouſſevin (the greateſt men of "his party beſtow this honourable title on him) perceiving that he could not repair the breaches made "in his reputation, any more by his writings than "his harangues; directing himſelf to thoſe who were "able to anſwer him, quite left them, and went "and wreaked his indignation on ſuch of the poor "faithful (Proteſtants) as were ſcattered and diſperſed "among the Papiſts in the loweſt part of the vallies, "and particularly in Campillon and Fenil." He impriſoned the perſons, and plundered the effects of the ſaid ſcattered Proteſtants... The greateſt part of them fled, but ſuch as were ſeized, met with ill treatment. Some, through infirmity, abjured the Proteſtant religion in the Church of Campillon, the 5th of Auguſt, in preſence of all the aforeſaid perſons, who cauſed inſtruments thereon to be drawn up with great ſolemnity; they then ſet them at liberty, and reſtored to them their plundered poſſeſſions; however, the greateſt part of them returned afterwards in the right way (10).... The greateſt part of Auguſt was ſpent in theſe exactions ... Pouſſevin returned to the Duke's Court the beginning of September; and prevailed ſo far, by his odious and ſlanderous reports, that the reſolution was confirmed, of proceeding againſt the Proteſtants of the vallies by force of arms (11). A ſtrange way this of converting hereticks!

LEO I, ſurnamed the Great, aſcended the pontifical throne the 10th of May 440. He was a man of very great abilities; was very eloquent, courageous, and well ſkilled in affairs. He did not want for opportunities of diſplaying his exalted talents; he finding exerciſe enough for them in the hereſies he was obliged to combat, and the wild havock committed in the Roman Empire. His zeal againſt the Manichees, the Priſcillianiſts, the Pelagians, the Neſtorians and Eutychians was wonderfully ſeconded by the penal Laws of the Emperors, which were ſeverely executed. [A] He did not diſapprove of the extending them ſo far as the effuſion of blood.] The reader will quickly have a proof of this, from a paſſage of Maimburg. It relates to the putting to death of Priſcillian, and many of his followers, and the baniſhing ſeveral of them; which Sulpitius Severus greatly condemned, as a very pernicious example. "Becauſe he thought that nothing "like it had been ſeen before. With regard to the "point of baniſhment, no one can deny but that he "was in the wrong: for it is univerſally known that

[B] The deputation he ſent to Attila was productive of a very happy effect]. As this is one of the fineſt paſſages in the life of this Pope, it will be proper to enlarge a little upon it in this place. Attila had taken Aquileia, and burnt it almoſt to the ground: He had deſtroyed whatever was in his way, during his march from Aquileia to Pavia and Milan; he had made himſelf maſter of thoſe two great Cities, and treated them as he had done all the reſt, viz. had laid them quite waſte.... (2). So many calamitous expreſſes arriving upon one another's heels in Rome, threw the inhabitants of it into the utmoſt conſternation (3). The Senate was called together in order to debate, whether the Emperour ſhould abandon Italy as Ætius adviſed him to do. In ſhort they did not know what courſe to take. " To defend Rome, in the condition it was then, againſt " a numberleſs multitude of Barbarians, ſeemed a direct " impoſſibility; to forſake it and fly, in order to ſeek " an aſylum elſewhere; this would reflect the higheſt " ignominy on an Emperor, who ought to die honour- " rably, rather than ſurvive ſo ſhameful an act of " cowardice. What then could be done? A medium " was found between theſe two extremes, viz, to ſend " a ſolemn embaſſy to Attila, in order to obtain peace " from him, on conditions that might not be intole- " rable. This being reſolved, it was thought that no " perſon was better qualified for that employment than " the holy Pope Leo, to whom ſtrength of mind, con- " ſummate prudence, his addreſs in engaging the " hearts of men, his virtue, knowledge and eloquence " joyned to his dignity of Sovereign Pontiff, which " made him venerable to the whole world, had acqui- " red univerſally the reputation of being indiſputably " the greateſt man of his age. The Emperor there- " fore conjured him to accept of that employment, " which he did very willingly to ſave the capital of the " empire, and the holy ſee from the invaſion of Barbari- " ans. To honour the embaſſy, and the Pope who was " at the head of it, there were aſſociated to him two " of the greateſt men of the Empire, Avienus and " Trigetius, one of whom had been Conſul, and the " other Prefect of Rome. Some Senators were added, " among whom was the father of Caſſiodorus, who, " ſwayed by filial affection in one of his epiſtles (*), " where he ſpeaks as an orator, in making his fa- " ther's elogium, aſcribes to him the whole honour " and effect of this important Embaſſy. But in his " chronicle, where he ſpeaks as a true hiſtorian, he " unſays it, and aſcribes the whole to St. Leo, in like " manner as all other authors (4)." Attila gave a favourable reception to this Embaſſy, Tota legatione dignanter accepta, ita ſummi Sacerdotis præſentia Rex gaviſus eſt, ut bello abſtineri præciperet (5); near Mantua, at a ſmall diſtance from the place where the river Mincio diſcharges itſelf in the Po (6); and notwithſtanding the fierce diſpoſition of this Prince, he paid all kind of honours to the Pope; he liſtned favourably to his ſpeech which he cauſed to be interpreted; and found it ſo beautiful, ſo judicious, ſo ſtrong and ſo affecting; that Attila, this ſcourge of Heaven, that enemy to human nature, whoſe bare aſpect ſtruck the moſt intrepid ſouls with terror, and whoſe name alone made the earth to tremble, was ſoftened on a ſudden; grew gentle as a Lamb, he who before had been a ravenous Wolf, and immediately granted the peace he implored at his hands; and that without exacting any grievous condition, promiſing to preſerve it inviolably on his part; after which, turning back, he went on the other ſide of the Danube, whence he never returned (7).

[C] . . . but the miracle which is added to it is a mere fiction.] Were I to quote a Proteſtant, I ſhould ſtartle all tender minds of the Romiſh Communion; and therefore I chooſe rather to cite a perſon who reſided a long time among the Jeſuits, and who is no ways diſpoſed to favour thoſe who are not of the Romiſh Communion. His words are as follow (8). " I know it is generally related, to make the in- " cident more miraculous, that Attila's captains aſking " him why he had paid ſo much honour to this Pon- " tiff, ſo far as to obey all his commands; that Prince " anſwered trembling, that whilſt Leo was addreſ- " ſing his ſpeech to him, he ſaw near him a ve- " nerable old man, who holding a drawn ſword, " threatned to kill him in caſe he did not comply " with all things the Pope deſired. But I am obliged " to ſay, that a perſon may ſcruple to believe any " part of this, without being incredulous. And in- " deed this viſion has not been inſerted in the Paris " breviary, ſince our learned Archbiſhop Francis de " Harlay has reſtored it to its genuine ſtate; having " carefully expunged from it whatever was apocry- " phal or very doubtful; and ſubſtituted as the " leſſons, the fineſt paſſages from the writings of the " fathers of the Church, and ſuch as are beſt adapted " to the ſubject, and to the feſtival that is ſolem- " nized. I therefore will be ſo bold as to aſſert, " that a perſon may, without ſcruple, differ in opi- " nion from thoſe who give credit to this viſion: " for ancient authors, as Jornandes, Theophanes, " Suidas, Count Marcellinus, Caſſiodorus, Anaſtaſi- " us, and the reſt who have written that embaſſy of " St. Leo; not to mention St. Proſper who was then " in Rome, and told us all the circumſtances of it; " and St. Leo himſelf who mentions it in one of his " Sermons (*), take no notice of this viſion, on which " they however would not have been ſilent, had it " been true. So far from it, inſtead of aſcribing this " condeſcenſion in Attila to the fear he was un- " der from the viſion and threatning ſword we " have ſpoke of, they all declare unanimouſly, that " it was an effect of the majeſtick preſence and power- " ful eloquence of St. Leo, which ſoftened and molli- " fied the heart of this Barbarian; and the holy " Pope, who was far from glorying in it, ſaid that " it muſt be aſcribed, not to the influence of the ſtars, " as ſome of the profane would have it, but ſolely " to the infinite mercy of God, who vouchſafed " to ſoften and change the hearts of the Barbari- " ans. Quorum precibus divinæ cenſuræ flexa ſenten- " tia eſt. Non ſicut, opinantur impii, ſtellarum affectibus, " ſed ineffabilis Dei omnipotentis miſericordiæ deputantes, " qui corda furentium Barbarorum mitigare dignatus " eſt (†). There is nothing here that intimates the " viſion in queſtion. The circumſtance which made " it current of late years was, its being inſerted in " the hiſtory called Miſcella, which is falſely aſcribed " to Paulus Diaconus. But beſides its not being in- " ſerted in the ancient editions of that compiler, which " ſhews that it was added at random without proof " or authority; not to mention that a great many " more yet was it wholly fruitleſs [D]. Thoſe writers who affirm that Leo cut off his own hand [E], becauſe he felt ſome irregular impulſes whilſt a woman was kiſſing it, and who add that he got it reſtored by the great fervency of his prayers, relate two falſities. The beſt edition of his works is that of Father Queſnel (a). Some of the books which are

" more palpable falſities are included in this hiſtory; " the viſion in queſtion is related there merely on a " doubtful report as follows, Ferunt poſt diſceſſum Pon- " tificis interrogatum eſſe Attilam à ſuis, &c. (i. e. " It is related that, after the departure of the Pope, " Attila was aſked by his attendants, &c.) I there- " fore may juſtly ſay, that we are at liberty not to " give credit to this viſion; and that we are not to " look for a greater miracle on this occaſion than that " which St. Leo wrought, in his mollifying, and " changing to ſuch a degree (merely by his eloquence) " the heart of the fierceſt and moſt formidable of men; " that he obtained from him, on the ſpot, and with- " out any conditions, a peace, and made him leave " Italy. A very remarkable circumſtance on this oc- " caſion is, that this great man, who ſoftned the " hearts of thoſe barbarous infidels with ſo much " eaſe, could not be able, by his Letters, to prevail " as far over the hereticks." Theſe laſt words furniſh the hiſtorian with a happy tranſition.

[D] His eloquence had not the ſame ſucceſs with reſpect to King Giſeric, nor yet was it wholly fruitleſs.] The Empreſs Eudoxia, widow to Valentinian, had been forced to marry Maximus, who had ſeized upon the throne after having cauſed Valentinian to be aſſaſſinated. This Maximus had the inſolence to tell Eudoxia, that the paſſion he had to poſſeſs her, was the only motive which prompted him to murder the Emperor. Eudoxia being furiouſly exaſperated at ſo horrid a declaration, ... ſent ſecretly to Carthage, one of her chief confidents to Giſeric King of the Vandals, who had ſubdued Africa; conjuring him by all the moſt powerful motives ſhe could ſuggeſt, (eſpecially from the facility of the enterprize, every thing being in a defenſeleſs ſtate at Rome, as in a time of full peace) to come with all poſſible expedition, and revenge the death of Valentinian his ally; and reſcue her from her oppreſſion and tyranny of the moſt cruel and moſt wicked wretch living (9). This barbarous King, who at that time had a ſtrong fleet in Carthage, did not let ſlip the opportunity; but embarked on board his ſhips, landed in Italy without reſiſtance, advanced towards Rome, and, without drawing the ſword, had the ſatisfaction to ſee that city ſurrender at diſcretion, all the gates being thrown open to him (10), " It was then that St. Leo, ſeeing " his poor flock expoſed to the fury of thoſe wild " beaſts, like the good Shepherd who lays down his " life to ſave his ſheep, went in perſon, and addreſſed " this Vandal and Arian King, whom he knew to be " a mortal enemy to the Catholicks and particularly " to the Biſhops, on whom he had diſcharged his " fury in Africa, by treating them with greater cruelty " and barbarity than any of the reſt. Nevertheleſs " this cruel tyrant, who was going to march into " Rome, fully determined to deſtroy all things there " with fire and ſword, ſtopped on a ſudden at the ſight " of that wonderful Pontiff; and, as if the auguſt, " the ſacred majeſty which ſhone on his face, had on " a ſudden changed his tyger-heart into that of a " reaſonable man, he paid him all the honour due to " the head of the Church. He liſtned patiently to " all he would ſay; and if his eloquence did not " then work the ſame miracle as it had before done " in the perſon of Attila, in cauſing him to return " whence he came, yet it performed three very re- " markable ones. In ſhort his eloquence was ſo per- " ſuaſive, that he made Attila promiſe, that neither " the inhabitants ſhould be put to the ſword, the " houſes fired, nor the three chief Churches touched " or prophaned, viz. the Conſtantian, that of St. " Peter in the Vatican, and of St. Paul without the " walls. He was as good as his word; and after giv- " ing up Rome to be plundered by the ſoldiers during " fourteen days, he returned on board his ſhips load- " ed with plunder and rich captives, (in order that " they might be ranſomed) among whom were the " Empreſs Eudoxia, with the Princeſſes Eudocia and " Placidia her two daughters, all whom he treated " with the utmoſt generoſity.

[E] Some ſay that Leo cut off his own hand.] It is ſaid that a devout, beautiful woman being admitted to this Pontiff, on Eaſter-Sunday, according to cuſtom, to kiſs his hand, he felt I know not what emotions too like thoſe of fleſh and blood; and imagined that it was his duty to follow literally the precept of our Saviour; If thy hand offend thee cut it off. Fuerunt qui ſcriberent eum piæ mulieris ſpecie præſtantis, oſculo manui Pontificiæ religioſe admoto perculſum, muliere neque participe neque conſcia, cœni aliquid contraxiſſe (11). Cum ipſo die Paſchatis, pro more recepto, mulierculam ad figendum manui ſuæ oſculum admiſiſſet, humanum quippiam paſſus, manus illius abſciſſione ſe multavit: ſecutus illam Chriſti vocem: Si manus tua ſcandaliſat te, abſcinde eam (*). But as he was rendred incapable, by his maiming himſelf in this manner, of ſaying Maſs, there aroſe murmurs among the people, which made him beg earneſtly of God that his hand might be reſtored to him, and it accordingly was ſo. From that time we are told, the cuſtom of kiſſing the Pope's hand was changed to that of kiſſing his foot. Others relate that St. Leo cut off his own hand, becauſe of his being ſtung with a remorſe of conſcience, for having conferred holy orders on a perſon undeſerving of them. Cùm autem ſanctus Leo eam ob cauſam ſacrificare deſiiſſet, idque in populo Romano murmur non leve excitaret, impetravit à Deo ardentiſſimis precibus, ut manus abſciſſa ſibi reſtitueretur. Ex eo tamen tempore, abolito uſu manibus Pontificis oſcula figendi, inductus eſt uſus figendi oſculum pedibus. Scribunt hæc de ſancto Leone varii; ac nominatim Sabellicus lib. 5. Andreas Eborenſis tit. de Caſtitate, ac Majolus lib. 1. de irregularit. cap. 14. n. 4. qui addit, aliquos aſſerere, contigiſſe ut ſanctus Leo manum ſibi abſcideret, actus ſancto erga ſe odio, ob male impoſitas alicui manus, & præcipitem indigni hominis initiationem (12). i. e. " But when St. Leo left off, on that account, celebra- " ting Maſs, and the inhabitants of Rome murmured " very much at it, he obtained, by moſt fervent " prayers, that his hand which had been cut off " ſhould be reſtored. The practice of kiſſing the " hands of the Roman Pontiff being from that time " aboliſhed, the cuſtom was brought in of kiſſing his " feet. Many authors write theſe things of St. Leo, " eſpecially Sabellicus in his fifth book, Andrew Ebo- " renſis in his ſection concerning Chaſtity, and Majo- " lus in his firſt book upon irregularity, chap. 14. n. " 4, who adds, that it is affirmed by ſome writers, " that St. Leo cut off his own hand; fired with an " holy hatred againſt himſelf, becauſe he had inad- " vertently and raſhly conferred orders on a man un- " worthy of them." The author from whom I borrow this paſſage, looks upon this ſtory as fabulous, and obſerves, that the cuſtom of kiſſing the Pope's hand on Eaſter Sunday has been continued without interruption to either ſex; and with reſpect to the ſcruple of orders raſhly conferred, he relates the origin of it as follows (13): Quod ad eos attinet qui hanc narrationem referunt ad manus indigno appoſitas, videntur adducti ad hanc fabellam de ſancto Leone confingendam, ex lectione revelationis ex Moſcho deſcriptæ capite 149 Prati ſpiritualis. Quod ſcilicet ſancto Leone pro peccatis ſuis ferventer precato, apparuerit ei B. Petrus, dicens exoraſſe ſe ei omnium erratorum veniam, ſalva diſcuſſione peccatorum, ſi quæ fuiſſent ab eo admiſſa ob indignorum ordinationem. At aliud eſt quod hac revelatione continetur, aliud quod habet fabuloſa calumnia quam retulimus. i. e. " With regard to thoſe perſons who refer " this relation to his conferring orders on an unwor- " thy perſon, they ſeem to have been led to this fic- " tion related of St. Leo, by the peruſal of the reve- " lation deſcribed from Moſchus, in the 149th chap- " ter of his ſpiritual Meadow; viz. that St. Leo hav- " ing prayed with great fervency on account of his " ſins, St. Peter appeared to him, and ſaid, that he " had obtained for him the pardon of all his ſins, " thoſe excepted which he might have been guilty " of, by ordaining of unworthy perſons. But the " fabulous ſlander we have related, is different from " what is contained in that revelation."

[F] Some of the books which are aſcribed to him ... are ſaid, by other authors, to have been wrote by St. Proſper.] Father Queſnel declares, that the two books concerning the calling of the Gentiles, the letter to Demetrias, and the chapters concerning Grace and Free-will, were not wrote by St. Proſper as is commonly believed, but by St. Leo. See the book (17) entitled, De veris Operibus SS. Patrum Leonis Magni & Proſperi Aquitani, Diſſertationes criticæ, quibus Capitula de Gratia, &c. Epiſtolam ad Demetriadem, nec non duos de Vocatione omnium Gentium libros, Leoni nuper adſcriptos abjudicat, & Proſpero poſtliminio reſtituit Joſephus Antelmius, Preſbyter & Canonicus Eccleſiæ Forojulienſis. Abbot Antelmi has ſtrongly oppoſed this aſſertion; he even maintains that St. Proſper is certainly author of the ſermons which are thought to be written by St. Leo. A remarkable circumſtance in this diſpute is, that both the combatants inſiſt on the conformity of ſtyle; one to prove that St. Leo is author of the works in queſtion; the other to prove that they are not ſo, but have St. Proſper for their author (18). The pains which Abbot Antelmi took on this occaſion is very remarkable; he having made tables in two columns, wherein he compares ſeveral paſſages of St. Proſper, extracted from books which are confeſſedly his, and others which are diſputed; and ſhews a great conformity between theſe paſſages reſpectively. Theſe parallels or comparisons with regard to St. Leo's ſermons, point out to us forms of ſpeech ſo peculiar, expreſſions and turns ſo much ſtudied and ſo compoſed, that it ſeems next to impoſſible that they ſhould be made by different authors (19). Notwithſtanding this Mr. du Pin ſays, that Abbot Antelmi's ſyſtem with regard to the Sermons which go under St. Leo's name, appears to him chimerical; and that the Proofs he alledges for that purpoſe are exremely weak (20). What is much more, du Pin denies the conformity of ſtyle inſiſted upon by Antelmi, and the conſequence he ſhould draw from it. " Any perſon who ſhould take " the pains to compare the paſſages cited by him, " would find that there is no conformity of ſtyle, be- " tween the paſſages of both authors, though the ſame " words occur in both. And beſides, though there " ſhould be ſome ſlight conformity of ſtyle between " St. Proſper's writings and thoſe of St. Leo, ſhould " we not have reaſon to ſay, that St. Proſper had " imitated his maſter, whom he uſed to hear frequent- " ly both ſpeak and preach, whoſe Sermons he uſed " to read, and perhaps copied, to preſerve them in " the archives of the Church of Rome, in ſcrinio Ro- " manæ Eccleſiæ, ſuppoſing he had been Notary of " the Church of Rome (21)?" [G] A famous Proteſtant Miniſter was a little puzzled, by his fixing the æra of Antichriſt under Pope Leo.] " He " will be drove much farther. According to him, in " the age of St. Leo, idolatry was ſo conſiderable in " the Church, as to form an Antichriſtian Church, " and make St. Leo himſelf Antichriſt; and yet the " Miniſter in queſtion writes as follows, in the thir- " teenth letter of this year. Whilſt Antichriſt was " little, he did not deſtroy the eſſence of the Church. " Leo ... and a few of his ſucceſſors were good men, ſo " far as goodneſs and piety are conſiſtent with a boundleſs " ambition. It is likewiſe certain that the Church, in " his time, was DEEPLY IMMERSED IN THE IDO- " LATRY of the worſhip of the creatures, which is " one of the characteriſticks of Antichriſtianity; and " though theſe evils were not yet extreme, nor ſuch " as to DAMN the perſon of Leo, who otherwiſe was " poſſeſſed of good qualities; they nevertheleſs were ſuffi- " cient to form the beginning of Antichriſtianity. You " ſee then that a man is not damned, though he is not " only an idolater, but alſo deeply immerſed in the idola- " try of the worſhip of creatures. If a man be not of the " number of the ſaints, and if we ſhould be obliged " to eraſe St. Leo from that catalogue, he may at " leaſt be of the number of good men; and the ſin of " idolatry is not ſo great that a perſon ſhall be damned " on that account. To urge this matter farther: it " has been proved in the Book of Variations, and in " other places (*), by the expreſs words of St. John (†), " that the beaſt and Antichriſt have blaſphemed and " been idolatrous from their birth, and during the " whole extent of the 1260 days of their continuance. " The Proteſtant Miniſter would fain have diſſembled " this, to prevent his being obliged to charge theſe " crimes, on the time and perſon of St. Leo, St. Sim- " plicius, St. Gelaſius, and other holy Pontiffs of the " fifth century; but he at laſt was forced to out with " it (‡). It is certain that all the characteriſticks of the " beaſt began from that time. As early as the time " of Leo the Great, the Gentiles or Heathens began to " tread the Church under foot; for heatheniſm, which " is the worſhip of the creatures, entred into it. From " that period began the blaſphemy againſt God and his " Saints; for the taking from God his true worſhip, to " make Saints partake of it, is blaſpheming againſt " God. Thus we have Antichriſtian blaſphemy and " idolatry eſtabliſhed under St. Leo. He could not be " free from it, ſince he himſelf was the Antichriſt; " and indeed, it is certain, that he paid as much ho- " nour to relicks, and implored the aſſiſtance of the " prayers of the Saints, as the reſt. Here then we " find not only an idolater, but alſo the chief or head " of Antichriſtian idolatry in the number of the elect; " and that idolatry does not hinder ſalvation (25)." As this is a diſpute between man and man, and not a controverſy on the general doctrines of the two Communions, I may be allowed to obſerve, that the author who was puzzled took the beſt courſe he could, according to the maxims of human prudence: he held his peace; and would not even ſeem to know, that the public had been made ſenſible of his confuſion.

LEO X, created Pope the 11th of March 1513, was called John de Medicis. He had been honoured with a Cardinal's * Hat at fourteen years of age by Pope Innocent VIII, and a great many years after with the dignity of Legate by Pope Julius II. He was in that quality in the army which was defeated by the French near Ravenna in the year 1512; was taken priſoner there, and, during his captivity, he made a wonderful experiment of the aſcendant which ſuperſtition has, even over the minds of ſoldiers [A]. It is is pretended that no circumſtance contributed more to the raiſing him to the Pontificate, than the wonnds he had received in the battles of Venus [B]. He ſpent prodigious ſums the day of his coronation [C] ; and led ſuch a life as was little ſuited to one who ſet up for their gaining the victory ; beſought him to give them abſolution for it ; and promiſed never to bear arms againſt the Pope. It is Cardinal Palavicino informs me of theſe particulars, after obſerving that, in contempt of the royal authority, the Milaneze looked with horror on the Cardinals who were aſſembled at Piſa. In Milano con vilipenſione dell' autorità Reale furon ricevuti non come Cardinali, Grado riveritiſſimo nella Chriſtianità, mà come huomini peſtiferi e ſcelerati, e comete di ſciagura ne' paeſi dove giugneſſero. Anzi, non oſtante che i Franceſi riportaſſono la memorabil vittoria di Ravenna, e conduceſſero prigione à Milano il Cardinal Giovanni de' Medici Legato dell' Eſercito pontificio, che poi aſſunto al Pontificato preſe il nome di Leon Decimo ; non ſi tennero i ſoldati vincitori dall' andare con incredibil frequenza à venerar come Legato del Vicario di Chriſto il lor prigioniero ; ricevendone l'aſſoluzione ch'egli havea pedeſtà di dar loro per haver combattuto contro alla Chieſa, con promeſſione d'aſterſene per innanzi (1).

[B] No circumſtance contributed more to the raiſing him to the Pontificate, than the wounds he had received in the battles of Venus.] I have ſo frequently given the reaſon, why I chooſe to cite, on ſuch occaſions, Romiſh authors rather than Proteſtant ones, that without farther preamble I ſhall here quote the words of a French hiſtorian who is a great enemy to the Proteſtants (2). " Three months were not paſt ſince Cardinal de Medicis was returned to Florence, when " the death of Pope Julius II obliged him to leave it, " to go to Rome. He cauſed himſelf to be carried " in a litter, becauſe of an impoſthume he had in " thoſe parts which modeſty will not ſuffer me to " name ; and travelled ſo ſlowly, that the Pontiff's " funeral was over, and the Conclave begun, by that " time he arrived there ..... (3). The Conclave " had not ended ſo ſoon as it did, the young and old " Cardinals perſiſting in contrary opinions with equal " obſtinacy, had not an odd accident brought them " to agree. Cardinal de Medicis having hurried about " prodigiouſly in the great number of viſits he uſed to " make every night to the Cardinals of his faction, " his impoſthume or ulcer broke, and the matter " which ran from it exhaled ſo great a ſtench, that " all the cells, which were ſeparated only by thin " partitions, were poiſoned by it. The old Cardinals, " whoſe conſtitutions were leſs able to reſiſt the ma- " lignant influence of ſo corrupted an air, conſulted the " Phyſicians of the Conclave, to know what they muſt " do ; theſe Phyſicians, who viſited Cardinal de Me- " dicis, and formed a judgment of his conſtitution, " by the ill humours that flowed from his body, rather " than by the ſtrength of nature which drove them " out, anſwered, after having been bribed by the pro- " miſes of Bibiana, that Cardinal de Medicis could " not live a month longer. Their paſſing this ſentence " of death upon him occaſioned his being choſen " Pope ; in that the old Cardinals, thinking to out- " wit the young ones, would indulge them a ſatiſ- " faction which they imagined would not be of long " duration. They therefore waited upon them, and " told them that they yielded at laſt to their obſti- " nacy, upon condition that the ſame ſhould be done " for them another time. Thus Cardinal de Medicis " was elected Pope on a falſe information, he not " being at that time quite thirty ſix years old ; and as " joy is the moſt ſovereign of all remedies, he ſoon " after recovered ſo perfect a ſtate of health, that " the old Cardinals had reaſon to repent their too " great credulity." To conceal nothing, it is incumbent on me to inform my readers, that Paulus Jovius does not fix this ulcer in the ſame part as Varillas, but in the anus, which would not imply an ignominious origin. Propter innatum ab ima ſede abſceſſum Romam modicis itineribus ad comitia contendit (4). Fuere qui exiſtimarent vel ob id ſeniores ad ferenda ſuffragia facilius acceſſiſſe, quod pridie diſrupto eo abſceſſu qui ſedem occuparat, tanto fœtore ex profluente ſanie totum comitium implevisſet, ut tanquam à mortifera tabe infectus, non diu ſupervicturus eſſe vel medicorum teſtimonio crederetur (*). From the ſame principle of ſincerity I add, that this Pope, at his acceſſion to the throne, was in great reputation for his chaſtity, if Guicciardin may be credited (5) ; and was looked upon as very chaſte from his youth, if Paulus Jovius may be believed. Conſtat tamen eum, quod à prima adoleſcentia opinione omnium ſummam continentiæ laudem fuiſſet adeptus, non importuna quædam pudicitiæ caſtitatique præſidia quæſiviſſe : quando nequaquam priſtinæ vitæ more tam multis delicatiſque obſoniis uteretur (6). One ought to conclude from hence, that the Pontificate proved the ruin of the morals of Leo X ; and that he grew vicious where he ought to have grown virtuous. In fine, I obſerve, that it is only by conſequences which are not abſolutely neceſſary, that one may find in the words of Varillas, the ſenſe in which I alledge them, and which Mr. de Seckendorf gives them (7). I ſubmit them to the judgment of my readers.

[" Bayle has juſtly ſuppoſed, that every Proteſtant " who firſt writes down an incident diſadvantageous to " the memory of a Pope, or does not give good proofs " of it, may juſtly be excepted againſt. See his re- " mark I. But then to act as a judicious and impar- " tial critic, he ought to have ſuppoſed it as a truth, " that among the Roman Catholics there are, and " ever have been, authors, who have writ like open " enemies againſt the Popes ; and with as much fury " as the Proteſtants, or the moſt paſſionate Heretics. The jealouſy, pride, or rage with " which a writer has been fired, becauſe a Pope would " not gratify him in all he demanded, the itch of " publiſhing a repartee, a paſquinade, or any other " ſatyr, and ſo many other paſſions, have alſo given " riſe to a numberleſs multitude of libels on the Popes. The Popiſh author of theſe remarks makes ſome others which do not appear juſt.

[C] He ſpent prodigious ſums the day of his coronation.] He would be crowned the ſame day he loſt the battle of Ravenna and his liberty the year before, and he rode the Turkiſh horſe he had mounted the day of that battle ; for he had paid a ranſom to the French for this horſe ; had a particular affection for it, and had it kept and pampered very carefully to an extreme old age. Vectus eſt etiam in pompa illo eodem equo Thracio in quo ad Ravennam captus fuerat, quem ab hoſtibus pecunia redemptum ita adamavit, ut poſtea uſque ad extremam ſenectutem ſumma cum indulgentia alendum curarit (8). And his imagination being filled with the magnificence of antient Rome, and the triumphal days of the antient Conſuls, he endeavoured to revive thoſe noble ſpectacles ; and was ſo well ſeconded in his deſign, that ever ſince the irruption of the Goths, there had not been ſeen any ſight more magnificent at Rome than his coronation. Read the deſcription of it in Paulus Jovius (9), who ſays, with Guicciardin (10), that the expence of it amounted to an hundred thouſand ducats. Gretſer cenſures du Pleſſis for ſaying it coſt a million, nec mitius agit Pleſſæus cum Leone X, quem die coronationis ſuæ decies centena aureorum millia, hoc eſt ut vulgo loquimur millionem conſumpſiſſe ſcribit (11). up for a ſucceſſor of the Apoſtles; a life, I ſay, that was wholly voluptuous [D]. He took too much delight in hunting. It is related that his eye was ſurprizingly quick at this ſport [E]. Having been educated by Preceptors (a), who had taught him perfectly the Belles Lettres, he loved and protected men of wit and learning. The Poets were chiefly happy in his munificence, which he ſometimes indulged, without preſerving the gravity

[D] He led... a life... that was wholly voluptuous.] Paulus Jovius cannot be accuſed of having been too ſparing of his encomiums on Leo X; but, on the other hand, it muſt be confeſſed that he expreſſes himſelf with ſo much plainneſs on the vices of this Pontiff, that he does not leave an intelligent reader in doubt or ſuſpence. The pleaſures, ſays he, in which he too frequently immerſed himſelf, and the lewd actions objected to him, ſullied the luſtre of his virtues. He adds, that a diſpoſition more eaſy and complacent than corrupt, threw him down the precipice; he having been ſurrounded only with a ſet of people, who, inſtead of admoniſhing him of his duty, were for ever propoſing ſome party of pleaſure. The original is more emphatical than the extract I give of it, for which reaſon I will here add the words of Paulus Jovius. Has præclaras liberalis excelſique animi virtutes, cum nimia ſæpe vitæ luxuria, tum objectæ libidines obſcurabant: ita tamen, ut jucunditate blandæ faciliſque naturæ potius, ac regia quadam licentia, quàm certo depravati animi judicio in ea vitia prolabi videretur, quum frequenti blandientium turba cubiculi fores obſeſſæ paucos admitterent, qui alioqui docilis verecundique hominis ſolutos mores cohiberent, amicorum optimis ad ea connive ntibus, ac libenter ſeſe illecebrarum miniſtris immiſcentibus, ne gratiam apud ſummos principes in lubrico poſitam in diſcrimen adducerent, ſi ingratum auribus potentium reprehenſionis officium honeſtatis atque benevolentiæ ſpecie ſuſcepiſſent. Verùm hominem hilaritati humaniſque ſenſibus facile ſervientem mirum in modum incitabant plerique Cardinales opibus ætateque florentes, qui illuſtri loco nati, ac liberaliter educati, regio luxu vitam in venationibus, conviviis, atque ſpectaculis libentiſſimè traducebant (12). He confeſſes a little after that this Pope was accuſed of Sodomy (13): Non caruit etiam infamia, quòd parum honeſte nonnullos è cubicularii s (erant enim è tota Italia nobiliſſimi) adamare, & cum his tenerius atque liberè jocari videretur. Sed quis vel optimus atque ſanctiſſimus princeps in hac maledicentiſſima aula lividorum aculeos vitavit? & quis ex adverſo tam malignè improbus ac invidiæ tabe conſumptus, ut vera demum poſſet objectare, noctium ſecreta ſcrutatus eſt? i. e. "He alſo was accuſed of being engaged in an ignominious commerce with ſome young Gentlemen of his bedchamber, who were of the nobleſt families in all Italy, and of ſporting ſhamefully with them. But what Prince, though the worthieſt and moſt pious, was exempt from the darts of envy in this very ſatyrical Court? And what perſon, on the other hand, was fired with ſo malignant and envious a ſpirit, as to pry into the ſecrets of the night, in order to get ſubjects for reproach?" I paſs over what is related concerning the luxury of his table, and the buffoonries acted at it. Mire quoque favit Pogio ſeni, Pogii hiſtorici filio, itemque Moro nobili à gulæ intemperantia, articularibus doloribus diſtorto, & Brandino equiti, Marianoque ſannioni cucullato facetiſſimis helluonibus, & in omni genere popinalium deliciarium eruditiſſimis..... Verum feſtiviſſimis eorum facetiis, ſalſiſque & perurbanis ſcommatibus magis quam ullis palati lenociniis oblectabantur (14). I have made ſome mention of this in the article of HADRIAN VI (15), ſucceſſor to Leo X, and who retrenched the luxury of that Pontiff, as the reader will now ſee. "The other day the grooms of the late Pope Leo deputed a perſon from among them, and ſent him to the Pope, to ſpeak in the name of all the reſt. The Pontiff aſked how many of them had been in the retinue of Leo; when the perſon deputed anſwered, an hundred. Adrian croſſing himſelf, as aſtoniſhed at ſo ſuperfluous a number, anſwered, that four would be enough for him; but that he was content that twelve ſhould be put upon the liſt, ſince ſome he muſt have, in order to exceed the number kept by the Cardinals. In a word, the common opinion is, that this Pope will be a good oeconomiſt and treaſurer for the Church; a thing that in reality is greatly wanted, conſidering his predeceſſor's prodigality." This paſſage is found in a letter of Jerom Niger (α), writ from Rome the 1ſt of September 1522. It is inſerted in the collection of Ruſcelli, tranſlated by Belleforeſt. [N. B. Mr. Bayle tells us, that he had made uſe of the verſion and marginal note of the laſt mentioned tranſlator.]

[E] His eye was ſurprizingly quick at hunting.] This I ſhall take notice of, after mentioning the prodigious paſſion which Leo X had for the ſport in queſtion. He took a wonderful delight in it; he knew and obſerved the laws of it, much better than thoſe of the ſcripture; he could not bear that any one ſhould diſturb him in his ſport; and gave no quarter to thoſe perſons who, through imprudence or otherwiſe, made him loſe the prey they were in queſt of. On theſe occaſions he would revile ſuch perſons in the ſharpeſt manner. He was always ſo much out of humour when he failed of ſport, that his courtiers were ſure never to aſk any favours of him at ſuch times; but whenever he met with a great deal of game, he would be ſo overjoyed on this account, that theſe would be the moſt propitious moments (16) for obtaining all that might be requeſted. Paulus Jovius relates this with very great elegance. Venationibus & aucupiis nobilioribus adeò perditè ſtudebat, ut ſpurciſſimas ſæpe tempeſtates inſalubreſque ventos, & frequentia manſionum ac itinerum incommoda obſtinatè contemneret... (17). In venando autem ſicuti præcepta artis ad normam exactioris diſciplinæ patientiſſimè obſervare erat ſolitus, ita ſeveritatem aſperè admodum vir alioqui leniſſimus ſemper exercuit; in eos præſertim, qui petulanti diſcurſu aut vocibus temere editis improviſa feris effugia præbuiſſent: ita ut claros ſæpe viros acerbiſſimis contumeliis oneraret. At ſi quando imperitia, vel fortuito errore hominum, aut feris ſubtiliore aliquo inſperatæ fugæ compendio ſervatis, vel iis denſo in nemore contumacius latentibus infeliciter venaretur, incredibile eſt quali vultus animique habitu dolorem iracundiamque præferret. Propterea amici familiares ea temporis momenta provocandæ liberalitati maximè adverſa ſedulo devitabant: quando aliàs ſecundum opimam venationem, ac præſertim vario ac inſigni labore aliquo nobilem, maxima beneficia incredibili benignitate collocaret (18). i. e. "He was ſo exceſſively delighted with hunting and hawking, that he would often obſtinately contemn the moſt foul ſtorms, the moſt inſalubrious winds, and the many inconveniences of travelling.... But in hunting, as he obſerved very ſtrictly the laws of that exerciſe, ſo he was extremely ſevere, though otherwiſe of the moſt gentle diſpoſition, on theſe occaſions; particularly towards thoſe perſons, who, by their petulant diſcourſe or noiſy clamour, gave the Game an opportunity of eſcaping; inſomuch that he would inveigh bitterly againſt perſons of quality. But whenever it happened, either through ignorance or miſtake of the ſportsmen; or that the game unexpectedly eſcaped, or could not be forced out of its haunts, that he thereby was unſucceſsful in the chace, he would appear ſurpriſingly grieved and exaſperated. And therefore his intimate friends were prodigiouſly careful not to ſue for any favour at this time. But, on the contrary, when he was ſucceſsful in the chace, and it was diſtinguiſhed by the greatneſs of the toil, he would beſtow the moſt conſiderable favours with prodigious liberality."

gravity his character required [F]. This was visible on many occasions, and even in the privileges he granted to Ariosto's Poems (b). In short, it may be said, that men of learning

From the remarks to the Paris edition (1734) of Bayle's Dictionary.]" Multi Cardinales " cæci crearunt cæcum Leonem decimum. (Many blind " Cardinals created the blind Leo X.) Now to speak " it occasionally; I know not why he is called blind, " since he could see in hunting, at the highest soar by " the help of glasses, Hauks, Vultures, and Eagles. " But then, on the other hand, whenever he read, he " used to put the paper to his nose; and even then " could not distinguish a letter, as Luke Gauricus in- " forms us in schematibus cælestibus. This puts me " in mind of an honest sort of a Parson, who cannot " read the large letters of the Church-books without " spectacles; and yet shall distinguish the smallest dice " that can be found, and cannot be imposed upon." Paulus Jovius confirms but part of this; he asserting that Leo X could read the smallest character with great ease, when he brought the paper close to his eye. Subtrahebant magna ex parte oris suavitatem obesæ malæ & oculi extantes convolutique & hebètes, verùm si ad pupillam inspicienda propius admoveret, supra fidem acutissimi: supplices enim libellos, vel minutissimis literis, & crebris syllabarum compendiis properanter exaratos celerrimè & distinctissimè lectitabat: admota autem cristallo concava, oculorum aciem in venationibus & aucupiis adeò latè extendere erat solitus, ut non modò spaciis & finibus, sed ipsa etiam discernendi felicitate cunctis anteiret (20). i. e. " A circumstance that very much " lessened the sweetness of his aspect was, his bloated " cheeks, and his eyes which were prominent, row- " ling, and dim-sighted; and nevertheless extremely " sharp whenever he brought any thing near to the pu- " pil; he reading with great quickness, and distinctly, " petitions though in the minutest characters, and " with many contractions; and, by using a concave " glass, he would extend his sight to such a degree " in hunting, that he surpassed every one, not only in " space, but even in discerning acutely." I have just now consulted Luke Gauricus's book cited by Des Accords, and do not find he says that Leo X could not see at all when he put the paper to his nose. I will cite Gauricus, whose impertinence cannot fail of being wondered at, to find him ascribe to the planets, the various qualities of the two eyes of the Pope in question. Sol cum stellis nebulosis, oculi dextri aciem penitus hebetavit cum multis lineis transversis. Luna in sexta cæli statione sub Geminorum asterismo ad Martis tetragonam radiationem defluens, oculi quoque sinistri lucem impediebat, adeo quidem quod nec legere, neque aliquid intueri potuerat absque conspicillo magno christallino, non autem illius aciem prorsus desiderabat, quoniam salutaris Stella Jovis, Lunam trigonica radiatione intuebatur, & ita Literas lectitabat naso proximiores & oculo, sed cum illo vitreo ocello suspiciebat Accipitres, Aquilas, Astures altius volitantes, & longe melius quam alii venatores, ibatque sæpius ad venationes Leporum, Caprearum silvestrium, & vulpium, illasque optime conspiciebat, quæ à canibus leporariis & molossis capiebantur (21). i. e. " The Sun, with cloudy stars, quite dimmed (with a " great number of transverse lines) the sight of his " right eye. The moon, in the sixth house, in the " constellation of Gemini, turning to the quartil of " Mars, injured the sight of his left eye to such a de- " gree, that he could not read at all without the help " of a large crystal glass. However, the light of it " was not quite gone, because the salutary planet Ju- " piter was at that time in trine with the moon, and " in this manner he read over letters by putting " them near to his nose and eyes. But by the help " of his glass, he could perceive Hawks and Eagles, " when soaring aloft, much better than the other " sportsmen; he often used to divert himself with hare- " hunting, and that of wild goats and foxes; and had a " perfect sight of them, when seized by the hounds " and mastiffs."

[F] The Poets were chiefly happy in his munificence, which he sometimes indulged without preserving the gravity his character required.] The pleasures he sometimes used to indulge himself in with them, degenerated sometimes to buffoonry. Quernus, who had been crowned in a solemn manner, and raised to the honour of Poet Laureat, might be considered as a Merry-Andrew. He used to come where Pope Leo was at dinner; and eat, at the window, the morsels which were handed to him. He was allowed to quaff liberally of the Pope's wine, but it was on condition that he should make some ex tempore verses on any given subject. He was obliged to compose two lines at least; and in case of his failure, or if his verses were good for nothing, he was sentenced to drink a large quantity of water with his wine (22). Fuit diu inter instrumenta eruditæ voluptatis longè gratissimus, quum cænante Leone porrectis de manu semesis obsoniis, stans in fenestra vescerètur, & de principis lagena perpotando, subitaria carmina factitaret: ea demum lege, ut præscripto argumento bina saltem carmina ad mensam, tributi nomine solverentur, & in pœnam sterili vel inepto longe dilutissimè foret perbibendum (23). Sometimes too the Pope would make ex tempore verses with his Poet-Laureat, at which the company would burst out a laughing. How ludicrous was all this! Ab hac autem opulentia hilarique sagina, vehementem incidit in podagram; sic ut bellissimè ad risum evenerit, quum de se canere jussus, in hunc hexametrum erupisset;

(22) Jovius, in Elogiis, cap. 82.

(23) Idem, ibid. pag. 191.

Et demum hæsitaret, inexpectatus Princeps hoc pentametro perargutè responderit;

Et pro mille aliis Archipoëta bibit.

Tum verò astantibus obortus est risus, & demum multò maximus, quum Quernus stupens & interritus, hoc tertium non inepte carmen induxisset:

Porrige, quod faciat mihi carmina docta, Falernum.

Idque Leo repente mutuatus à Virgilio, subdiderit,

Hoc etiam enervat: debilitatque pedes (24).

(24) Ibid.

The sense is,

" The living in this luxurious manner brought a " severe gout upon him; notwithstanding which he " excited laughter, when being commanded to write " some verses on himself, he broke into the following " Hexameter.

" For just a thousand Bards the Laureat writes;

" And hesitating, the Pope unexpectedly added this " very witty pentameter;

" The Laureat drinks for just a thousand more.

" This made the company fall a laughing; and " they afterwards were ready to split their sides, when " Quernus surprized, but undismayed, added this third " pretty line;

" Give me Falernian wine to raise my Muse,

" To which Leo, instantly borrowing from Virgil, " added;

" This likewise weakens and enerves the feet."

One day a Poet presenting to him some Latin verses, in rhime, the Pope, for diversion sake, gave him no other reward but an extempore flight, containing the same number of verses, with the same rhymes. The Poet exasperated against Leo for not bestowing any recompence on him, let fly the following Distich:

Si tibi pro numeris numeros fortuna dedisset,
Non esset capiti tanta corona tuo.

The sense is,

" Had fate thus given thee only verse for verse,
" So great a crown had not adorn'd thy head."

Upon this the Pope exerted his usual beneficence to him (25). By this it appears that our Pope did all that lay in his power to divert himself. But here follows learning and buffoons ſhared equally his friendſhip [G]; but he had not the ſame affection for theological ſtudies [H]. I would not take upon me to warrant the truth of a ſtory which is related, viz. that he one day ridiculed the whole Chriſtian doctrine as fabulous [I]. He had the addreſs to ruin the Council, which the Emperor and King of France had oppoſed to Julius II, and made the Council of Lateran to triumph; he obtaining lows an incident, which plainly ſhews the buffooning ſpirit that then prevailed in this Pope's palace. A man having a favour to ſue for from Leo X; and being trifled with ſeveral days by inconvenient delays, which put him out of all hopes of being introduced, he thought of the following artifice. He told Leo's great chamberlain, that he had ſome of the fineſt verſes that were ever read to ſhew him. The chamberlain, in the utmoſt tranſports of joy, flies to the Pope, and tells him that he had met with the Prince of fools; one who would give him the greateſt diverſion. It was the cuſtom of the courtiers of Leo X, to look out for perſons that were half crazed, and to make them quite ſo for the diverſion of the head of the Church (26). But they were over-reached by the pretended Poet in queſtion; for the moment he was introduced to the Pope, he confeſſed the true reaſon which had prompted him to counterfeit a crack-brained Poet, and told him his buſineſs. But thoſe who underſtand Latin, will read this with more ſatisfaction in the following words of Nicius Erythræus. Hoc hominum ridicule inſanientium genere non minimum delectabatur Leo X Pontifex Max. cujus Gnathones, quos circa ſe habebat, dabant operam, ut eos, quibus levis mens eſſet, ad inſaniam adigerent, ſeque eos eſſe, qui non eſſent, arbitrarentur. In quo mirabiliter luſus eſt à quodam, cui petenti aditum conveniendi non dabat: qui cùm multos dies expectaſſet, atque omnes ad Pontificem allegationes difficiles, omnes aditus arduos intercluſoſque videret, ſeducto Pontificii cubiculi præfecto in aurem dixit, ſe eſſe poëtam, ſolum præter cæteros, qui ſua vellet carmina Pontifici tradere, quibus lectis obſtupeſceret, horreret, ad incredibilem admirationem efferretur. Quo ille audito, ventis atque avibus ocius advolavit in Leonis cubiculum, atque hilaritate lætitiaque redundans, Invenimus, inquit, perfectæ inſaniæ hominem, qui tibi voluptati maximæ erit. At ille ſine mora intromiſſus, ex illis ſe integumentis ſimulationis evolvit, cauſam, cur inſaniam ſimulaſſet, aperuit, negotium, quod volebat, expoſuit. Itaque ille deridiculo eos habuit, quibus ludendus tradebatur (27). Was it obſerving the decorum which the dignity of Pontiff required, to iſſue out a Bull ſo favourable to Arioſto's poems? Cardinal Hyppolito di Eſte, to whom this Poet's Orlando Furioſo was dedicated, formed a very true judgment of it, when he put the following queſtion to the author, Meſſer Lodoïco dove Diavolo havete pigliato tante coionerie. i. e. "Arioſto, "whence, in the Devil's name, could you collect ſo "much nonſenſe?" But Leo X was infinitely more gracious to this author. "Almoſt at the ſame time "that he fulminated his anathemas againſt Martin "Luther, he did not bluſh to publiſh a Bull in favour "of Arioſto's profane poems; threatning to excom-"municate thoſe who ſhould cenſure them, or any "way impede the Printer's profit (28)." We ſhall ſee in another place (29), that he was a great admirer of pieces in a comic ſtrain.

[G] Men of learning and buffoons ſhared equally his friendſhip.] Peter Matthieu the hiſtorian, having obſerved that Leo X had as great an affection for buffoons, as for the moſt learned men of Italy, and changed his humours from one extreme to another (30), quotes the following paſſage from Aretin. "E beato colui "che e pazzo, ne la pazzia ſua compiace ad altri e a "ſe ſteſſo. Certamente Leone hebbe una natura da' "ſtremo à eſtremo, & non ſaria opra da ogniuno il "giudicare chi piu gli dilettaſſe, o la vertu de i dotti, "o le ciancie de i buffoni, e di cio fa fede il ſuo ha-"dato à l'una e à l'altra ſpecie eſſaltando tanto queſti "quanto quegli." i. e. "Happy is that man who "is a fool, and whoſe folly pleaſes others and him-"ſelf too. Certainly the caſt of Leo's diſpoſition was "for extremes; and it would be no eaſy matter to "judge which gave him the greateſt pleaſure, the "ſcience of the Literati, or the jeſts of buffoons; and "this is manifeſt by his favouring both theſe ſorts of "men, ſometimes preferring the one, and ſometimes "the other." Peter Matthieu, who often cites our Aretin, took much more pains than Menage (31).

[H] He had not the ſame affection for theological ſtudies.] Cardinal Palavicino could not deny this. He owns frankly that Leo X had a greater regard for perſons who underſtood mythology, the Poets of antiquity, and profane learning, than for thoſe who were converſant in divinity, and eccleſiaſtical hiſtory. Here follow his words, which are more frank and leſs inſincere than uſual. Gli oppone il Soave, ch'egli haveſſe maggior notizia di lettere profane che ſacre ed apartenenti alla religione: nel che io non gli contradico. Havendo Leone ricevuto da Dio un ingegno capaciſſimo e ſingularmente ſtudioſo; ed appena uſcito dalla fanciullezza veggendoſi toſto nel ſupremo Senato della Chieſa; mancò al ſuo debito con traſcurar nella letteratura una parte non ſolamente la più nobile, mà la più proporzionata al ſuo Grado. E s'accrebbe tal mancamento quando in età di trentaſett'anni coſtituito Preſidente e Maeſtrò della religione, non ſolo continuò di donarſi tutto alle curioſità degli ſtudii profani; mà nella Reggia della medeſima religione con maggior cura chiamò coloro à cui foſſer note le favole della Grecia e le delizie de' Poeti, che l'Iſtorie della Chieſa, et la dottrina de' Padri. Non laſciò ei veramente di rimunerar la Scholaſtica Theologia, onorandola con la Porpora in Tommaſo di Vio, in Egidio da Viterbo, e in Adriano Florenzio ſuo Succeſſore, e coll' ufficio di Maeſtro del Sacro Palazzo in Silveſtro da Prierio; le cui penne illuſtrarono immortalmente quella ſacra diſciplina. Mà nè co' Theologi uſò di converſare come co' Poeti; ne promeſſe l'erudizione ſacra come la profana; laſciando la Chieſa in quella ſcarſezza in cui la trovò di perſone che dopo l'infelice ignoranza di molti ſecoli rauvivaſſero la prima, comi ſi rauvivava già la ſeconda (32). i. e. "Fra Paolo objects to him, that he was better ſkil-"led in profane Literature than in ſacred or religious "learning, which I do not deny. Heaven had be-"ſtowed on Leo a conſummate genius, and a ſingular "induſtry; and, though but young, ſeeing himſelf "ſeated in the ſupreme Senate of the Church, he yet "was wanting in his duty, in neglecting, the ſpecies "of Literature, not only the nobleſt in its kind, "but the moſt ſuitable to his ſtation. And this ne-"glect increaſed, when, being ſeven and thirty years "old, and being ſet at the head of all religious af-"fairs, he not only continued to devote himſelf wholly "to the curioſity of profane ſtudies; but, for the re-"gulating of religion, was more aſſiduous in inviting "thoſe who were converſant in the fables of Greece, "and the compoſitions of Poets, than ſuch as were "acquainted with eccleſiaſtical hiſtory and the doc-"trine of the fathers. He nevertheleſs encouraged "ſchool Divinity; he raiſing to the purple, Thomas "di Vio, Giles da Viterbo, and Adrian Florenzio "his ſucceſſor; and appointing Silveſter da Prierio "maſter of the ſacred Palace, whoſe Pens will il-"luſtrate to lateſt poſterity that ſacred ſcience. But "he did not converſe with the Divines as with the "poets, nor ſo much encourage ſacred erudition as "he did profane; leaving the Church in the ſame "want as he had found it, of learned men, who, af-"ter the unhappy ignorance of many centuries, ſhould "revive the former, as the latter was revived." It were to be wiſhed that theſe two hiſtorians, had agreed together ſo well on all occaſions.

[I] It is related... that he one day ridiculed the whole Chriſtian doctrine as fabulous.] (β). The tradition is, that upon his ſecretary Bembus's quoting ſomething from the Goſpel, he anſwered, "It is well "known of old how profitable this fable of Jeſus Chriſt "has been to us;" quantum nobis noſtriſque ea de Chriſto fabula profuerit, ſatis eſt omnibus ſeculis notum. This ſtory is related in the Myſtere d'Iniquité (33), and in a numberleſs multitude of other books, but without being ſupported by citations, or any other proof than the authority of Bale; ſo that the three or four hundred authors who, copying one another, have related this, ought to be reduced to a ſingle teſtimony, and that is Bale; a teſtimony manifeſtly exceptionable, ceptionable, as he wrote in open war againſt the Pope, and the Church of Rome in general. No court of Judicature in the world would admit the depoſitions of ſuch a witneſs, making oath that he has heard ſo or ſo; for when once the perſon appears to be an open enemy to the man he accuſes, the challenges of the party impeached would be declared valid. As therefore controverſial books are produced by the contending parties in a cauſe pleaded before the publick; it is certain that neither the teſtimony of a Proteſtant controverſial writer, with regard to an incident which reflects on the Roman Pontifs, nor the teſtimony of a Popiſh controverſial writer with reſpect to an incident that reflects on the Proteſtants, ought to be conſidered as any thing. The publick, who are the judges of ſuch cauſes, ought to reject all ſuch depoſitions, and pay no more regard to them than to things that never happened. Particular perſons are allowed, if once fully perſuaded of Bale's veracity and honour, to believe what he affirms; but then they ought to keep their belief to themſelves; and not exhibit it to the publick as a judicial proof of one's pretenſions againſt the adverſe party. This, in my opinion, is a circumſtance that is not ſufficiently obſerved.

§. (β) It was in the Pontificate of Leo X that Ulric de Hutten publiſhed his dialogue entitled Trias Romana. Now that author ſays as follows, in this ingenious ſatyr of the court of Rome; Tria, VADISCUS ait, pauciſſimi Romæ credunt, animarum immortalitem, communionem Sanctorum, & Infernorum Pœnas. ERNH. Perſuaſit. Exiſtimo enim, ſi animam crederent immortalem, utique eam excoleret quiſque, ejuſque commodis inſerviret, nunc corporis voluptatem in tantum ſectantur, ut animam premant modis omnibus. Illam verò beatorum communionem ſi quid facerent, etiam ejus participes eſſe vellent. Porrò de pœnis Infernorum vel verbum dicere inter præclaros hos Quirites pro anili eſt FABULA (*). " It is obſerved, that very few in Rome " believe three things, the immortality of the Soul, the " communion of Saints, and hell torments. For did " they believe the firſt, they would adorn it to the ut- " moſt of their power, and do all things for its ad- " vantage; inſtead of which they indulge ſo much in " bodily pleaſures, that they oppreſs the ſoul by all me- " thods poſſible. Then had they any value for the com- " munion of Saints, they would be partakers of it. Laſt- " ly, to mention but a word of hell torments before theſe " illuſtrious Romans, is looked upon as an old wife's FA- " BLE." This very probably may be the original of this ſtory. REM. CRIT.] Another ſtory is related, which is liable to the ſame objections as the firſt. It is ſaid that Leo hearing two men diſpute, one whereof denied, and the other aſſerted the immortality of the Soul, pronounced that the affirmative ſeemed true to him, but that the negative was more proper to give a man a chearful countenance. Leonis X Papæ dictum refert (Lutheras) qui audita diſputatione in qua unus immortalitatem animæ defendebat, alter oppugnabat, dixerit, tu quidem vera videris dicere, ſed adverſarii tui oratio facit bonum cultum, id eſt lætiorem mentem (Ital. buona cera) ex Epicuri ſcilicet ſententia. It is Luther ſays this (34). A perſon may, if he pleaſes, believe Luther; but then his teſtimony ought not to be admitted. He is a man who is engaged in open war with the Pope; he is an enemy perſecuted and excommunicated; the practice of courts of Judicature requires that his teſtimony ſhould be excepted againſt, and even that his oath ſhould be refuſed; he ought to prove his aſſertions or ſay nothing. A famous profeſſor of divinity in Zurick relates this incident on the authority of a book (35), that is as exceptionable as Luther himſelf. Qualis fuerit Leo . . . conſtabit . . . . ſi de ejus . . . . impietate & atheiſmo nonnihil attexuerimus. Ille ſcilicet ὑπόψηφος Johannis XXIV. animam in corporis domicilio ſic inſinuatam ſtatuentis, ut extra illum carcerem non duret; juſſit aliquando (uti Recuſat. " who ſuppoſed that the ſoul was ſo attached to the " body that it could not exiſt ſeparately from it, " commanded one day (as is manifeſt from Recuſat. Synod. Trid. par. 2. cauſ. 8. pag. 166) two mimic " Philoſophers, like buffoons, to ſtand oppoſite to " each other at a table; and to argue before him " concerning the immortality of the Soul, the one to " aſſert, and the other to deny it. The diſpute being " ended, and the deciſion of it referred to the Pon- " tiff, he pronounced concerning this conteſt as fol- " lows: Notwithſtanding that you, ſays he to the aſ- " ſertor, have offered fine and good reaſons, I never- " theleſs approve the opinion of this man (the denyer) " as the more ſolid, and what gives a man a more " chearful countenance." He afterwards relates the anſwer, which it is ſaid he made Bembus; and as he was fully ſenſible that all things of this kind ought to be proved by the teſtimony of Roman Catholick authors, he orders the matter thus; he quotes the famous Count of Mirandola's nephew: Et ne ab hæreticis hæc conficta clamitent οἱ ἐξ ἐναντίας, ejus rei αὐτόπτην & αὐτήκοον (37) teſtem damus, qui & ſcire debebat, & cauſam cur mentiretur non habebat, Johannis Pici, Mirandulani Comitis nepotem ex fratre minimè degenerem, qui in illo Piſani & Lateranſis Conſilii conflictu, quæſtionem tractans, utrùm Concilia vel Pontifices errare poſſint, inter alia de Leone hoc loquens: Meminimus, inquit, Pontificem creditum & adoratum, qui nullum Deum credens, omne infidelitatis (ἀθεότητος) culmen excederet: peſſimaque ejus opera in coëmendo Pontificatu, in omnigenis ſceleribus exercendis, id ipſum teſtabatur: ſed & peſſima quoque dicta confirmabant. Had Heidegger, who was happy in a good memory, remembered this, he would not have believed that John Francis Picus had been a witneſs to the impieties of Leo X. His miſtake may and ought to ſerve as a leſſon to a great number of others. I will conclude with obſerving that a Judge cannot, without infringing his duty, pronounce againſt this Pope, unleſs he has more authentic depoſitions. The reader will ſee in other remarks (44), whether thoſe who apologize for him argue juſtly.

[K] When news was brought of the ill ſucceſs the French had met with, it was ſaid, he died through exceſs of joy.] " Having lighted up anew the war be- " tween the Emperor Charles and the King of France, " in order to drive the French out of Italy; advice " was brought him at Magliano one of his country " ſeats, of the diſpoſſeſſing them of Milan and Parma, " which gave him ſuch an exceſs of joy, that he was " ſeized that very night with a ſlight fever, and died " of it a few days after (45)." Theſe are du Pleſſis's words. It is agreed by all Hiſtorians that Leo X felt a prodigious ſatisfaction at hearing this good news; but I do not find many who affirm that this was the cauſe of his death; and though many had affirmed it, I would not believe it; for thoſe who die through exceſs of joy, die ſuddenly, overpower'd, in all probability, by too great a flow of blood into the ventricles of the heart. If a perſon can withſtand the firſt impreſſions of a riſing joy, as the Pope did, he grows better afterward; ſo far from being ſeized with a dangerous fever, when other reaſons do not occaſion it. John Creſpin's relation ſeems much more probable; for he ſuppoſes that Leo's death was ſudden: but indeed not of that ſudden kind occaſioned by exceſs of joy. " Hearing that the French had been overcome " at Milan by the Emperor's forces, and driven out " of Italy, to which he indeed gave a helping hand; " as he was carouzing and indulging his appetite, and " rejoicing in an extraordinary manner at the news, " it is ſaid that he ſuddenly gave up the ghoſt, he who " always diſbelieved a heaven and hell after this " life (46)." The following diſtich (47),

Sacra ſub extrema ſi forte requiritis hora
Cur Leo non poterat ſumere? vendiderat.

" You aſk why Leo in his dying moments
" Could not receive the Sacraments? He had ſold 'em."

this diſtich, I ſay, alledged by that author favours the ſuppoſition of ſudden death; but it is nevertheleſs certain that the ſickneſs of which Leo X died, was of ſome days continuance (48). Famianus Strada has given two accounts of the death of this Pontiff (49); the one in Livy's ſtyle and the other in Tacitus's manner, both which are beautiful and elaborate.

I muſt here take notice of a miſtake of the tranſlator of Guicciardin. " Advice, ſays he, was brought, " that Pope Leo died ſuddenly the firſt of December. " For having received, in his Villa of Magliano, " whither he went often to divert himſelf, news of " the taking of Milan, he fell into ſuch an exceſs of " joy, that he was ſeized with a ſlight fever, that very " night; and being on this account carried to Rome " the next day, although the Phyſicians made light " at firſt of his indiſpoſition, he yet died in very few " days, not without a great ſuſpicion of his being " poiſoned, as it was ſaid, by Barnabas Maleſpina his " chamberlain, who was appointed to give him his " drink (50)." How abſurd is it to ſay, almoſt in the ſame period, that a perſon dies ſuddenly, and that he dies of a ſlight fever which the Phyſicians made light of at firſt? Guicciardin could not poſſibly have made ſuch a blunder, he not ſaying that he died ſuddenly mori di morte ineſpetata (51); nor has he connected the great joy of this Pope with the fever, as the cauſe with its effect. Ricevutone incredibile piacere; ſoprapreſo la notte medeſima di picciola febbre, e fattoſi il giorno ſequente portare à Roma &c. (52). This connection is more than a poetical licence of the tranſlator. It may be obſerved by the way, how cloſely the words of an original ought to be followed, when a perſon would tranſlate faithfully.

indulgences [M], proved the occaſion of the reformation eſtabliſhed by Luther, as is univerſally known. It is related by ſome writers, that he at firſt beſtowed the higheſt elogiums on that great Reformer [N]. [M] The ſordid traffic to which he reduced the diſtribution of indulgences.] A kind of monopoly was made of them; indulgences were let out to farm; and the Commiſſioners appointed to collect the monies, bought their employments of the Pope; and this done, they were extremely rigorous in their exactions, and had ſo little regard to decency, that the powers for releaſing ſouls out of purgatory were played for in taverns, as Guicciardin affirms. Haveva ſparſo per tutto il mondo, ſenza diſtintione di tempi e di luoghi, indulgentie ampliſſime, non ſolo per poter giovare coneſſe quelli, che ancora ſono nella vita preſente, ma con facultà di potere oltra queſto liberare l'anime de defunti dalla pene del Purgatorio: lequali, percha era notorio che ſi concedevano ſolamente per eſtorquere danari da gli huomini; & eſſendo eſſercitate imprudentemente da Commiſſarii deputati a queſta eſattione, la più parte de' quali comperavi dalla Corte la facultà di eſſercitare; haveva concitato in molti luoghi indignatione, e ſcandalo aſſai, e ſpecialmente nella Germania, dove a molti de' miniſtri era veduto vendere per poco prezzo, ò giocarſi ſur le taverne la faculta del liberare l'anime d' morti dal Purgatorio (54). i. e. "He diſperſed throughout the whole "world, without any regard to times or places, very "ample indulgences, not only for the advantage of "the preſent life, but endued with a power to free "the ſouls of the dead from the pains of purgatory; "which, as it was notorious that they were granted "in no other view but to draw money out of peo"ple's pockets, and were levied imprudently by "Commiſſioners appointed for that purpoſe, moſt of "whom bought their employments of the Court of "Rome; they therefore occaſioned in many places, "great indignation and ſcandal, particularly in Ger"many, where they were ſold for little or nothing; "and the power of freeing the ſouls of the dead from "purgatory, was played for in taverns." The diſcontent of the people increaſed, when it was known to what uſe theſe ſums were applied; for moſt of the money levied in Germany was for the uſe of the Pope's ſiſter.

[N] It is related by ſome writers, that he at firſt beſtowed the higheſt elogiums on that great reformer.] This circumſtance would have been little known, had not Colomeſius mentioned it. Mr. de Seckendorf (55) learnt it from him; he having been told by a counſellor of Spire, that it was in the Opuſcula of Colomeſius. The paſſage is this. "Voſſius having told me, that "he remembred to have read, in the tragical hiſtories "of Bandelli, an elogium beſtowed on Luther by Pope "Leo X, I went immediately into his library, where "turning over that author's hiſtories, I met with the "following words in the preface to the twenty fifth "novel of the third part: *Nel principio che la Setta "Lutherana comincio à germogliare, eſſendo di brigata "molti Gentilhuomini, ne l'hora del meriggio, in caſa "del noſtro virtuoſo Signor L. [O] I do not find that Guicciardin laſhes this Pontiff with ſo much ſeverity as Varillas inſinuates.] This author wrote a great number of books againſt the houſe of Auſtria, which perhaps would have been printed, if Mr. Colbert had not repreſented, after the peace of the Pyrenees, that it would be no ways decent to diſguſt the Spaniards, by permitting the impreſſion of ſo many volumes filled with ſuch injurious particulars. The plan of this voluminous work has been ſeen in a piece entitled, La Politique de la Maiſon d'Autriche (the politicks of the houſe of Auſtria.) The author ſets out with a kind of apology, for the liberty he has taken to touch upon the vices of Princes. I only, ſays he (57), imitate the ſtyle, and copy the reverſe of the picture which Livy drew of Hannibal (*); and I have fallen ſo ſhort of it, that the reader will not meet with a perſon of what rank or quality ſoever, ſo injuriouſly treated in my work, as Pope Leo X is in the elogium which Guicciardin has made of him (†), and for which he was not any way reproved that I can find (‡). It is plain that this elogium of Leo X is repreſented as a very ſatyrical piece; otherwiſe it would be abſurd to mention his example. Now it is certain that we do not meet with any thing in Guicciardin, which anſwers to this idea. The twelfth book cited by Varillas, is leſs to his purpoſe than the two following. It is in the thirteenth book that we have an account of the trade of indulgences, as has been already ſeen; and in the fourteenth a cenſure of this Pope for ſquandring ſuch ſums, and for being ſo fond of muſick and farcical entertainments (58). Egli per natura dedito all' ocio, & a' piaceri, & hora per la troppa licenza, e grandezza alieno ſopra modo dalle facende, immerſo ad udire tuttol' giorno muſiche, facetie, e buffoni, inclinato ancora troppo più che l'honneſta a piaceri: pareva doveſſe eſſere totalmente alieno dalle guerre. i. e. "Being naturally prone to "idleneſs and fond of pleaſure; and now, by the ex"alted height he had attained, being utterly averſe "to buſineſs; ſpending whole days in hearing muſick, "jeſts and buffoonries; and being too much devoted "to his pleaſures, it was judged that he would be to"tally averſe to war." Quali ſorte di buffonerie, e di facetie piaceſſero a Papa Leone; ſi può raccoglier dal lib. 4. della vita di lui del Giovio: dove pone, che furon recitate Comedie, ſi fece profeſſion di fare impazziro huomini, & altre piacevolezze tali: onde il Taraſcone ſi perſuaſe d'eſſere gran Muſico, il Baraballo fu laureato Poeta, e mandato ſu l'Elefante, & i Paraſiti furon ſommamente favoriti. i. e. "What kind of buffoonries "were moſt pleaſing to Pope Leo X may be gathered "from book IV of his life written by Paulus Jovius, "who ſays, that they acted plays; that they made it "their buſineſs to make ſome ſelf-conceited men quite "frantic, and ſuch like extravagancies; whence Ta"raſcone imagined himſelf to be a great muſician; "Baraballo was created Poet Laureat and rode upon "the Elephant; and paraſites were highly favoured." In a word, we find in the XIV book a general judgment on the conduct of this Pope; but this is a compoſition of praiſes and cenſures; and cannot paſs for ſatyrical, nor even diſreſpectful. Guicciardin's words are as follow: Principe nel quale erano degne di laude, e di vituperio molte coſe, e che ingannò aſſai l'eſpettatione, che quando fu aſſunto al Ponteficato s'haveva di lui: conciofia ch' criuſciſſe di maggior prudenza, ma di molto minore bonta di quello ch'era giudicato da tutti)59). i. e. "A Prince who poſſeſſed many good and many "ill qualities; and who greatly deceived the expecta"tion, which people entertained of him when he was "raiſed to the Pontificate; he diſplaying more wiſ"dom and much leſs goodneſs than the world had "imagined." When this hiſtorian ſpeaks of the election of Leo X, he does it in ſuch a manner as is extremely glorious to this Pope. He owns that it was no way ſimoniacal, or bad; and that not the leaſt objection could be made to the moral conduct of the cardinal elected. Senti di queſta elettione quaſi tutta la Chriſtianità, grandiſſimo piacere, perſuadendoſi univerſalmente gli homini che haveſſe a eſſere rariſſimo Pontefice, per la chiara memoria del valore paterno, e

[P] The apology of Paulus Jovius appears to me very weak.] The methods this author takes to juſtify Leo X may be reduced to four, I. He ſays that it was not from a vicious nature, but from a ſoft, eaſy and generous temper that this Pope, ſurrounded with perſons of a voluptuous turn, immerſed himſelf a little too much in pleaſures (61). This is but a poor excuſe, and many common proſtitutes might be juſtified from that way of reaſoning. They are not naturally wicked, brutal or cruel, but their too great good nature, eaſy temper and complaiſance, is the occaſion of their falling into the tempter's ſnare. I will obſerve by the way, that Politian ſays wonders of Leo X, in a letter which he wrote to Pope Innocent VIII, when this youth was honoured with the purple. Ita natus & factus, ita altus atque educatus, ita denique eruditus atque inſtitutus hic eſt, ut nemini ſecundus ingenio, nec æqualibus induſtria, nec præceptoribus literatura, neque gravitate ſenibus conceſſerit. Nativa in eo probitas, & genuina: diligentia quoque parentis ita impenſe culta eſt, ut ex illius ore non modo non verbum dictu fœdius, ſed ne levius quidem unquam aut etiam licentius exciderit. Non actio, non geſtus, non inceſſus, in illo notatus: non aliud poſtremo quod in deteriorem partem conſpiceretur. Sic in viridi ætate cana maturitas, ut qui loquentem ſenes audiant, proavitam in eo, nos paternam certe indolem agnoſcamus. Cultum pietatis & religionis pene etiam cum lacte nutricis exſuxit: etiam tum ab incunabulis ſacra meditatus officia (29). i. e. " This youth was ſo " formed by nature and education, that not being in- " ferior to any one in genius, he does not yield to his " equals in induſtry; to his preceptors in erudition; " nor to old men in gravity. He is naturally honeſt " and ſincere; and educated in ſo ſtrict a manner by " his father, that never drops a looſe expreſſion, or " even a light one. No action, geſture or gait, or a- " ny other circumſtance, diſtinguiſhed him in ſuch a " manner, as might give an ill impreſſion of him. " His judgment appears ſo ripe and mature, though " he be extremely young, that whenever old men hear " him talk, they revere him as a parent. Together " with his nurſe's milk he ſucked in piety and reli- " gion; preparing himſelf, even from his cradle, for " the holy office." Paulus Jovius ſays in the place, that Leo, if compared with his predeceſſors, will be found extremely chaſte. Si aliqua ex parte eo nomine ſugillari inclyta virtus potuit, Leo certè cum ſuperiorum principum fama comparatus æſtimatione rectiſſima continentiæ laudem feret (63). This excuſe is not much better than the other. III. He ſays that this Pontiff having been renowned for his continence, ſecured himſelf at laſt from the temptations of impurity, by diſcontinuing to indulge himſelf in high feeding, and by regular faſtings, Conſtat tamen eum, quod à prima adoleſcentia opinione omnium ſummam continentiæ laudem fuiſſet adeptus, non importuna quædam pudicitiæ caſtitatique præſidia quæſiviſſe: quando nequaquam priſtinæ vitæ more tam multis delicatiſque obſoniis uteretur: Itemque animo verè pudico die mercurii carnes non edere, die autem Veneris nihil guſtare præter legumen & olera, ac die demum Saturni cœna penitus abſtinere, incorrupta lege inſtituiſſet (64). i. e. " It is nevertheleſs certain, that " having gained an univerſal good reputation for con- " tinence from his youth, he did not look out for any " importunate guardians of his modeſty and chaſtity, " ſince he no longer indulged himſelf in eating of " ſuch a variety of dainties as formerly: For he did " not eat fleſh on Wedneſdays; on Fridays he fed on " nothing but pulſe and herbs, and on Saturdays he " did not ſo much as break his faſt; which courſe of " life he never ſwerved from." This exceeds all the reſt. In fine, he ſays that a great difference ought to be made between the vices which belong to a ſovereign as ſuch, and thoſe which belong to him as a man. And he inſtances the emperor Trajan, who was ſo dear to the people of Rome, that it was the height of their wiſhes, that the ſucceeding emperors ſhould reign as well as he; and yet Trajan's drunkenneſs and ſodomitical practices were well known. The meaning of this is, that the vices of Leo X were not repugnant to the qualities of a good Prince; but only to thoſe of a good Chriſtian; and therefore that we ought to pardon the irregularities of his youth, ſince they did not prevent his being a good Prince. Alia principis, alia hominis eſſe vitia quis neſcit? hæc uni privata conditione quum noceant, etiam aliquibus fortaſſe proſunt: illa verò ab dira poteſtate, & luctum & calamitatem univerſis mortalibus apportant: idque veriſſimum eſſe conſtat præclaro quondam populi Romani teſtimonio, qui neminem ſibi principem Trajano meliorem exoptavit, quanquam eum illicitæ libidinis ac ebrietatis cenſura notaſſet. Sed demus aliquid humanitati Leonis, uti in ſumma licentia fervidæ ætatis ac proſperæ valetudinis æſtum ægerrimè ſuſtinenti, poſtquam in magnis ſalutaribuſque virtutibus optimi atque benefici cognomentum facile meruerit (65).

Generally ſpeaking, this author's maxim is true. It is very poſſible for a Prince to be a good, a worthy man, and at the ſame time a poor Monarch; that is a Monarch who is not able to cauſe the Laws to be executed with vigour, nor to heal the diſorders and evils of the State. On the other hand, it is very poſſible for a Prince to deviate very much from the rules of morality, which preſcribe the duties of perſons; and nevertheleſs he may be a good Monarch; that is, a Monarch who maintains order in his Kingdom; and who enacts, with wiſdom, rewards and puniſhments, without loading his people with taxes, and pecuniary edicts. But it is very rare that a voluptuous and prodigal Monarch, like Leo X, is a good Prince; to ſupply his expences he muſt load his ſubjects with taxes; and he generally diſpenſes his favours, according to the caprice of thoſe who adminiſter to his pleaſures; and conſequently to unworthy perſons, whoſe evil conduct he has not time to puniſh, he being too much taken up with his pleaſures, to allow the functions of his kingly dignity the application which it requires. One might eaſily prove, that the ſubjects of Leo X were greatly loaded. Farther, it ought to be conſidered that Leo's chief dignity was a ſacred and eccleſiaſtical dignity. To know therefore whether he diſcharged his duty, the chief queſtion is not whether he has done what his temporal dignity required; it will be impoſſible to juſtify him, but by ſhewing that he diligently diſcharged the duty of his other function, that is, obſerved the precepts of the Goſpel, and did all that lay in his power to make others practiſe them. Theſe are his chief functions, and here his apologiſt is obliged to forſake him. In his vero quæ rem divinam reſpicerent, nequaquam ſecunda fama prægravari eſt viſus. Nam indulgentias vetera Pontificum ad parandam pecuniam inſtrumenta adeo plene atque affluenter provinciis dedit, ut fidem ſacroſanctæ poteſtatis elevare videretur (66). i. e. " He does not ſeem to have a " good character as to divine matters; for he was " ſo extremely profuſe of indulgences (old inſtru- " ments by which the Pontiffs raiſe money) that the " credit of the ſacred authority ſeems to have been " leſſened by him."

A reflection on the uniting the temporal and ſpiritual authority in one perſon.

I will obſerve by the way, that this uniting of the temporal and ſpiritual authority in the ſame perſon, is generally the ruin of the evangelical ſpirit. The heathens had this mixture of characters,

Rex Anius Rex idem hominum Phœbique ſacerdos (67).
That is,
" Anius a King, and likewiſe Phœbus' Prieſt."

be considered as an Atheist (e); but the rest of the Apologists have not succeeded much better [Q]. Varillas alone is sufficient to refute himself. I will copy a long passage from his Anecdotes, which contain a pretty just character, though in a concise way, of Leo X [R], and whence I entreat my readers to supply, whatever may be wanting in the (e) Voetius, Disputat. tom. 1. pag. 204.

This mixture was not unuseful to the temporal good of Religion, and it has remarkably served the same ends under the Christian dispensation; but then it has occasioned an extreme corruption of manners. The ecclesiastical character ought to prevail and be predominant, since the other dignity is only an adjunct; and nevertheless it is generally swallowed up by its collegue. The joining of these two offices together, is joining a dead to a living body, a fatal conjunction, where the carcass communicates its rottenness and stench to the living body, and receives vital influence from it.

Tormenti genus! & sanie tabeque fluentes
Complexu in misero, longa sic morte necabat (68).

DRYDEN.

The world, the flesh, the weak part draws the resolutions and conclusions after it; the same as in a syllogism, the weakest of the two first propositions is the rule of the consequence or conclusion (69). The author of the Critique Generale (70) speaking of the distinction that has been invented between a Pope who pronounces ex Cathedra, and the same Pope who speaks in another manner, has given us the following smart jest of a peasant in the Electorate of Colen. I thought for a very long time that this jest had been preserved only traditionally, but I was mistaken, it having been printed above a century ago in books of a serious and grave character. Duaren has inserted it in one of his pieces (71), and copied it from Fulgosius (72). Here follows the whole story from old French. It is true indeed that an Elector of Colen is not expresly named. " There is a very merry story " of a German peasant, who, being at work in a " field of his, saw his Bishop pass by, with a long " train more becoming a Prince, than one who called " himself the successor or deputy of an Apostle. Being greatly scandalized at this, he could not forbear " laughing, and laughed so loud, that Sir Reverend " enquired the reason of it. The peasant answered " in his natural character, that is truly and simply; " I laugh when I think of St. Peter and St. Paul, " and see Thee in this geer. How is that, says the " Bishop? Do you ask how, says the rustic? It was " very silly in them to trudge alone on foot through " the world, as they were the head of the Christian " Church, and deputies of Christ Jesus the King of " Kings: whilst thou, who art no more than our Bishop, art so well mounted, and hast so long a train " of bravoes, that thou resemblest a Prince more than " a Pastor of the Church. Here Sir Reverend replied: But friend, thou dost not consider that I am " a Count and Baron as well as thy Bishop. This " made the clown laugh louder than before, when " the Bishop asking him the reason of it, he answered; But, Zir; when this Count and Baron you " are speaking of shall be in hell, where will the " Bishop be? This so confounded the Right Reverend, " that he rode away without speaking a word (73)."

[Q] The rest of the Apologists have not succeeded much better.] I will speak a word or two concerning the manner in which some authors have endeavoured to justify Leo X as to the article of impiety. Coeffeteau (74) produces no other apology but the following words of Onuphrius Panvinius (75): Erat rerum divinarum diligens observator. i. e. " He was a diligent observer of religious ceremonies, &c." Rivet (76) answers thus: " There are many profane persons and atheists, who observe very exactly all the " ceremonies of Religion, in order to conceal their " impiety under this foliage, who, among friends, " say they are ad morem, non ad rem; legibus justæ, " non Diis gratæ. Sannazarius, who makes him die " without receiving the Sacraments, because he had " sold them before, does not represent him in the " light which Onuphrius would do." It is to be observed particularly, that Sannazarius does not say that Leo refused the Sacraments. If this Pope did not receive the Sacraments &c. upon his death-bed, it was because he was light-headed. James Gretser, besides the words of Panvinius, alledges Leo Xth's bull against Luther. Bulla qua Leo Lutheri errores damnat, immanem hanc pseudologiam perspicuè redarguit (77). i. e. " That bull in which Leo condemns Luther's " errors, evidently refutes this egregious false asser- " tion." But this is pitiful; for though this Pope had had no Religion, he yet would have followed the ordinary style in his bull; and have displayed great zeal against a heretick, who contested with him an authority on which all his temporal felicity depended. Palavicino (78) endeavouring to take off the reproach which Father Paul makes to this Pope, viz. of his having very little regard to religion and piety: Sarebbe stato un perfetto Pontefice, se con queste havesse congiunto qualche cognitione delle cose della religione, & alquanto piu d'inclinatione alla pieta: deli' una & dell' altra delle quali non mostrava haver gran cura (79). Palavicino, I say, in his endeavours to take off this reproach, does three things. He alledges, 1. The testimony of Politian (80); 2dly, that Pope's fasting; 3dly, the majesty and good grace with which Leo solemnized mass. The second of these three particulars, if the fact be really as Paulus Jovius has told it (81), is, in my opinion, a good proof of religion, when we weigh well the several circumstances of it. The first is nothing; for children, till they come to a certain age, are always persuaded of the truth of the lessons of their catechists, and raise no objections to them. If they become impious, it is when they are from under the tuition of their preceptors; and when they corrupt themselves, either by bad company, or by following a false philosophy. The last circumstance is rather a corporal talent, than an indication of the persuasion of the soul. Let us see what Paulus Jovius says on this occasion. Sacra confecit, singulaque ceremoniarum obivit munia singulari cum majestate, ut non falso nemo superiorum Pontificum eo augustius & decentius sacrificasse diceretur (82). i. e. " He solemnized " the several religious ceremonies with so singular a " majesty, that it was justly said none of the Pontiffs " his predecessors celebrated them with greater." It is very probable that Onuphrius means only this, when he says, fuit rerum divinarum diligens observator, & sacris ceremoniis deditus: this being such a proof of piety as is altogether ambiguous and equivocal.

[R] I will copy a long passage from Varillas's Anecdotes, which contain a pretty just character, though in a concise way, of Leo X.] It is in the Preface to that work, and is as follows. " Guicciardin . . . . . exhibits this Pope to us (*), as a perfect model of " modern Politicks, and the greatest statesman of his " age. He makes him superiour to King Ferdinand " the Catholick; and causes him to triumph, in his " younger years, over the artifices of that old usurper. It is to him he ascribes the secret of causing " all his designs to be seconded by the council of Spain, " whether they would or no. After having established these wonderful principles, there are no shining " virtues but what heighten and illustrate the picture " of Leo X. He formed, at but twelve years of " age when he was created Cardinal, those vast pro- " jects which he afterwards put in execution, when " he was raised to the pontifical chair (†). He ne- " gotiates with the states of Venice to save the ruins " of his house, which had not been able to withstand " our Charles VIII. The seeing his brother drowned " as he was crossing a river, had not the power to " make him change his resolution. He thought of " nothing but the bringing up an only son, (in the cradle) whom this brother had left; and thereupon " he returns to Rome, where, by his intrigues, he " gains the favour of Pope Julius II, and they occa- " sioned

the text of this article. Varillas is alſo miſtaken with regard to Paulus Jovius [S].

The Literati, of what Religion or Country they may be, ought to praiſe and bleſs this Pope's memory, for the great zeal he ſhewed, in recovering the manuſcripts of the Antients. He was not ſparing of his care, nor of his money, in making the reſearches in queſtion, and to procure very good editions. I have two Anecdote Letters that prove this [T], and

" ſioned his being appointed Legate in the army de-" ſigned to drive the French out of Italy. He is " taken priſoner in the battle of Ravenna, but makes " his eſcape in a happy juncture, Julius II. expiring
" juſt at that time. He goes into the Conclave, where " he takes ſo much advantage of the caprice of the " young Cardinals, who had flattered themſelves with
" the hopes of electing a juvenile Pope, that he cauſes
" them to give their votes in his favour. He joins " with the Spaniards; and is tender of their friend" ſhip ſo long as it is of ſervice to ſettle his houſe in
" the chief employments of magiſtracy in Florence;
" but the inſtant fortune frowns on them, and that he " finds their council does not care to let him uſurp
" the dukedom of Urbino, in order to inveſt his " nephew with it, he treats with the French on that " condition; he draws up the famous concordate, in " which he eludes the ſtratagems and long experience
" of Chancellour du Prat; he diſcovers the higheſt
" friendſhip for Francis I, ſo long as that Monarch
" is able to do him ſervice; but the inſtant he has " obtained his deſires, he abandons him, in order to " be reconciled to Charles V. He projects a league
" with this Monarch, in order to eſtabliſh the Sforza's
" in the Dukedom of Milan. He ſucceeds in it ſooner
" than he expected; and is fired with ſuch an exceſs
" of joy as kills him at receiving this News."

[S] Varillas is alſo miſtaken with regard to Paulus Jovius.] This hiſtorian, if Varillas is to be credited, has not ſo much written a hiſtory as a ſatyr with regard to Leo X. " Paulus Jovius, ſays he (83), re-
" preſents him as a man of a violent ſpirit, and who " would gain every thing by forcible methods. He " declares him to have been fired with the ſame mar
" tial diſpoſition as his predeceſſor Julius II. He " makes him entertain, even before his exaltation, a
" diſdainful contempt for all the reſt of the ſacred
" College, founded on an imaginary precedency of " the houſe of Medicis over the reſt of Italy. He " brings in this contempt into all actions of ſplen-
" dor, and even the moſt auguſt ceremonies; he " looks upon it as the ſource and foundation of the " obſtinate war which was waged againſt the Duke of " Urbino, and of the other quarrels which broke out " in the whole courſe of his Pontificate; in a word
" he declares that vanity, but a haughty, diſtaſteful
" vanity, was his predominant paſſion. If you were " very deſirous of knowing how it was poſſible for " Paulus Jovius to pierce ſo far into Leo's mind, as " to form ſo deciſive a judgment of it, he himſelf
" anſwers before hand, that he had been this Pope's " creature; that it was he who made him leave the " ſtudy of phyſick, and the pretenſions to a chair in
" Padua, to devote himſelf to an eccleſiaſtical life;
" who made him Biſhop of Como; who choſe him
" for his confident, and to aſſiſt in thoſe councils
" where the moſt important and moſt ſecret reſolu-
" tions were taken; who engaged him to write the " hiſtory of his own time; who employed his good " offices for him in France and Spain, in order that " ſuch authentick pieces might be communicated to " him, as he believed were neceſſary for improving
" his work; and who revealed his whole ſoul to " him, in frequent and familiar converſations." The reader has ſeen in the foregoing remarks, that Paulus Jovius does not conceal the faults of Leo X; but it is certain that the vice of which Varillas ſpeaks is that, of all others, the leaſt, which Paulus Jovius imputes to him. It is even certain that he declares him poſſeſſed of the oppoſite virtue. Pontifex, ſays he (84), cujus mite ingenium facilemque naturam in ſpecimen cæterarum virtutum omnes illo tempore laudabant, clementius agendum ſibi . . . exiſtimavit. i. e. " The Pope,
" whoſe gentle diſpoſition and eaſy nature were ap" plauded by all, as a ſpecimen of the reſt of the " virtues he poſſeſſed, was of opinion that it was in-
" cumbent on him to ſhew a litte clemency." This author was never Biſhop of Como; and was made a Biſhop (85) by Clement VII. and not by Leo X. This intimate confidence and admiſſion to the moſt ſecret councils are, in my opinion, a mere romantic fiction: and I have not found the leaſt footſteps of them in the writings of Paulus Jovius.

(83) Preface to the Anecdotes of Florence. He cites Paulus Jovius, in his book, and the particular elogium of Leo X. Both theſe are unexact citations; the general Hiſtory of Paulus Jovius including ſeveral books; and he not having written a particular elogium, but the Life of this Pope.

[T] I have two anecdote letters which prove this.] They were communicated to me by Mr. de Seidel, privy councellor to his Pruſſian Majeſty. His father left him a fine library, which he has enlarged very conſiderably, and particularly with ſcarce books and manuſcripts. He brought ſeveral from Greece, in a voyage he made thither. He is worthy in all reſpects of poſſeſſing ſuch a treaſure, he being a gentleman of profound erudition, and who takes great delight in favouring the ſciences. The copy which he was ſo good as to ſend me of Leo the Xth's letter, is faithful and extremely accurate; and the originals, in Sadolet's own hand-writing, are ſtill extant. It may be obſerved by the way, that there was printed in Nova literaria Maris Balthici & Septentrionis (86), for November 1699, a letter written, on a like account, to his Daniſh Majeſty by Leo X. the 8th of November 1517. " Venerable brother, health and apoſtolical bleſ- " ſing. We ſend our beloved ſon John Heytmers de " Zonvelben, Clerk of the Dioceſs of Leige, our " Commiſſary and that of the Apoſtolical See, to the " renowned Nations of Germany, Denmark, Sweden, " Norway and Gothland; to ſearch for ſuch ancient " books of value as were loſt by the injury of time, " wherein we are not ſparing of expence, only that, " as we purpoſed from the beginning of our Ponti- " ficate, ſolely with the view to promote the honour " and glory of the moſt high, we by the aſſiſtance " of heaven, may cheriſh, raiſe, and aſſiſt men who " excell in any talent, particularly the learned. We " have been told, that there are, either in your poſ " ſeſſion, or the places ſubject to you, a great number " of ſuch ancient books, and particularly relating to " the Roman hiſtory, which would be very acceptable to us. As therefore we deſign to procure the " publication of as many of the books in queſtion as " we can get, for the common benefit of the Literati " in general; we therefore exhort you in the moſt " affectionate manner, and beſeech you in the Lord, " that if you ever propoſe to yourſelf the perform- " ing of a grateful action, that you would ſend to us, " with all imaginable ſpeed, accurate and faithful co- " pies of all thoſe ancient books, or rather the books " themſelves, which ſhall be ſent back to you as ſoon " as copied here, purſuant to an inſtrument or obliga- " tion drawn up by our apoſtolical chamber; or " ſuch as the aforeſaid John our Commiſſary, bearer " of the preſent letters, who has ample inſtructions " for that purpoſe, ſhall think proper to be drawn " up in the name of the ſaid chamber. And becauſe " the ſaid John promiſed us to deliver, in a little " time, the thirty third book of Livy, relating to " the Macedonian war, we have ordered him to put " it into yonr hands; in order that it may he ſent " as ſoon as poſſible, by a faithful meſſenger, either " to us, or our beloved ſon Philip Beroaldus, library " keeper of our apoſtolical palace. And becauſe we " have ordered that the ſaid John ſhould be paid a " certain ſum of money, in this city, and that we " owe him a certain ſum, for expences made and to " be made; we will, commiſſion and command you, " after you ſhall have received the aforeſaid book " of Livy, to pay or cauſe to be paid, an hundred " and forty ſeven gold Ducats of the chamber, from " the monies ariſing out of indulgences granted in " thoſe provinces, for the Church of the Prince " of Apoſtles; which ſum of money we will admit " or allow in the accounts between yourſelf and the " apoſtolical chamber; as we now allow, and com- " mand to be allowed by theſe preſents. Farther, " you muſt favour the aforeſaid John with ſafe con- " ducts; and aſſiſt him, through your provinces, in " diſcovering Books; and, if it be neceſſary, engage " your word for him, that the books in queſtion ſhall " be reſtored by us at a certain limited time, and " ſent to the places to which they reſpectively belong. " If you ſhall perform this, as we are entirely per- " ſuaded you will, you will thereby gain great " fame among the learned, and do a thing that " will be extremely agreeable to us. This is the firſt of the two letters in queſtion, and here follows the ſecond. From ſome particulars in it we may juſtly ſuppoſe that the whole hiſtory of Livy was then in being. Mr. de Seidel has been credibly informed, that it is thought that a canon of Magdeburg, at that time one of the miniſters of ſtate, to the Marquis Joachim Frederick, adminiſtrator of the Archbiſhoprick, took advantage, of the confuſion things were then in; and ſtole from the publick library ſeveral manuſcripts, and particularly Livy, in order to enrich his own. His heirs preſerved it; but they concealed to the utmoſt of their power, ſuch manuſcripts as were put into it by unlawful means. At laſt, the whole was deſtroyed when the city was plundered in the year 1631.

In 1588 he drew up the rules of the diſcalceate Friars, who began then to appear under the name of Recollects. He was made Vicar-General of the Order and Provincial, the 22d of Auguſt 1591; and died the next day [A] at Madrid, aged ſixty four years. " whom we lately appointed, for the ſearching after " antient books, ſpecial Nuntio and Commiſſary from " us and the Apoſtolical See, to the renowned nations " of Germany, Denmark, Sweden and Gothland; " that letters had been ſent him by a perſon whom he " had appointed for that purpoſe, by which he tells " him, that he had found, in your library, an antient " manuſcript containing all Livy's Decads; and that " he had got your leave to copy them; not being per- " mitted to have the original book. We applaud " your condeſcenſion and obedience to the Apoſtolical " See. But, beloved ſons, it was our intention, from " our firſt acceſſion to the Pontificate, to raiſe and pa- " tronize, with the aſſiſtance of heaven, men who " excel in any talent, and particularly perſons of eru- " dition. In this view, we get as many as we can " of theſe ſo much wanted antient books, which are " firſt corrected by men of vaſt erudition, of whom, " God be praiſed, there are now great numbers in " our Court; and afterwards very carefully printed at " our expence, for the common advantage of the Li- " terati. But if we do not get the original books " themſelves, our views will not be compleatly an- " ſwered; becauſe theſe books, if only copies of them " are inſpected, cannot be publiſhed correctly. We " have ordered, in our Apoſtolical Chamber, that a " ſufficient ſecurity be given, that ſuch books ſhall " be returned whole and undamaged to their reſpective " owners, after they have been tranſcribed here; and " the ſaid John, whom we have again deputed for the " aforementioned purpoſe, has a ſufficient mandate or " order to the ſame chamber, to oblige it to make the " ſaid reſtitution, in ſuch manner and form as he ſhall " judge proper. And, " that they might be ſenſible that this theft was rather " of benefit than a loſs to them, we tranſmitted to " them a perpetual indulgence for the Church of their " monaſtery. For this reaſon, with all imaginable " affection, and by virtue of holy obedience, we ad- " moniſh, exhort, and with ſincere charity in the Lord " require, you and any of you, that if you ever deſign " to do any thing to oblige us, ye would ſuffer the " ſaid John to have acceſs to your library, and per- " mit him to ſend us from thence the ſaid book of " Livy, as well as any other he ſhall judge proper, " all which ſhall be ſafely ſent back by us, with a con- " ſiderable reward. I know not whether Elſſius did not mean, that Lewis de Leon had been ſome years Vicar-General of the Order, but that he was not appointed Provincial till the night before he died. LEON (PETER CIECA DE) author of a Hiſtory of Peru. He left Spain, his native country, at thirteen years of age, in order to go into America, where he reſided ſeventeen years (a); and obſerved ſo many remarkable things in it, that he reſolved to commit them to writing. I will mention ſome of them, though it were only to ſhew the injuſtice of thoſe who aſſert, that the Chriſtians taught the Americans to be wicked [A]. Such an aſſertion cannot be true but with a great many reſtrictions. Poſſibly

[A] I will mention ſome of them, though it were only to ſhew the injuſtice of thoſe, who aſſert, that the Chriſtians taught the Americans to be wicked.] He ſays that the great Lords of the valley of Nora, endeavoured to diſpoſſeſs their enemies of as many of their women as they could poſſibly; that they lay with them, and that they fed the children they had by them in the moſt delicate manner; but that when they were twelve or thirteen years old, and were grown very fat, they killed and eat them, and that this was delicious food to the people in queſtion (1). I will now ſpeak of the manner in which the inhabitants of this country treated their priſoners of war. They made them ſlaves; obliged them to marry, and eat all the children ſprung from theſe marriages, and afterwards eat the ſlaves themſelves when they were no longer able to get children. Mangiavano i figliuoli de quei ſchiavi, & poi mangiavano gli iſteſſi ſchiavi quando erane tanto vecchi che non potevano generare (2). The firſt time that the Spaniards entered this valley, a Lord named Nabonuco came to them in a very amicable way, accompanied by ſome women. Night being come, two of them laid themſelves at full length on a carpet; another laid herſelf croſs wiſe to ſerve as a pillow for Nabonuco, whilſt the other two ſerved him as a matreſs. He then laid himſelf down on theſe two, and took a fourth woman, who was very beautiful, by the hand; and being aſked what he intended to do with her, he anſwered that he would eat her, and alſo to feed upon a child ſhe had had (3). The author obſerves, that in the country of Quito, the women uſed to till the ground, and get the harveſt in; and that the men were wholly employed in ſpinning, and affairs of the houſe (4). The Sun was worſhipped in Peru, and one of the chief acts of adoration was to offer him ſix teeth, which the worſhippers had pulled out of their heads (5). In many provinces of this country, the people had extinguiſhed all the ideas of honour with reſpect to chaſtity. One of their diverſions was to ſing the illuſtrious actions of their anceſtors; which was done by dancing to the ſound of a Drum, and by drinking till they had quite intoxicated themſelves, after which they ſingled out any woman they liked, and enjoyed her uncenſured by any one. Alcuni pigliano quelle donne, che gli piacciono, & condottele in certe caſe, sfuocano con quelle la lor luſſuria, non ſe lo recando à biaſmo, perche non conoſcono qual dona ſi conſerva con la verecondia, ne tengono conto di honore, e manco riguardano al mondo (6). This we ſhould ſtrongly obſerve to thoſe, who ſpeak ſo much in favour of the good morals of the Americans; and who pretend that we have taught thoſe nations to be wicked, ever ſince we brought them the light of the Goſpel. The greateſt debauchees among the Spaniards had never ſeen in their native country, what they ſaw in the new-diſcovered world; I mean the women run after them in furious tranſports of luſt, and provided them with certain ſecrets or charms to heighten the pleaſure. Here follows an Italian paſſage on that ſubject: Nell' Iſtorie del l' Indie narra Amerigo Veſpucci d'eſſer capitato ad una certa coſta, dove trovò femmine di tanta libidine, che come ſpiritate correvano dietro a' ſuoi marinari, perche uſaſſero con eſſo loro: e dice, che havevano un ſugo di non sò che erba, col quale bagnando le parti genitali de gli huomini, non ſolo cagionano, ut citius, ac ſæpius erigerent, ſed etiam quod eorum penis in inſolitam excreſceret magnitudinem: il che piaceva loro mirabilmente (7).

What follows is much worſe. The author relates that, in the province of Carthagena, the men, (if the women they are to marry have their maidenheads) conſider this as a blemiſh; and for this reaſon they do not conſummate the marriage till ſhe has been well cleanſed of this ſtain by her relations or friends. In ſome places this good office is done by the mother; but to prevent frauds, it muſt be done in preſence of witneſſes. In certe parti della provincia Cartagena, quando maritano le figlivole, e che la ſpoſa dove andare à marito, la madre della giovane in preſentia d'alcuni ſuoi parenti le toglie la virginità con le dita, ſi che riputavano, che fuſſe piu honoro mandarla à marito coſi corotta, che non la ſua virginità. Ma tra queſti coſtumi uſati da loro, era miglior di alcune terre, che i parenti, ò amici, toglievano la virginita alla giovane, & con queſta conditione la maritavano, & il marito la riceveva (8). Diodorus Siculus aſcribes the ſame practice to the inhabitants of the iſlands we now call Majorca and Minorca (9). He affirms that, at their weddings, the bridegroom never enjoyed his bride till all the relations and friends, who were invited to the nuptials, had enjoyed her, each according to the precedency which his age gave him (10). It is very ſurprizing, that a nation ſo laſcivious as this ſhould have ſo little jealouſy; for generally ſpeaking, the more people are inclined to this brutal pleaſure the more jealous they are. The Turks and Moors are a proof of this. The latter are far from having the ſame turn of mind with the Americans of the province of Carthagena. They require, above all things, a wife who has kept her virginity very ſcrupulouſly; and if they have not proofs of this the day after the wedding, they ſend her back to her relations. See an account of Morocco publiſhed by Mr. de St. Olon in 1694. Some nations have been found near the Red Sea, who are furiouſly jealous on this article; theſe would not be ſatisfied, had not certain meaſures been taken in the bride's infancy, which would oblige the bridegroom to begin with a kind of Chirurgical operation. Cardinal Bembus's Latin will let us into the meaning of this. Aliis poſt hos relictis populis, mare rubrum Poſſibly in ſome countries of the newly-diſcovered world, the ruſtick and ſimple inhabitants might have followed, with plainneſs and frugality, the laws of nature; and that they learnt deceit and riotous exceſs by their frequenting the Chriſtians; but, in general, the depravity of the Americans was ſo brutal and enormous, that we cannot enough deteſt it. The deſign of our Cieca was to write a complete hiſtory of Peru, in four parts (b); it is not known whether he compleated them; the only circumſtance we are informed of is, that the firſt part was printed at Sevil in the year 1553. He began it in 1541, and ended it in the year 1550 (c). He was at Lima, the Capital of the Kingdom of Peru, when he gave the finiſhing ſtroke to it, and was then thirty two years of age (d). Therefore the bridegroom's firſt care is to o-"pen the cloſed paſſage with an inſtrument; ſo honou-"rable is it eſteemed among theſe Barbarians, not to "marry a woman, whoſe virginity is doubtful." Strange that man can be ſubject to follies ſo diametrically oppoſite!

(12) Petrus Bembus, Hiſt. Venet. lib. 6. folio m. 130.

To return to the Americans. Moſt of them remove themſelves the evil, there would be in their marriage, in caſe the bride ſhould be a virgin. One would conclude that they truſt only to themſelves; they leave nothing for the friends and relations to do; I mean, that before ever they ſpeak of contracts or any thing of that kind, they do whatever they have a mind to do with thoſe who are to be their brides. Si maritavano alla foggia de i lor vicini: & odo dire, che alcuni, ò la maggior parte, prima che ſi maritino, togliono la virginità à quelle, che s'haveano da maritare, meſcolandoſi con quelle luſſurioſamente (13). By the way, all the Americans in general do not contemn maidenheads in this manner. In ſeveral countries of America, all huſbands require their brides to be virgins, but few find them ſuch, they coming too late; La maggior parte de gli Indiani ſi maritano con le figlivole & ſorelle d' altri, ſenza ordine, & pochi trovano le mogli vergini (14). What this author obſerves with regard to Sodomy is horrid, it being practiſed publickly: Non oſtante ch' haveſſino molte donne belliſſime, tuttavia (ſi come da loro inteſi) uſavano publicamente il triſto vitio della ſodomia, & anco ſe ne vantavano alla ſcoperta (15). And there were even temples in which it was practiſed as a pious act (16); an abomination unknown to the heathens of antient Greece, though it was very common for them to proſtitute women in honour of the Gods. I have not obſerved in Cieca, that ſome nations in this new found world never uſed to cover their pudenda; but other travellers affirm this in the moſt poſitive terms, and with this very odd circumſtance, that ſuch females as had their virginity did not conceal their pudenda; and that thoſe who had loſt it, only hid thoſe parts: Hiſpanis ulteriora tentantibus, terra eſt objecta, continens paulo minus decies centena millia paſſuum ab Hiſpaniola protenſa meridiem verſus: atque in ea populi ſub rege bellum cum finitimis gerente occurrerunt: quorum fœminæ virum paſſæ nullam partem corporis, præter muliebria, virgines ne illam quidem tegebant (17). This is very ſurprizing, ſince that the laws which relate to decorum allow, in all countries, a greater latitude to married women than to maidens.

It is to be obſerved that this horrid depravity, which had extinguiſhed the laws of humanity and modeſty; and which had immerſed theſe nations in the cruelty and ferocity of man-eating, and the moſt monſtrous laſciviouſneſs, had not yet extinguiſhed or ſtifled the ideas of religion. They believed the immortality of the ſoul, as appears from all their funeral ceremonies (18); they worſhipped the Sun (19); believed a creator of all things (20); offered ſacrifices to their idols, and did not even ſpare human blood in them (21). The author obſerves very often, that they ſerve the Devil; but they look upon him as a being exceedingly powerful; and who, notwithſtanding his wickedneſs, does yet partake in ſome little meaſure of the divine nature. Indiani di Tacunga credono l'immortalità dell' anima, quanto intendiamo da loro, & che vi ſia un Creatore del tutto. Conſiderando la grandezza del cielo, il muovemento del Sole, della Luna, & altre coſe maravigliose, quantunque acciecati dal Demonio, credono, che eſſo habbia poſſanza in ogni coſa. Benche alcuni conoſcendo le ſue malvagità, & come é ſempre buggiardo, & gli tratta peſſimamente, lo hanno in odio, ma pur l'ubbidiſcono per timore, credendo, che ſia in lui qualche Deità (22). i. e. "Conſidering the wide extent of the heavens, the Sun's "motion, and that of the moon, and other wonder-"ful things, notwithſtanding they are blinded by the "Devil, they believe that he has power over all things. "However, ſome being ſenſible of his malice, and "knowing that he is always a liar, and treats them "vaſtly ill, hate him; and yet they obey him through "fear, believing that there is ſomething of divinity "in him." LEO (GONSALEZ PONTIUS DE) was a native of Seville, and lived in the ſixteenth Century. He reſided in Rome in the year 1585, and there publiſhed a Latin anſwer (a) to a book, which a German Proteſtant named Leonhart Waramund, had wrote in defence of Gebhard Truchſes, Archbiſhop of Colen. He wrote with great paſſion in this Reply; and, according to the practice at that time, vented a numberleſs multitude of injurious expreſſions againſt his adverſary. He does not write ill, in Latin, for a Spaniard [A], and had read a great deal.

LEONCLAVIUS (JOHN) one of the moſt learned men of the ſixteenth Century, was a native of Weſtphalia, and a Gentleman by birth. He ſpent near two years at the Duke of Savoy's Court, on the affairs of Lazarus Suendius, or Swend (a); after which he travelled a long time in the retinue of Baron Zerotini; he alſo reſided ſome years with the Baron de Kilts. He had been invited to Heidelberg to be Greek Profeſſor in that City; but Prince Caſimir's death made this invitation of no effect (b). During his abode in Turkey, he collected excellent materials for compoſing the Ottoman Hiſtory; and it is to him the publick is indebted for the beſt account we have of that Empire [A]. To the knowledge in the learned languages he had added that of the civil law; whereby he was extremely well qualified to tranſlate the Baſilica [B]. His other verſions were eſteemed, though ing is, that the writers of that country are generally too negligent in this particular. Some of them are careleſs even of the orthography, and write u inſtead of b, and y inſtead of i. Here follows an example of this. Cujus (rei maritimæ) itidem polytica tractatio, diſpoſitio & Archiguvernatio à Magno Philippo noſtro Hiſpaniarum Rege .... tuæ ſollicitudini & prudentiæ emandata prædicatur. Thus writes the Licentiate Don John Baptiſt de Urquiola & Elorriaga, in the preliminary epiſtle to a treatiſe on the civil Law (1) printed in 1663 (2), and dedicated to Don Franciſco Ramos del Manzano. Addit. by the tranſl.] Teiſſier, quoting Melchior Adamus affirms, that Scaliger calls Leunclavius the moſt learned Civilian of his time, and even places him in a higher rank than the great Cujas (6). Now Melchior Adam ſays nothing like this; and beſides, the things aid in Leunclavius's praiſe in the ſecond Scaligerana are vaſtly beneath this Elogium. "Leunclavius is the beſt author who has "wrote concerning the Turks." Leunclavius fuit Weſtphalus, ſed non Barbarus: bene intellexit Græca Conſtantinopolitana & inferioris ævi; omnia ejus ſcripta ſunt utilia, imo neceſſaria; Græca Juriſconſultorum intellexit, ſed Autorum Veterum non intellexit, ut H. Stephanus, qui paulo ante obitum multa ſcripſit ad me contra Leunclavii editionem Xenophontis. Leunclavius habebat ſcorta ſecum. Cluſius eum novit familiariſſimè (7). i. e. "Leunclavius was a native of Weſt- "phalia, but not a Barbarian. He was well ſkilled in "the Conſtantinopolitan Greek, and that of the laſt "age of the empire. All his compoſitions are uſeful or "rather neceſſary; he underſtood the Greek of the "Civilians, but not that of the ancient authors, as "Henry Stephens, who, a ſhort time before he died, "wrote to me, a great many things againſt Leun- "clavius's edition of Xenophon. Leunclavius kept "harlots in his houſe. Cluſius was vaſtly intimate "with him." Thus ſpeaks the ſecond Scaligerana. Leunclavius's learning is more applauded there than his moral conduct, ſince it is affirmed that he kept proſtitutes in his houſe. [C] His other verſions were eſteemed. though the Criticks pretend to have found many faults in them.] "He is one of the moſt celebrated tranſlators that "Germany ever gave birth to. He has given us "a tranſlation of Xenophon reviſed three times; of "Zozimus; of the Annals of Conſtantine Ma-"naſſes; of thoſe of Michael Glycas; of the epi-"tome of the ſixty books of the Baſilica; and of ſe-"veral works of St. Gregory Nazianzen . . . . He "alſo corrected Xylander's tranſlation of Dion, and "that of Chalcondylas by Clauſer (10)." Baillet, whoſe words I have here borrowed, has tranſcribed the elogiums, which are extremely advantageous, that Huetius beſtows on this tranſlator. [Huetius ſays, "no "German has tranſlated with greater ſkill than Leun-"clavius; he has tranſlated, in the moſt perfect man-"ner, the thoughts and expreſſions of his authors, "without any way curtailing them; his Latin often "correſponds word for word with the Greek; he "obſerves the ſame conſtruction and order as are "found in his originals, by which means he tranſ-"fuſes his authors, entire, into another language. "He alſo writes with great politeneſs and clearneſs; "his Latin has that exact purity, that eaſy air, ſo "ſeldom in other verſions (†)." Addition by the tranſlator.] The notes on Zozimus, in the Engliſh edition of 1679, do not give ſo advantageous an idea of our Leonclavius's capacity. Henry Stephens wrote a very ſharp criticiſm on the tranſlation of Xenophon (11), and was expoſed to very ſevere complaints from his adverſary. Baillet mentions this diſpute, and Melchior Adam ſpeaks of it as follows. Litem tamen ei ſuper iſta interpretatione Xenophontea Criticam & Grammaticam movit Henricus Stephanus, vir & typographus clariſſimus, edita in ejus errores inſignes inquiſitione autoſchediaſtica. Contra & Leunclavius de Stephano conqueritur, quod contra fidem datam, & præter officium viri boni Xenophontis a ſe latine redditi exemplar, ſicut & Zozimi, detinuerit. Et faſſus eſt Stephanus, accepiſſe ſe illam Xenophontis verſionem ab annis circiter octodecim; poſt tredecim aut quatuordecim amplius annis ſibi non viſam, ſed cum è ſua ſupellectile liberaria, militum incuria, belli tempore aliquot libri incendio periiſſent, neſciviſſe, an in illorum numero Xenophon à Leonclavio verſus, fuiſſet. Tandem, interjecto anni amplius ſpacio, librum inventum fuiſſe, ſitu obſitum, & membrana craſſa, qua involutus erat, conſervatum (12). i. e. On "the other ſide Leonclavius exclaims againſt Stephens, "for detaining, contrary to the promiſe he had given, "and the duty of a man of honour, the copy of "his tranſlation of Xenophon and likewiſe that of Zozi-"mus. Stephens confeſſed that he had received that "verſion of Xenophon about eighteen years before; "that for thirteen or fourteen years he had not ſeen it; "but that when ſome books in his library, during "the war, periſhed in the flames through the careleſſ-"neſs of the ſoldiers, he did not know but that Leon-"clavius's verſion of Xenophon might be among "them. That at laſt, in a little more than a year, "the book was found, quite mouldy, and preſerved "by its thick parchment binding."

LEONICENUS (NICHOLAS) born at Vicenza in the year 1428, taught Phyſic in the Univerſity of Ferrara for above threeſcore years (a); he was not only a very able man in his profeſſion, but alſo very well verſed in polite Literature. He was the firſt who tranſlated Galen's works into Latin (b). It is impoſſible to be more diſengaged from all ſenſual pleaſures than he was. [A] He was diſtinguiſhed in the moſt eminent manner by his temperance, chaſtity, and extreme averſion for all kind of covetouſneſs.] Had it not been for his chearful temper and pleaſant countenance, men would have took him for a perfect Stoic. He uſed to eat and to ſleep very little, he abſtained from wine and women; he did not much care whether they preſented to him one kind of meat or another, he uſed without any choice the victuals that were offered him, and he cared ſo little for money, that he could not even diſtinguiſh one piece of coin from another. *Cibi & vini maxime abſtinens, ſomnique minimi, præſertim verò Veneris continentiſſimus, uſque adeò mollioris vitæ voluptates abdicavit, ut pecunias, luxuriæ inſtrumenta, nec agnita quidem monetæ nota contemneret; oblatum, & nulla delectum cura cibum caperet; nec unquam de fortuna quereretur . . . [B] . . . . . It was to this innocent life he aſcribed his vigorous health.] Paulus Jovius aſſerts that he heard him ſay this. Quum ego aliquando comiter ab eo peterem, ut ingenuè proferret, quonam arcano artis uteretur, ut tanto corporis atque animi vigore vitia ſenectutis eluderet: Vividum, inquit, ingenium perpetua, Jovi, vitæ innocentia, ſalubre verò corpus hilaris frugalitatis præſidio facilè tuemur (2). i. e. "I deſired him once "civilly, to tell me with ſincerity, what ſecret of "his art he made uſe of, to avoid the infirmities of "old age, and to enjoy ſuch a ſtrength of body and "mind. Jovius, ſaid he to me, we eaſily keep "up a ſprightly genius, by leading conſtantly an in-"nocent life, and preſerve the body in health, by a "chearful frugality." Jovius had obſerved juſt before (3), that Leonicenus at the age of fourſcore and ten, had the perfect uſe of all his ſenſes, and a very ſtrong memory; that he walked without a ſtick, and that he did not ſtoop in the leaſt, though he was very tall. Obſerve however, that an innocent life is not always attended with the happy conſequences which Leonicenus aſcribes to it. There are many perſons, very great age, for he lived fourſcore and ſixteen years [C]. His merit muſt certainly have been very great, ſince both the Scaligers commend him [D]. I cannot tell whether we ought to believe what one of them obſerves, namely that Leonicenus, being troubled in his youth with an epilepſy, was weary of his life, and almoſt determined to lay violent hands on himſelf [E]. This learned Phyſician compoſed ſeveral conſiderable works [F], and wrote verſes very well [G]. He died in the year 1524. He had ſet up for perſons, who might have diſputed with him the crown of chaſtity and temperance, and whoſe conſcience was not leſs clear than his, and whoſe days have nevertheleſs been few and evil; they did not live long, and were often out of order.

Let us quote another witneſs beſides Paulus Jovius. I have read a particular in Melchior Adam, whence it ſeems we may infer, that Leonicenus told his diſciple John Langius, that the chaſtity of his youth was, in his opinion, the cauſe of his long life. Audivit in Italia (Joannes Langius) ... Nicolaum Leonicenum, Dioſcoridis illuſtratorem: qui annum ætatis attigit nonageſimum ſextum, cùm ampliùs ſexaginta annos Ferrariæ docuiſſet. Hic dixit, ſe viridi vegetâque uti ſenectâ, quia caſtam juventutem virili ætati tradidiſſet, ediditque opuſculum, in quo omnibus ægris ſalutem & vitam reſtitui conciliarique poſſe docuit (4). i. e. "John Lan- "gius ſtudied in Italy under Nicholas Leonicenus, "who explained Dioſcorides, and lived till he was "fourſcore and ſixteen years old, having been above "threeſcore years Profeſſor at Ferrara. He ſaid that "he enjoyed a briſk and lively old age, becauſe he "came to the age of manhood having been very con- "tinent in his youth. He has publiſhed a work in "which he maintains that it is poſſible to reſtore all "ſick perſons to their health and life." You ſee in this paſſage, that he was the author of a book, made on purpoſe to prove that all ſick perſons may be reſtored to their health. He excepted doubtleſs thoſe, who had no other diſtemper but old age, or at leaſt he confeſſed that that diſtemper is incurable. He found it by his own experience; for here follows what Langius, an eye-witneſs, obſerves of him. Ferrariam igitur venimus, ubi Leonicenum, elegantioris medicinæ illuſtratorem, edentulum fere, & jam ex ſenii maraſmo tabeſcentem, convenimus: quem, ſenile ætatis ejus decus reveriti, perplexis de erroribus Plinii problematibus obtundere nolebamus (5). i. e. "We came to Ferrara, where we "waited on Leonicenus, who illuſtrated the moſt po- "lite part of Phyſic; he had loſt almoſt all his teeth, "and was quite ſpent with age. Out of reſpect for "this worthy old man, we forbore to teize him with "perplexing objections concerning Pliny's miſtakes." The letter, where Langius ſpeaks thus, is without any date; we cannot therefore judge from it, whether Paulus Jovius is not miſtaken with regard to that vigour he aſcribes to old Leonicenus.

[C] He lived fourſcore and ſixteen years.] Naudé is very much miſtaken, who makes him live above a whole century. I ſhall tranſcribe his own words becauſe they contain ſome other particulars, which are very extraordinary. Hippocrates, Galenus, Avenzoar, Leonicenus, cogitate vos quantum tempore, loco, vivendi ratione inter ſe diſcrepantes, hoc uno vitæ termino plane conveniunt, quem omnes ultra centeſimum annum protraxere (6). i. e. "Conſider, that Hippocrates, Ga- "len, Avenzoar, Leonicenus, how much ſoever they "differed with regard to time, place, and their man- "ner of living, yet met with the ſame fate in this, "that they all lived above an hundred years."

"My father always very much "commended Leonicenus, whom he judged to be the "firſt Phyſician of his time." So much for the father: as for the ſon, he ſpeaks thus. De eo viro non niſi honorifice prædicare debemus, vel eo nomine quod primus Philoſophiam & Medicinam ipſam cum humanioribus literis conjunxit. Primus enim ille nos docuit, homines, qui ſine bonis literis Medicinam tractant, eſſe ſimiles iis qui in alieno foro litigant (8). i. e. A pueritia, imo à cunabilis ipſis ad* 30 annum morbo comitiali adeo tentabatur, ut cum ad ſe redierat, pertæſus vitæ pene ſibi manus afferret. Sed poſt trigeſimum annum plane eo malo defunctus, omnibus membrorum ac ſenſuum officiis integer, nulla morbi ſuſpicione ad 94 annum pervenit. Et ſi bene memini, triduo antequam decederet è vita, operam dederat lectioni. i. e. "What I have "heard of this man is wonderful. From his childhood, "nay even from his cradle, till he came to be thirty, he "was ſo much troubled with the falling-ſickneſs, that "on his recovering from a fit, he was tired with his "life, and ready to kill himſelf. But after the age of "thirty, he was entirely free from that diſtemper, and "had the perfect uſe of all his members and ſenſes; "and thus he lived in very good health, without feel- "ing the leaſt return of his former diſtemper, to the "age of fourſcore and fourteen years. And if my "memory does not fail me, he had been reading but "three days before he died." This was a fate worthy to be envied; not indeed, becauſe Leonicenus lived fourſcore and ſixteen years; this would not be very conſiderable without the reſt, nay, it would be a great evil rather than a happineſs; but becauſe in that very great age he had the uſe of his mind, of his memory, and of his ſenſes, and becauſe his laſt illneſs was very ſhort (9).

(9) I ſpeak thus with regard to the paſſage quoted from Scaliger, and not to that quoted from Langius.

He tranſlated Dion's Hiſtory, and Lucian's Dialogues into Italian, to gratify Hercules Duke of Ferrara, who did not underſtand Latin (12). I forgot to mention his treatiſe De Vipera i. e. LEONINUS (ELBERT, or ENGELBERT) in Dutch de Leew, born in the Iſle of Bommel in Guelderland, was one of the beſt Civilians in the ſixteenth Century, and very well ſkilled in State-affairs. He ſtudied firſt in his own country, then at Utrecht, afterwards at Emmerick, and laſtly at Louvain. He did not only apply himſelf to the Belles Lettres in that City, under the learned Peter Nannius; he alſo ſtudied the Law, and took his degrees in that Faculty in the year 1547. He went afterwards to Arras to learn the French tongue there, and at a year's end returned to Louvain, where he married the daughter of the firſt Profeſſor of Civil Law [A]. A chair of a Profeſſor of Canon Law happening to become vacant the ſecond day of his marriage he was choſen to fill it; he acquitted himſelf very worthily of that employment, and gained a great reputation both by his lectures, and by his anſwers to the law queſtions which were propoſed to him from all parts of Europe. In the year 1560 he ſucceeded Gabriel Mudæus firſt Profeſſor of Law; and from that time his reputation increaſed daily, ſo that the great Lords and Magiſtrates in the Low-Countries conſulted him, having a very great eſteem for him. Even they who were at variance truſted him with their moſt ſecret affairs, and with the ſubjects of their diſputes, and did not even ſcruple to chooſe him for their arbiter; but ſuch was the obſtinacy of their hatred that he could not reconcile them together. He had the honour to be intimately beloved by the Prince of Orange; and this was one of the reaſons which determined him never to go over to the King of Spain's party, after he had once declared for thoſe Lords and for thoſe Provinces, who were reſolved to aſſert their liberty. I ſhall relate below the other reaſons he had for

Add all theſe ſums together, and you will find a whole century; nor will there be an error in this calculation, as there is in Valerius Andreas's account. There was, according to him, a whole year at leaſt, between the time when Leoninus took his degrees, and his nuptials. He took his degrees in the year 1547, whence it follows that he was married in the year 1548: now he died in the year 1598; how can it then be maintained that he lived fifty two years with his wife? I know that this is aſſerted in his epitaph (4); but we muſt infer from thence, that he married Barba van Haze in the year 1546, and that Valerius Andreas was in the wrong, not to obſerve that he was miſtaken in his calculation.

for this conduct [B]. He was appointed Chancellor of Guelderland after the Archduke Matthias's departure in the year 1581. He was one of the Embaſſadors whom the States ſent to the French King after the death of the Prince of Orange in the year 1584, and he was their ſpeaker at the audience they had of Henry III (a), and in the Conferences that were held concerning the offer which was made him of the Sovereignty of the Low-Countries. He made a ſpeech at the Hague in the name of the ſame States to the Earl of Leiceſter, whom Queen Elizabeth had appointed their Governor; he inſinuated himſelf into this Earl's familiarity, and into that of the other Engliſh Lords, and adviſed them to uſe their authority with a great deal of moderation; but other advices prevailed. He died at Arnhem December the 4th (b) 1598 at the age of threeſcore and nineteen (c). He never profeſſed the Proteſtant Religion, and even behaved himſelf a little too freely in that reſpect [C].

There

[B] I ſhall relate below the other reaſons he had for this conduct.] We find in him an inſtance of a conſtancy which is very uncommon; for being engaged with the States, he continued in that engagement ſtedfaſtly till his death, though it was not a zeal for religion that prompted him to it. It is no extraordinary thing to ſee perſons die in that party, which they declared for at the riſing of a faction, or at the beginning of a revolution. But if ſuch an undertaking was a long time carrying on; if it was attended with various conſequences and events, ſometimes favourable, ſometimes diſadvantageous; you will find, generally ſpeaking, that the ſame perſons forſake and join again with the ſame party three or four times; and if they end as they began, it is ſometimes owing to mere chance: death ſurpriſes them when they are come to their firſt lodgings; a few years more would perhaps again have made them go over to the other ſide. The only means to be proof againſt all variations, is either to engage with the rebellious party, thro' a fervent zeal for religion; or to exaſperate one's Prince to ſuch a degree, that there can be no depending on a pardon, though never ſo ſolemnly promiſed. Leoninus's conſtancy was not owing to any of theſe cauſes; a conſtancy which continued a long while, and was never interrupted. What then could be his motives? They were as follow. The Prince of Orange had an entire confidence in, and an infinite friendſhip for him. This made him obnoxious to the Royaliſts, and to the King himſelf. They imagined that he was concerned in the rebellion, which yet, ſays he (5), was abſolutely falſe; but he did not think it proper to ſerve perſons who ſuſpected him unjuſtly. But further, he was Counſellor of State to the new Commonwealth, he had been truſted with their moſt conſiderable affairs; and he thought it would have been a perfidiouſneſs to diſcover them to their enemies, as he would have been obliged to do, had he gone over to them (6). Beſides all this, he was determined to follow Solon's advice, which is, that in civil wars an honeſt man ought to declare himſelf for the weakeſt and moſt dangerous party. Sed & Solonis dictum, inquit, & conſilium ob oculos habebam, quod bonus vir in civilibus diſſentionibus partem eligere debeat inferiorem & magis periculoſam (7). A man muſt be very much a Philoſopher to give ſuch advice, but he muſt be much more a Philoſopher who follows it. But why did not Solon adviſe us to declare for the party which has right on its ſide? I imagine one might anſwer, that the different parties in a Commonwealth do all pretend to act from a public ſpirit for the good of the whole; and they all reſpectively aſſert their cauſe with ſuch a ſhew of arguments, objections and anſwers, that it is a difficult matter for private perſons to ſift out the truth, and to find out who is in the right or in the wrong. And therefore what better courſe can they take but to declare themſelves for the weakeſt party; nor is it ſuch a difficult matter to diſcover which is the weakeſt, as it is to judge which is the moſt reaſonable. The weakeſt ought to be preferred, both becauſe it becomes a generous man to ſupport the weak againſt the powerful, and becauſe one is much more unavoidably engaged to commit unjuſt actions in that faction which has the greateſt ſtrength, than in that which is leſs powerful. It will be objected, that the latter would not be more moderate, if it were as powerful as the former. I am apt to believe it; but yet as long as its weakneſs puts it out of its power to oppreſs, you ought to join with it, that you may not be concerned in the violent meaſures of the other. If it gets the upper hand, forſake it then, leſt it ſhould engage you to act the tyrant in your turn. Let this be obſerved by the way, with regard to Solon's maxim, and with the reſtriction I have added to it, namely, that it be not known which ſide is in the right or in the wrong.

[C] He behaved himſelf a little too freely with regard to religion.] He would have it reduced to a great ſimplicity, and wiſhed that all that is above the reach of human underſtanding were left to the judgment of God and his Angels. We ought rather, ſaid he, to admire and revere the divine nature, than to define it. Ego ſimplicem religionem amplectendam ſemper prædicavi, & etiam nunc prædico, prorſus divina & humani ingenii captum excedentia, divinitati & ſecreto Dei atque Angelorum judicio relinquens: honorandam potiùs & admirandam divinitatem quàm definiendam judicavi. Enixè laboravi, ut nimiùm ſubtiles diſputationes è Republica ejicerentur, de quo memini in Oratione ad Ordines habita, quæ poſt primam Centuriam Conſiliorum meorum impreſſa eſt (8). Sainte Aldegonde found nothing in him but what was lovely; except only his too great averſion for matters of Divinity. You keep cloſe to your maxims, (ſaid he, in a letter), to hurt no man, to live honeſtly, &c. But this, in my opinion, is making no account of the labour of the prophets and of the Apoſtles, and reckoning them almoſt uſeleſs. Elbertus Leoninus, Hagyæus Albada, aliique inter Proceres religioni reformatæ nunquam nomen dederant. Ille Honeſtate civili contentus religionem omnem ſuſque deque habebat: uti eum ipſi graphicè deſcripſit Phil. Marnixus in ſelect. Epiſt. Belgarum centur. 2. epiſt. 44. "Nihil enim eſt in te quod non ſit ſuaviſſimum, ſi hoc unum demas, quod nimium es atheologus. Dum enim tuis illis formulis, quid dico formulis? oraculis, Neminem lædere, honeſtè vivere, aliiſque immo tanquam ſtopulis inhæreſcis, videris mihi Apoſtolorum omnium ac Prophetarum laborem omnem prope inanem ducere (9). i. e. Elbert Leoninus, Haggai Albada and ſome other Lords never declared themſelves Proteſtants: and Leoninus being contented with moral virtue deſpiſed all Religions; as Philip Marnix de Sainte Aldegonde very well deſcribes him to himſelf, in a letter to him, which is the 44th of the 2d Century of the collection of choice letters from the Dutch, in which he ſpeaks thus. There is nothing in you but what is lovely, except only that you are too averſe to Divinity. For whilſt you adhere too cloſely to your maxims, what do I ſay, maxims? to your Oracles; Hurt no man, live honeſtly, &c. you ſeem to reckon the labours of the Prophets and Apoſtles almoſt uſeleſs." The paſſage where Grotius mentions three illuſtrious men, who died in the Low-countries in the year 1598, deſerves to be peruſed, The two firſt (10) began with being ingaged in ſtate affairs, and waxed old in a retirement from buſineſs; but the third, coming from the receſs of his cloſet into publick buſineſs, ſpent the remainder of his days in great employments. He ſpeaks of our Leoninus, and obſerves, that he was a man naturally poſſeſſed of that which the precepts of the Philoſophers propoſe as the end we ought to aim at; I mean, that he had hardly any paſſion; he followed the republican party, not from a principle of ſelf-intereſt, nor out of prepoſſeſſion, but becauſe he happened to be ingaged in it. Elbertus Leoninus in umbra ſtudiorum quondam educatus, & ante pacem Gandavenſem regiarum partium miniſter, tunc ſummus Geldriæ juridicus conſiliis publicis immoriebatur, homo natura conſecutus, quo veterum magiſtrorum præcepta nituntur, ut affectu pene omni vacaret, adeo quidem, ut partes quoque non ſtudio ullo, ſed quia ſic invenerat, ſequeretur (11).

LEONTIUM, an Athenian Courtezan, made her ſelf famous, firſt by her laſciviouſneſs, and afterwards by her application to the ſtudy of Philoſophy. This laſt profeſſion would have made amends for the diſgrace of the former, had Leontium renounced all love-intrigues as ſoon as ſhe took it into her head to philoſophize; but it is pretended that ſhe did not abate a jot of her former diſſoluteneſs; and that when ſhe ſtudied under Epicurus, ſhe proſtituted herſelf to all this Philoſopher's diſciples. It is even aſſerted, that he himſelf took his ſhare of her favours, and was not aſhamed to own it (a). They who pretend that the ſlanders which have been ſpread againſt his character, are only malicious impoſtures of his enemies, will not confeſs that there paſſed any thing diſgraceful between him and Leontium; they cannot however deny but he ſhewed in his letters, that he had a great friendſhip for her (b); however, they may grant this, ſince nothing can be inferred from it againſt Epicurus's reputation. Leontium was either the wife or the concubine of Metrodorus, by whom ſhe had a ſon, whom Epicurus recommended to the executors of his laſt will and teſtament; and this affords us an argument againſt that letter, in which ſhe is ſuppoſed to complain of the ſower temper and loathſomneſs of this old lover (c). Some imagine ſhe is the ſame Leontium who was the Poet Hermeſianax's miſtreſs [A]. It is more certain that ſhe applied her ſelf ſeriouſly to Philoſophy [B], and that ſhe even ſet up for an authoreſs [C]. Obſerve that Metrodorus was [A] Some imagine ſhe is the ſame Leontium, who was.... Hermeſianax's miſtreſs.] Athenæus (1) mentions this miſtreſs, and even tranſcribes a pretty large number of verſes, extracted from the third book of the elegies which Hermeſianax wrote in honour of Leontium. Monſieur Menage (2), is fully perſuaded that this woman is the ſame with Epicurus's good friend; whereby he proves Voſſius guilty of a miſtake, for placing (3) Hermeſianax amongſt thoſe poets, whoſe age is unknown. This Poet's verſes, quoted by Athenæus, contain a long liſt of perſons in love, and it is very probable that the whole work was upon that ſubject; for Antonius Liberalis (4) extracted a love-tale from the ſecond book of thoſe elegies. Parthenius tranſcribed from the ſame Poet the fifth and the twenty ſecond of his hiſtories. With regard to the twenty ſecond he quotes Hermeſianax in the general; but with reſpect to the fifth he quotes him thus, Ἑρμησιάναξ Λεόντι. It is plain that we muſt read Λεοντίνῳ, and not Λέοντι (5). Monſieur Menage adds, that Hermeſianax wrote an excellent poem on the city of Colophon his native place, which Poem is mentioned by Pauſanias (6). Monſieur Menage has undoubtedly been miſled by theſe words of Voſſius. Hermeſianax Colophonius, Poëta Elegiacus de patria Colophone egregium carmen condidit, ut ex Pauſania cognoſcere eſt (7). Pauſanias does not give us the leaſt reaſon to aſcribe this to him: He only ſays, that he does not believe Hermeſianax was ſtill living, when Lyſimachus deſtroyed the City of Colophon: for, adds he, Hermeſianax would certainly have lamented the ruin of that City. Ὡς φοίνικα ἰάμβων ποιητὴν, Κολοφώνιον, θρηνῆσαι τὴν ἅλωσιν. Ἑρμησιάναξ δὲ ὁ τὰ ἐλεγεῖα γράψας οὐκ ἔτι (ἐμοὶ δοκεῖν) περιῆν· πάντα γάρ που καὶ αὐτὸς ἂν ἐπὶ ἁλώσει Κολοφῶνι ὠδύρατο. Phœnix Colophonius iamborum ſcriptor eam exciſionem deploravit; nam Hermeſianactа qui elegos ſcripſit, ad illud uſque tempus ſuperſtitem fuiſſe non crediderim, neque enim is in aliqua carminum ſuorum parte exciſam Colophonem non defleſſet (8). You ſee that he had juſt mentioned the Poet Phœnix, a writer of Iambicks, born at Colophon, who made his muſe bemoan the ruin of that City. We may infer from this paſſage of Pauſanias, that Hermeſianax was contemporary with Epicurus, and therefore that their loving both the ſame Leontium is not inconſiſtent with chronology. Pauſanias would not have expreſſed himſelf as he has done, had this writer of elegies flouriſhed a great many years before Epicurus. Obſerve that Lyſimachus, who deſtroyed the City of Colophon, was one of thoſe, who ſhared Alexander's conqueſts among themſelves.

[C] She ſet up for an authoreſs.] She wrote againſt Theophraſtus, who was the ſtrongeſt aſſertor of the Ariſtoteliean Sect, and the ornament of his age. Cicero tells us that ſhe wrote that work in a very polite ſtyle. Non modo Epicurus, ſays he (10), & Metrodorus, & Hermachus contra Pythagoram, Platonem, Empedoclemque dixerunt, ſed meretricula etiam Leontium contra Theophraſtum ſcribere auſa eſt, ſcito quidem illa ſermone & Attico, ſed tamen tantum Epicuri hortus habuerit licentiæ, & ſoletis queri. i. e. "Not only Epicu-"rus, Metrodorus and Hermachus wrote againſt Py-"thagoras, Plato, and Empedocles, but even that lit-"tle whore Leontium dared to write againſt Theo-"phraſtus, which ſhe did indeed in a polite and ele-"gant ſtyle: but yet ſuch was the licentiouſneſs that "prevailed in Epicurus's ſchool; and of which you "are uſed to complain." The laſt words of this paſſage have given the criticks a great deal of trouble; they conſtrue them ſeveral ways; but I queſtion whether it be well known how they ought to be conſtrued: we may however know the author's meaning. He deſigned to exaggerate the licentiouſneſs which prevailed in Epicurus's ſchool: and the better to expoſe it, he inſtances in Leontium's boldneſs, who, being a proſtitute, dared to write againſt Theophraſtus. But how great a Rhetorician ſoever Cicero was, he did not ſucceed ſo well as Pliny, in giving us a ſtrong notion of the indignity there was, according to him, in Leontium's attempt. Pliny tells us that this woman's audaciouſneſs gave riſe to a proverb, the ſenſe of which was, that men had no longer any thing to do, but to go and hang themselves, since the learned were exposed to such indignities. Ceu vero nesciam adversus Theophrastum, hominem in eloquentia tantum ut nomen divinum inde invenerit, scripsisse etiam feminam, & proverbium inde natum, suspendio arborem eligendi (11). i. e. [D] She had a daughter .... who died a violent death, as you will see...] This daughter's name was DANAE. She followed her mother's example with regard to gallantry, but I do not know whether she ever meddled with Philosophy. Athenæus does not say a word of it; and he is the only author who acquaints me with some particulars concerning this woman. He observes (12), that she followed the trade of a Courtezan, and became the Concubine of Sophron governor of Ephesus. She insinuated herself into Laodice's favour so far, that the latter used to ask her advice in every thing, and trusted her with all her secrets. Danae knowing that Laodice designed to put Sophron to death, made him a sign to withdraw himself; he took the hint, and understood the danger he was in; he made believe as though he had forgot something, which he must remember in order to answer upon the subject that was given him to examine. He had time granted him to recollect himself; but he did not appear any more, and made his escape to Corinth in the night time. As soon as Laodice found out that Danae had been the occasion of his escape, she sentenced her to be thrown down a precipice. Danae knowing the danger she was in, was so proud that she would not answer one word to Laodice's questions: but she was not dumb when she was going to the place of execution: so far from it; she made a very outrageous complaint against providence. It is with a great deal of reason, said she, that several persons despise the Gods; for all the reward they grant me for saving my husband's life, is that I shall now be precipitated, whilst Laodice, who killed hers, enjoys the highest dignity. Ἀπαγομένην δὲ ἐπὶ τὸν κρημνὸν εἶπεν, ὡς δικαίως οἱ πολλοὶ καταφρονοῦσι τοῦ θείου, ὅτε ἐγὼ τὸν γενόμενόν μοι ἄνδρα σώσασα, τοιαύτην χάριτα παρὰ τοῦ δαιμονίου λαμβάνω. Λαοδίκη δὲ τὸν ἴδιον ἀποκτείνασα, τηλικαύτης τιμῆς ἀξιοῦται. Cum ad præcipitium duceretur, dixisse, à multis non injuria Deos contemni. Nam quod, inquit, virum meum servavi, hanc mihi gratiam Dii rependunt: quod autem Laodice maritum suum interfecerit, in maximo honore est (13).

[E] Vives pretends that she wrote her book against Theophrastus, because this Philosopher had published several good observations concerning marriage.] It is very probable that a woman who did not marry, and had gallants, could not like such writings; but yet this probability does not excuse Ludovicus Vives, if he gives us for matter of fact, as he does in the following passages, a particular, which he did not read in any credible author: Novum malis non est, odisse bene monentes: sed in hoc ipso materiæ genere Theophrastus, quum de conjugio gravissime multa scripsisset, meretrices in se concitavit: & prosiliit Leontium, Metrodori concubina, quæ adversus tantum & facundia & sapientia virum, librum sine mente sine fronte evomeret (14). i. e. "It is no new "thing for the wicked to hate those, who give them "good advice: Thus Theophrastus, having wrote "with great judgment concerning matrimony, raised "the prostitutes against him; and Leontium, Metro"dorus's concubine, rose up; and without sense or "shame put out a volume against this man, who "was so eminent for his eloquence and learning." This is a particular, which neither Cicero nor Pliny took notice of, when they mentioned the book, which Leontium wrote against Theophrastus (15): It should not therefore have been asserted, without a sufficient quotation to support the assertion. This is infinitely less necessary with regard to such particulars, as are to be met with every where. I shall observe by the by, that this passage and several others are omitted in the French translation of this work of Vives, made by Anthony Tiron, at Plantin's command, in the year 1579. I wonder at it; for I am apt to think, that these omissions are owing to Plantin's not making use of the editions, which Vives had revised, and to which he had made additions.
